It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Militia Courts Martial.

The report of the Committee on Military Affairs, [made this day,] on the subject of the documents in this case, being under consideration—

Mr. HAMILTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, made to this House, on certain documents communicated by the Department of War, touching the proceedings of a court martial which convened at Mobile on the 5th December, 1814, and a correspondence between the Secretary of War and Governor Blount, respecting certain drafts of the Militia of the State of Tennessee, be printed with said documents, which have been previously ordered to be printed by this House.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to amend the resolution, by adding these words:

“And that the documents heretofore ordered to be printed, shall, when printed, be appended to said report, in the order in which they have been arranged by the committee.”

Mr. HAMILTON accepted the amendment.

Mr. BURGESS said, that, by way of apology that the order of the House had not been complied with, it had been said that it was one of the high privileges of a committee of Congress, to say when and how documents are to be printed. He denied that. He denied that when the House had said certain papers are to be printed, a committee, or a member of a committee, may put them in their pockets, and prevent them from being printed. If such a doctrine were to prevail, a committee might put documents in their pockets and keep them there until the end of the session. The mode of printing had been indicated by the order of the House. This is not merely a conflict between the privileges of a committee and of the printer. What had the printer to do with it beyond putting it into type? that which was before the House is chirography. Why then should it be stated that this is a conflict between the privileges of a committee and the printer? With all due deference, the House had a right to examine the documents at the same time as the committee. He knew not why the committee had claimed the privilege of giving their opinions, when they were not asked for. When documents were ordered to be printed, it was not the usual way to retain them from the clerk, so that he could have no opportunity—should not be able to send them to the printer—but they had been uniformly sent to the clerk, and from him to the printer. It was now perfectly clear that it was the object of the committee that the people should not have the documents without a glossary to accompany them. The Secretary of War had been precluded from giving any opinion. It was then the wish of the gentlemen that the facts should go forth to the people without any commentary. Now, the same gentlemen seem to fear lest the people should have the facts without a commentary. It is intended to insinuate that the people have so little knowledge that they would not be able to understand the documents if they were presented to them by themselves. He was astonished to hear such a doctrine asserted. He did not know with what kind of people the gentleman from South Carolina was acquainted; but those of the people with whom he was himself acquainted, he could assure the gentleman, want no glossary or commentary to serve as a guide to their understandings. This mode of accompanying the documents with a glossary might have a very different effect from keeping the people from committing errors of opinion.

He asked what friend there was of General Jackson who would come forward and say that the naked truth shall not go forth until his friends had prepared a commentary to accompany it? He was astonished that any gentleman could advance the doctrine here, that papers must, of necessity, go to the world with a commentary and argument to each this fellow-citizens how to understand the record. He prayed that members of the House, who had been nearly a fortnight waiting for these papers to be printed, might have the privilege of having these documents before them. He admitted that the argument of the committee was ingenious—

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman from Rhode Island, that it was not in order to discuss the merits of the report on a question to print.

Mr. BURGESS said he was not about to go into the merits: He would say the report had no merits. He wished to have the testimony without the commentary; and he prayed that the order already made by the House should be complied with.

The SPEAKER stated, that when the order of the House was made to refer the documents and print them, he had submitted the papers to the chairman of the committee, a course which he thought perfectly proper.

Mr. DRAYTON referred to the course pursued at the last session, as to the documents connected with the dispute between the U. States and the State of Georgia. A motion was then made, by the chairman of the committee, that all the documents should be appended to the report of the committee, and they were so appended. The committee of which he was a member, had, in the course of their investigation, found it necessary to examine a mass of documents, some of which were only to be obtained from the Indian Department, and all these were appended to their report. There was nothing novel, therefore, in this proposition.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I rise to express a sincere hope that the House may promptly decide this question. I fear, from the course which the debate has taken, that we may again find ourselves involved in a political contest. I call upon those gentlemen upon this floor, if there be any such, with whom my opinion has any influence, to avoid making this a party question. The House have already wasted sufficient time upon questions of that character. We have already withdrawn ourselves long enough from the public business of the nation, for the purpose of attending to the politics of the day.

What is the true, the intrinsic nature of the question now before the House? It is simply this: Shall the documents be printed with, or without, the report of the committee? What possible difficulty can arise in answering this question? No gentleman has objected to printing the report. Whether the documents shall be attached to the report or not, both will be read by the people of the United States. Then why detach them from each other? Let them go together. The question, however, is one of so trifling a character, that I should vote in the negative, rather than be instrumental in producing another protracted party debate.

The Committee on Military Affairs have been, in my opinion, unjustly censured, because they took possession of the documents before they were printed. But was not the order of the House to refer, equally powerful with the order to print? The committee had at least as much right to the possession of these documents, as the printer. One gentleman may have wished that the printing might be the first step, while another desired that the reference might have the precedence. How, then, are the committee censurable? If the printing had been delayed too long, the House could and would have exercised a control over their committee.

If the House had wished the documents to be printed, without the commentary of the committee, they ought to have passed an order for printing simply. But at the same time that we ordered the printing, we sent the documents to the committee. For what purpose? Certainly that we might obtain their report: and now the only question is, whether the documents, and the report upon them, shall be printed together, or separately? I shall vote that the commentary shall accompany the text; but yet I think it a matter of very little importance.

The only change which the committee have made in the order of the letters, is to place them in the order of their dates, and make the answer follow the letter to which it is a reply. No gentleman can wish to see the answer placed before the letter which gave birth to it. Mr. B. again expressed a hope that this might not become a party question, and produce a party debate.

Mr. TAYLOR, in reply to the question which had been asked, as to what difference it made how the documents were printed, said that there were two distinct series of printing: one of which embraces Executive documents, and the other Reports of Committees. At a future day, when this information should be sought for, the Executive documents would naturally be looked to. Should it be transferred to Reports of Committees, it would not be in its natural place. It does not now come before us as from the Executive Departments at all. The House had ordered that it should be printed as an Executive document, and as such it ought to be printed. Precedents had been referred to. One gentleman had referred to the case of the Vice President. In that case, the documents were matters collected as evidence, and formed a part of the report. This is a very different matter. If the Department has presented these documents in a manner to impose on the people, the committee might cast a censure on the Department; but the House owes it to the Department to print the information as it has been received. He thought it high time that we should proceed with the public business. He had come to the House this day in that ex-petition. Unless we violate all the rules and practice of the House, the order would be executed as it had been previously directed, without any change in the manner of doing it.

Mr. WICKLIFFE called for the previous question: which motion prevailed.

The question being then—"Shall the main question be now put?" It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 105, noes 75.

The question was then taken, on the passage of the resolution, and agreed to—ayes 108, noes 69.

TUESDAY, February 12.

Navy Appropriations and Expenses.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair, and took up the bill making appropriations for the Naval service for the year 1828. The bill was read through, and then taken up by sections; and the clause of appropriation for the pay and subsistence being under consideration—

Mr. HOFFMAN, Chairman of the Committee of Naval Affairs, requested Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who had reported the bill, to state to the House what was the increase in the number of officers in the estimates of the present year, over the number of officers in the estimates of last year.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied, that he had imperfectly understood the gentleman from New York, but would state, in reply to what he had understood to be his question, that the increase in amount for this item was about $20,000; which difference grew out of the increased number of officers.

Mr. HOFFMAN then went into a lengthy detailed statement, in which he compared the estimates of this year and the last, as they applied to each grade of officers. The number of Captains, in 1827, was 27; for this year, 32. Those in commission in 1827, were 8; those for this year, 9. Captains waiting orders last year, were 9; this year, 13. Lieutenants waiting orders last year, were 83; those waiting orders this year, 111. Surgeons, two more this year than last—12 waiting for orders. Surgeons' mates were increased from 28 to 32; waiting orders last year, none; this year, 11. Purser increased from 21 to 23—4 waiting orders last year; 8 this year. Midshipmen waiting orders last year, 20; this year, 35. He summed up the increase for the present year as follows: 5 Captains, 1 Commandant, 55 Lieutenants, 17 Surgeons, 14 Surgeons' mates, 6 Purser, 3 Chaplains, and 156 Midshipmen. After stating the reasons given by the Secretary for this increase, Mr. H. insisted, that, if any alterations were to be introduced in the management of the Navy, those changes could be more easily effected if the number of officers was few than many. The only limit to the number of appointments was in the restricting the appropriations for their pay and subsistence. He expressed his willingness to increase the number of officers so far as might be necessary for vessels actually in commission, but was opposed to increasing the number of those waiting for orders. The Navy now cost about one-seventh of the whole expenditure of the Government. That arm of the Government was at present highly popular; but would not continue to be so if it were suffered to grow too expensive. Mr. H. concluded by stating that he was unable to designate what particular sum should be substituted for that now in the bill, as he had not received the necessary data for that purpose from the Navy Department.

Mr. TAYLOR congratulated the House that this subject had received the attention of the Naval Committee. He deprecated the omission, on the part of Congress, heretofore, to fix the number of naval officers, as it had done that of the officers of the Army. He thought it highly improper that their number should be left discretionary with the Executive branch of the Government, and pressed upon the Naval Committee the propriety of bringing in a bill fixing the Navy Peace Establishment.

Mr. McDUFFIE sent to the Clerk's table a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, explaining in detail the estimates from that Department for the present year.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired of Mr. HOFFMAN, whether he considered the total number of officers, proposed to be employed, as too great in proportion to the services proposed to be performed, and whether the whole number was any greater than was requisite for that service which was authorized by law.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied, that the number would be far too small if all the vessels in the Navy were actually in commission, but not more than half our vessels were in actual service; and, in reply to the other question, he said, that if the estimates of last year were to be taken as a standard of judgment, the number of officers proposed for the present year was too great in proportion. The estimate contemplated an increase in the service, which Mr. H. did not think necessary.

After some explanations from Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. HOFFMAN continued his speech, and opposed the expediency of fixing a Peace Establishment, thinking it better that the number of officers should be regulated, from year to year, according to the contingencies of the service. He was opposed to every thing like a sinecure office. He would pay the officers liberally when in actual service; but not retain large numbers of them, upon salary, waiting orders.

Mr. STORRS (who was last year Chairman of the Naval Committee) went into an explanation of the causes which had led to an increase in the extent and expenses of the Navy. He insisted that the expenditure was economical, having been more than made up by the value of our commerce which it had protected. The increase of the officers ought to keep pace with that of the Navy itself. As to a temporary employment of them, to cease as soon as their ships ceased to be in commission, he denounced it as utterly destructive of our naval interests and character. He pronounced the present pay of the officers to be inadequate to the stations they respectively occupied. He denied that there were any sinecures in the Navy, and insisted that, if the number of officers was at any time too great, the fault did not lie with the Department, but with Congress, who had frequently been solicited by the Department to fix the number by law. Such an arrangement was earnestly wished for by the Secretary of the Navy; but he had hitherto asked it in vain. The increase of the expense of the Navy was only in proportion to the increased extension of the commerce which it had to protect.

Mr. DWIGHT replied at considerable length to the remarks of Mr. HOFFMAN, the general error of whose statement lay in this: that he had compared the estimates of this year with the estimates of the last year; whereas, he ought to have compared the estimates of this year, with the expenses of the preceding year, on which they were founded. Had he done this, he would have found, that, instead of being greater, they were about 150,000 dollars less than those of the preceding year. Mr. D. did not agree with Mr. TAYLOR as to the necessity of restricting the Executive discretion, in the appointment of officers. He recapitulated the increasing appropriations which had been made, and the multiplied items of expenditure which had arisen from the building of ten sloops of war—the erection of dry docks at New York and Boston—the depot at Pensacola, &c., and insisted that the number of officers was not greater than these new and various branches of the service required.

Mr. McDUFFIE stated the facts, from which the increased estimates of the present year had arisen, and among them, dwelt especially upon the increased number of Lieutenants and Midshipmen. He gave no opinion as to the necessity or expediency of this increase; he denied that the number of officers employed was to be regulated by the number of vessels in commission. Their number was five times as great as was needed for a state of peace, if that state was always to continue. The necessity for their employment arose from the necessity of being prepared for war. He would not say that it was inexpedient, in this point of view, to increase the number of officers. He was incompetent to judge of that point, but should be unwilling to refuse, without further light, the appropriation asked for. Viewing the Naval Establishment in peace, as in fact a preparation for war, he thought the number of officers ought to bear some general relation to the number of ships, and that, if the Navy itself was increased, some increase of officers was unavoidable. If the Chairman of the Naval Committee would suggest some mode of restraining the number of Lieutenants and Midshipmen, he would unite with him in such a measure.

Mr. WHIPPLE insisted, that, as this whole subject had been placed within the discretion of the Navy Department, that Department should either be permitted to arrange the number of officers as it thought proper; or be accused of malfeasance in office. He presumed the head of that Department had sufficient ability to exercise a sound discretion. Mr. W. insisted upon the better information possessed by the Department, as to the necessity of changing the arrangement of different detachments of the Navy than existed elsewhere, and such changes are necessarily expensive. Let the House either trust to the discretion of the Department, or regulate the matter themselves by law. He had heard no good reason advanced to show that the discretion reposed in the Department had been improperly exercised.

Mr. BARNEY, adverting to the situation of Mr. HOFFMAN, as Chairman of the Naval Committee, reprobated the sentiments expressed from so influential a quarter, in regard to paying the officers only while in actual service, as tending to degrade the standing of those gentlemen, and drive them from the public employment, the effect of which would be to ruin the service, and leave the Navy of the United States bottom upwards. Mr. B. denied that the number of officers was too great even for a permanent Peace Establishment. There were no supernumeraries—no sinecures. The increase of Midshipmen, instead of being upwards of ninety, as by the estimates it would appear to be, was, in fact, but about fifty. He concluded by insisting that the extent of the Navy was only in proportion to the commerce of the country; that the Navy was, in effect, the right arm of the nation.

Mr. SERGEANT stated, as a reason why the number of vessels in commission would require to be increased, that information had just been received from the southward, that great danger was apprehended from the rise of piracy in the Gulf of Mexico. Applications on that subject had this day been received at the Navy Department, from the Insurance Companies of Philadelphia and New York, and others would no doubt follow, from Boston and elsewhere, urging the propriety of stationing an additional force in the Caribbean sea, in consequence of the proclamation of Commodore Porter, inviting privateers into the Mexican service. While this increase of our naval force was required in that quarter, the service in the Pacific, on the coast of Brazil, and above all, in the Mediterranean, would not allow of any diminution. Mr. S. insisted, that the power of appointing officers was properly vested, and that, as long as the House could check it by the amount of appropriations, there was no need of regulating the number of officers by legislative enactment. As to a Peace Establishment, the Navy knew no such thing as peace. From its creation to this day, it had been in perpetual service. Our commerce had required incessant protection, and was likely now to require still more in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the Mediterranean. If a Peace Establishment was fixed at all, it must be fixed at a maximum of what was likely to be required, which would be a very extravagant arrangement. The ships and men of a Navy might be changed, but its officers grew up from childhood in the service, and could only be matured by long practice and experience. It was now the settled policy of this nation, that its Navy was to be gradually increased; and, if so, the number of officers ought to increase with it. Congress had fixed the number and size of its ships, and therein had done all that was required of them, towards fixing the number of officers. Should the service be cut too short of officers, it might chance to fail on the very point most exposed, and a loss be thereby incurred far greater than all the petty saving which might be produced by curtailing the appropriation.

Mr. HOFFMAN now spoke in reply. The Naval Register assigned eight vessels to the West India station. These were more than sufficient to guard against any dangers in that quarter. He thought the past history of our Navy was sufficient to show that no naval nursing and schooling from infancy, was required to form able and accomplished officers. The merchant service supplied such training; and an officer of spirit would rather return to that service, when out of active employ in the Navy, than receive a salary which he did not earn. He opposed the necessity of fixing a permanent Peace Establishment to the extent suggested. He professed his zeal for maintaining this arm of the national defence, on which he bestowed very liberal commendations, but opposed the position that the number of officers was to go on continually increasing. Peace might last a quarter of a century, and yet, at this rate, the expense of the Navy will be so enormously increased, that it might at length constitute one-half of the expense of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN said, in explanation: It was true, that the Naval Register gave eight vessels to the West India station, but of these, only three were in that service at this time, the Erie, the Grampus, and the Natchez; the others being in port undergoing repairs.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the committee rose, reported, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

Navy Appropriations.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved the following:

"And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, for the purchase of such lands as the President of the United States may think necessary and proper, to provide live oak, and other timber, for the use of the Navy of the United States, a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, to be paid out of the moneys appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States, by the first section of the act, entitled 'An act for the gradual improvement of the Navy of the United States,' approved 3d March, 1827."

Mr. HOFFMAN stated, in explanation, that the Secretary of the Navy, endeavoring to fulfil a law passed at the last session, for reserving certain portions of the public land on which timber fit for shipbuilding was found, had experienced considerable difficulty from the intervention of private claims, which, though small in amount, must be satisfied before the law could be carried into effect. This was especially the case in Florida. It was with a view to the extinction of the private titles that he had moved the amendment.

The question being put, it was adopted without opposition.

Mr. HOFFMAN then moved to fill the blank in the section which provides for the pay and subsistence of officers, with $1,100,081 75, instead of $1,176,312, which had been proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, in conformity with the estimates from the Navy Department.

Mr. HOFFMAN did not wish to interfere with the officers attached to vessels in actual service, nor with those that would be required for the increase of the service, which had been proposed by the Secretary of the Navy. He wished only to prevent the increase of the number of officers waiting orders. The increase of these persons proposed by the Department included 4 Captains, 7 Masters Commandant, 28 Lieutenants, 12 Surgeons, 11 Surgeons' mates, 4 Purser, and 65 Midshipmen; the amount of whose united pay and subsistence would be $76,230 25. This sum he wished cut off from the appropriation.

The question being put first upon the larger sum moved by the Committee of Ways and Means, it was carried in the affirmative—ayes 104, noes 58.

The committee then rose and reported the bill.

FRIDAY, February 15.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, offered by Mr. WHEAT, on the 12th instant.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a list of the Cadets now at West Point; their names; the States, and congressional districts, from whence they were sent; and the dates when they were received. Also, a statement showing the present existing rule of the Department as practised relative to the manner of filling up vacancies," &c.

Mr. WHIPPLE had no other objection to the resolution, except that it was needless, inasmuch as the information was already before the House. The rules of the institution had been published, and the law referred to might be found in the documents.

Mr. HAYNES said he was not in the habit of interfering with calls from the Departments, but he had himself corresponded with the Secretary of War on this subject, and all the information that was sought by the resolution, could easily be obtained by a personal application to that officer.

Mr. WEEMS said, that he had made such application, but without success. In the meanwhile an impression had gone abroad that Executive patronage grew out of the management of that institution. This was denied by some gentlemen, who asserted that each Congressional District was entitled to have one cadet in that school, and that this cadet might be nominated by the Representative from that District. He wanted that the people should know how this matter stood, as well as every thing else about the Academy—its advantages and its disadvantages.

Mr. MILLER said, that the only objection he had heard to the call, was, that all the information it requested, was usually given by the Secretary of War, when publishing the names of those who were admitted. Gentlemen who supposed this, were in error. That statement did not designate the Congressional Districts from which the cadets came. This was very desirable to be obtained.

Mr. VANCE said, that it was impossible that the Secretary should give this information, as no register was kept in the Department of the particular Districts from which the cadets came. The register designated merely the States. The usual course, however, was to appoint one cadet from each District. But it was a rule universally observed, that, when one of the candidates was the son of a revolutionary officer in low circumstances, he was preferred. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the choice was left to the Representative from the District, unless his State has already received more than its proportion. Mr. V. said that he possessed a register of the cadets, which gave their rank and standing in the institution, the State from which they came, and all other facts respecting them that needed to be inquired into. This book might be consulted by any gentleman who wished to see it. He had, however, no objection to the call.

Mr. McCOR thought the gentleman from Ohio was in error in supposing that there were no data in the office stating the District from which the cadet was received. The main object to him was to know how the Secretary filled up the vacancies which every year occurred in the institution: for it was well known that a considerable proportion of the students admitted, either from want of capacity or inclination to continue their course, left the institution.

Mr. RAMSAY said, that some gentlemen appeared to be in possession of information which he was not so fortunate as to possess, and which his constituents, as well as himself, were desirous to obtain. If the gentleman from Ohio had a book containing all the particulars he had stated, Mr. R.'s constituents had not.

Here the hour allotted to resolutions expired; and the debate was arrested.

Military Appropriations.—West Point and its Visitors.

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out the item "for erecting new buildings" at West Point. He thought the number of cadets ought to be diminished rather than increased, and, holding that opinion, was opposed to extending the establishment by the erection of any new buildings.

The amendment of Mr. GILMER was negatived, only thirty-six members rising in the affirmative.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to insert a separate item of $1,500, to defray the expenses of the Board of Visitors annually attending at the Academy.

Mr. KREMER thought the Board of Visitors entirely useless. Most of them were men destitute of all military talent, and when they got there, a report was prepared for them, and all they had to do was to sign it. The Government might as well send so many wooden men.

Mr. McDUFFIE stated the practice of the War Department on this subject. The Committee of Ways and Means had inserted but half the sum contained in the estimates from the Department. Many members of Congress visited the institution without compensation, but there were many scientific men who were very fit for this duty, whose circumstances would not admit of this.

Mr. RAMSAY asked whether the travelling expenses of the Visitors were paid.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied, that there was no fixed rule. Where the Visitors could not afford to pay their own expenses, they were defrayed out of this appropriation, but in many cases they were not paid for.

Mr. BARNY stated the facts as they occurred when he visited the institution. The Visitors were allowed the actual expenses of their journey. Such of them as were members of Congress were not allowed their rates of mileage as members. To refuse to pay the actual travelling expenses of such Visitors as were in slender circumstances, would exclude a very valuable class of citizens, particularly the professors in most of our colleges, who could not afford to come from a great distance at their own charges.

Mr. WICKLIFFE remarked that it was possible the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. KREMER,) (and not Mr. BARNY, from Maryland, as reported,) was mistaken in the opinion he had expressed, that this Board of Visitors was totally useless. Without intending to express any opinion himself upon the valuable results of the Boards, which have heretofore inspected and reported upon the nature and character of the course of instruction which was pursued in the Military Academy, he would content himself by a single reference to the report of the late Board, laid upon our tables at the present session. If it be not important in reference to the course of military instruction of our officers, its importance in teaching them the use of our language in a rhetorical flourish, may not be questioned.

[Here Mr. WICKLIFFE read from the report the following :

"Engineering, in its two departments, particularly in its civil features, is of importance to every country, and to none more than to our own. The importance of scientific education to the engineer is evident : for, to material substances, his thoughts and meditations must be directed. Hence, it is of importance to become familiar with the laws prescribed by nature for their action. He must grapple with his agents, and foresee their effects, calculate their energies, and become, as it were, the dictator of their actions. Nature must be forced into a bond of alliance with his views. He must interrogate her on her modes of action, study the laws by which she governs, enter into the recesses of her hidden processes, arrest her in the act of operation, and enter on his own labors with possession of her secrets.]"

Sir, who will say this sentence alone is not worth the sum proposed, with which to fill the blank ?

Mr. KREMER declared that his views were in no way altered. He believed that the reports were prepared for the Visitors beforehand, and all they had to do was to sign ; and appealed to every Visitor to say if such was not the case.

Mr. VANCE repelled the insinuation with much indignation. It was false in point of fact. The Board was usually constituted partly of scientific and partly of practical men. That portion of them who were possessed of scientific and literary attainments, were, of course, selected to draw up the report. Mr. V. said he had been prepared to expect that the report of the last year would receive the sarcasm and the taunts of certain men on this floor. Though he had been appointed to preside on that occasion, he believed he might say, and the House would bear him out in the assertion, that he was as unpretending as any member of the House. Gentlemen knew how he had attained what education he did possess, and he was as sensible as they could be, that it would have been a burlesque for him to pretend to draw up that report. But it was a foul calumny, to say that the report was prepared and drawn up for the committee.

[Mr. KREMER explained by saying, that he only meant that the report was not drawn up by the chairman.]

Mr. VANCE resumed. As it had been customary always to put upon that Board one of the Military Committee of this House, he had last year been appointed to that duty, and this had drawn out the taunts of a certain set of men in this House. But when an individual, who was now Governor of Tennessee, and whose literary and scientific attainments did not greatly exceed his own, had presided in that Board and signed its report, all was suffered to pass very quietly. The gentleman now at the head of the Military Committee (Mr. HAMILTON) had likewise once presided, but even he had not drawn up the report which he signed. But no sooner did he (Mr. V.) fill that place, than he was sneeringly reflected upon, as if he had wished to palm himself upon the public as the author of that report. He was above any such meanness.

Mr. JENKINS said he was far from wishing to derogate from the merits of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE.) He viewed him as belonging to that class of practical men, among whom he had understood him as placing himself. Such men, in company with others of a literary and scientific character, ought to be appointed. But this had not always been the case. He believed some had been appointed to this duty, who never could demonstrate a proposition in Euclid. He should vote for such an appropriation with much reluctance. But he would not withhold the public money from such uses as would really give the public an interest in the character of this institution.

Mr. BUCK went into a history of the West Point Academy, from its earliest origin, when the corps of Artillerists and Engineers were first separated. The officers of the latter corps then constituted the Academy, and there were no cadets, and no salaried professors. He then traced the gradual introduction of cadets, first two in a company, doing duty in the ranks, increasing from 60, till, in 1809, they amounted to 80 ; and, at the close of the late war, their number was augmented to 250. The institution had then been entirely reorganized. The course of instruction altered and enlarged, and, since that time, a Board of Visitors appointed. He admitted the high character of the persons usually selected to compose this Board, but could see no useful result from their appointment. It entailed an unnecessary expense upon the nation, and he therefore resisted the present appropriation.

Mr. MALLARY took the opposite side, insisting upon the advantages of this visitation, as tending to preserve the school from those abuses to which every human institution was more or less liable. It guarded the rights of poor and friendless students, and preserved them from oppression. It greatly stimulated the ambition of the young men to excel in their studies. It spread a knowledge of their respective standing throughout the Union, and gave the public mind a stronger interest in the welfare of this valuable institution. Those who now conducted the school were the very last whom he would suspect of any thing like injustice or mal-practice. But, it was wrong, in itself, to leave any great public seminary without supervision and control. Besides the moral effect of such a visitation, the Board ex-exercised an inspection over the pecuniary expenditures of the institution, as well as over its general police and the comforts and accommodations of the students.

Mr. PEARCE expressed his regret at the course of the debate, and especial surprise at the source from which some of the objections had proceeded. The gentleman who objected to the course of visitation, (Mr. BUCK,) had, if he mistook not, been once himself an alumnus of that institution, but had not graduated there. Mr. P. traced the institution of the military school from its conception by Mr. Jefferson, through the succeeding Administrations, until it received the assiduous and fostering care of the gentleman who is now Vice President of the United States, on whom he passed some very handsome compliments for his zeal in its behalf. He dwelt on the necessity and advantage of a system of visitation, and taking it for granted that a Board ought to be appointed annually for that purpose, he insisted on the impropriety of taking them from a single portion of the United States, in the immediate neighborhood of the school, but urged the propriety of collecting them from every part of the United States. If this principle was adopted, he thought that the sum of $3,000, as reported from the estimates in the War Department, would be barely sufficient to pay their travelling expenses. He contradicted the statement of Mr. KREMER, that a report was prepared for the Board to sign. The Visitors were divided into classes. A part of the report assigned to each class; their several productions afterwards brought together, and, by some leading member of the Board, selected for the purpose, reduced into a general report. Such had been the process when he attended. The report was drafted by the Professor of Modern Languages in Cambridge University. Mr. P. concluded by moving to fill the blank with 8,000 dollars.

Mr. DWIGHT rose to correct the mistaken views of his friend from Vermont, (Mr. BUCK.) He denied that the Seminary had grown up by mere military legislation, and referred to the several acts of Congress by which it had been founded, and from time to time enlarged. The present expenditure for the travelling expenses of the Board of Visitors was a mere regulation of the Department, and did not rest on any law; and, as the appointment to a seat in the Board of Visitors was an honorary appointment, and, as such, highly valued, he thought it would be sufficient if a sum was provided to cover the expenses of gentlemen while in actual attendance at the institution.

In reply to some remarks of Mr. WREMS, Mr. BUCK repeated, and explained some of his former statements. In reply to the remarks of Mr. PEARCE, who, he said, seemed to have recurred with some interest to a portion of his biography, he stated, that, after he had left college, he had resided for 16 months at West Point, during which time, he had applied the knowledge he had acquired in his collegiate course to the military studies at that school. It was true, he did not graduate there, because he had received a commission in the infantry, in which corps he had served to the close of the late war, when he retired to private life.

Mr. WREMS professed himself satisfied with this explanation, and wished he could say the same in relation to the speech of Mr. MALLARY, who seemed to think that the benefits of the Military School were bestowed chiefly upon indigent young men of genius. If he thought that, he would willingly vote three times as much as was now asked.

Mr. HALL said, as it seemed to be the understanding of the gentleman, that every one on the floor was to occupy his share of the time of the House, he should avail himself of the same privilege. He objected to the Board of Visitors, on account of the pride, pomp, and circumstance, which attended their visitations. He was opposed to the school as extending the Executive patronage—educating the children of gentlemen in both branches of Congress—sending into the States the mere creatures of the General Government, who could not sympathize with State rights, nor follow leaders appointed by State authority—leaving too much to Executive discretion—excluding poor and meritorious students—giving a preference to the aristocracy of the country—usurping to itself the patronage of the Government, in preference to institutions not of a military character; and finally, as endangering the liberty of the country, by aiding the cause of consolidation.

Mr. McDUFFIE, declaring it to be his opinion that nine-tenths of the members of this House were in favor of the Academy, conjured its friends not to prolong the debate by entering into its defence.

Mr. BURGESS made a short speech, going principally to repel the charge that poor students were excluded. He stated several instances to the contrary, and argued to show, that, unless the children of the rich were paid the same as others, a degrading line of distinction would be introduced in the school, more injurious to the poor students than any other feature in its management. He thought the travelling expenses of the Visitors ought to be paid—otherwise, the inhabitants of distant States would not be put on the same footing with those in the vicinity of the institution—gentlemen could go with perfect ease and comfort from Rhode Island to West Point, for $5. But what would be the expense of gentlemen attending from New Orleans? If the visitation should be abolished, the finest stimulus would be abolished that ever was applied to youthful ambition.

The cry for the question was now loud from every part of the House.

The question was taken on filling the blank with $3,000, as proposed by Mr. PEARCE, and decided in the negative—ayes 46, noes 107.

Military Appropriations—West Point and its Visitors.

[H. OF R.]

The question was taken on filling the blank with $1,500, as moved by Mr. McDUFFIE, and decided in the affirmative, ayes 97.

Mr. INGHAM moved an amendment, going to confine the expenditure of this sum to the expenses of the Visitors while in actual attendance at West Point; but before any question was taken on this amendment, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, the committee rose.

MONDAY, February 18.

Military Appropriations—West Point and its Visitors.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in the chair.

The consideration of the bill making appropriations for the military service was resumed; and the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. INGHAM, which went to the appropriation of $1,500 for the expenses of the Board of Visitors of the Military Academy at West Point, and to their subsistence while in actual attendance:

Mr. INGHAM briefly explained the amendment. There were but two parts of the expenses of these Visitors, viz: their travelling expenses while coming and returning to and from the Academy, and the expense of their subsistence while there. It had been settled, as he understood, that this money was not to be applied to their travelling expenses. Of course, it must be for their subsistence while in attendance at the school.

Mr. STRONG opposed the amendment, as he believed that their travelling expenses ought to be paid as well as their expenses while at the school.

Mr. INGHAM replied, that the Committee of Ways and Means had stricken out one-half the sum, estimated by the Department, as sufficient to cover the whole expense of travelling and subsistence. This had been done on the ground, as he understood it, that the travelling expenses were not to be paid. If $1,500 were sufficient to pay the whole, the Department must have made a great mistake in estimating them at $3,000.

Mr. EVERETT was opposed to the amendment. He could see no reason why the travelling expenses of these Visitors ought not to be defrayed. He had himself once had the honor of serving on that Board, and had never been engaged in a more arduous service. The Visitors were hard at work from morning till evening, and that at a season when severe application was the most unwelcome. The duty involved a great sacrifice of time as well as of labor, and he could not conceive why the Government should ask of a citizen to spend three weeks of his time at West Point, for no public advantage, but merely for the public good, and then, in addition, call on him to pay his own expenses while thus going on a public errand.

Be the sum great or small, which is requisite to defray this charge, he would vote it with cheerfulness. Of all the apparatus in that valuable institution, there was none of greater importance to its success, than this attendance of the Board of Visitors. They did not, perhaps, impart any great light to the members of the institution; but this sort of supervision was all-important to its welfare, and constituted, indeed, one great advantage which distinguished that school from others. The want of such a Board of Visitors constituted the great deficiency in most of our institutions for education. There was little temptation for gentlemen to go there. The service was attended with much fatigue, and no very great honor or distinction; and why private individuals should be asked by the Government, or even by the people, to do their business for nothing, he did not perceive. He put it to the candor of gentlemen to say, whether such a requirement was reasonable.

Mr. WHITZ said, some remarks had been made on Friday, in the debate on the appropriation for a Board of Visitors to attend the examination at the Military Academy, which required some notice from him, as he had once had the honor to be there in that capacity. It had been broadly asserted that this Board of Visitors was created by the Secretary of War, very lately, without authority of law, or precedent. Such was not the fact. The Rules and Articles of War, enacted by Congress, for the government of the Army and Military establishment of the country, in all its branches, conferred on the Secretary of War the power to make regulations for the government of the Military Academy at West Point, and the Secretary under the last Administration made a judicious system of rules for that object, and, among others, the one that he would read. [Here Mr. W. read an article of the regulations for the government of the Military Academy, making it the duty of the Secretary of War to appoint Visitors, annually, to attend the examination, and prescribing their duties, &c.] It followed, necessarily, that this was a regulation made in pursuance of an authority given by law, and in pursuance of its provisions, which regulation had been printed, laid before Congress, and sanctioned from year to year until this time; and it was due to the present Secretary to say, he was only acting upon a system proposed by his predecessor, Mr. Calhoun, and, so far, sanctioned by Congress. There was, therefore, no ground for the assertions, inconsiderately made, that this was an illegal exercise of power. Mr. W. said he would make one other remark. At the time he was a member of that Board, its business was divided among its members, in committees, who examined the various departments, without being at all influenced by the Academic Staff; and, after a thorough examination, each committee reported, which report was incorporated in a general one, and the special report was also, in some instances, sent. On the occasion in which he was Chairman of the Committee on Civil Economy, that report, made by himself, was sent; and if any one said, or insinuated, that the special or general report on that occasion was written by, or in consultation with, the Academic branch, it was entirely without foundation. Mr. W. said he did not like to engage in any debate not immediately connected with the interests of Florida, but this much he considered due to the Secretary of War, and to himself.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he rose, more for the purpose of expressing the reason why he should vote for the smaller sum reported by the committee, which he believed was $1,500, in preference to the larger sum, which had been asked by the Department. He would take occasion to say, that he was altogether opposed to the amendment immediately under consideration, which restricted the expenditure of the appropriation exclusively to the subsistence of the Board of Visitors at West Point, without making any allowance for their travelling expenses. He fully concurred with his honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) with whom he had the gratification of serving on the Board of Visitors, three years ago, that those who attended at West Point, in this capacity, were fully entitled to their travelling expenses, and he believed that not one cent more was ever received. He admitted that $1,500 would not pay the travelling expenses and the subsistence, while at the Point, of so large a Board as had been usually convened. It would pay all the expenses of a Board, consisting of from six to nine persons, which he (Mr. H.) thought sufficiently large; indeed he had intended moving a resolution, for the Committee on Military Affairs to report a definite plan for the organization of this Board, with some specification of their duties, and an enumeration of such expenses as should be allowed for travelling and subsistence, as well as a proviso limiting their number. The Board itself, he considered of indispensable value; visitorial bodies, of an analogous character, were considered essentially necessary in all learned institutions, and he believed, in the very foundation of many on the other side of the water, provision was made for them, and that they practically existed in almost all the seminaries in our own country. There could not be conceived an institution, where an examination, at stated periods, of its actual condition, and its means of requiting the public bounty, by meeting the public expectations in its results, than that of West Point. The Superintendent and Faculty have not only the most critical duties, literary, scientific, and professional, to discharge, but they have confided to their care the moral culture and the formation of the character, of an interesting portion of the youth of our country. It is surely of vast importance, that the manner in which these offices are discharged to the country should be vouched through respectable and responsible organs; and he thought that the testimony thus procured, not only in its influence on the institution, but as a satisfaction to the country, was certainly worth securing, if it could be accomplished at so trifling a cost as $1,500. He regretted the course the debate had taken. When the House was in Committee of the Whole on Friday last, and had this item under consideration, it was certainly a matter of small criticism, indeed, for them to be discussing, who did and who did not write the reports; whether the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANCE) wrote the report prefixed to his name, was very unimportant, as he (Mr. H.) was certain of the fact, that this gentleman had discharged his duties in an honorable, faithful, and intelligent manner, of which he required no other assurance, than what he knew of that gentleman as his colleague, on the committee to which they both belonged. It was not necessary that every member of this Board should possess high scientific acquirements; it was sufficient that some of them should possess these qualifications, and that others, to sound practical sense, should add an acquaintance with military details and the business of life: and that all should furnish, in the integrity of their own characters, a guarantee for the fidelity of their report. The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) has made it a matter of grave criticism, whether he (Mr. H.) actually wrote a report, as President of the Board of Visitors, to which his (Mr. H.'s) name is appended; and all the credit of this document, if any belongs to it, he has imputed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) whose services on the Board were undoubtedly of the most interesting and valuable character. This conjecture of the gentleman from Rhode Island he did not impute to a notion, that, he believed, nevertheless, was common in the part of the country from which he came, that nobody could write, out of New England; but, since it was made a matter of serious inquisition, he would tell, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the history of the progress and ultimate formation of this report. After the Board had completed its examination, it appointed sub-committees, for the purpose of reporting upon its specific heads; that his honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) and Mr. Bancroft, a gentleman scarcely less distinguished in the literature of his own State, were appointed to report on the course of instruction in the languages and mathematics, to which they both contributed an interesting memoir on the method of instruction. He believed, in the mathematical branch of their sub-report, they were assisted by a summary of the mathematical problems which had been solved by the cadets, from the memoranda of Professor Dewey, a distinguished mathematician, who resided in the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts on his left, (Mr. DWIGHT.) To Mr. Skinner, the able editor of the American Farmer, and some other members of the Board, was confided the duty of reporting on what might be termed the civil economy and civil police of the institution. To Colonel Eustis, Colonel Walbach, and himself, (Mr. H.,) was assigned the office of reporting upon the method of instruction in military tactics proper, with the duties of troops in camp and on marches, and on castrametation and strategy, and in reference to the military discipline of the institution generally. With the able assistance of these two gentlemen, he (Mr. H.) had prepared that part of the report appertaining to these subjects. These separate reports of the sub-committees, with scarcely any, even verbal alterations, were incorporated into the general report, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) Mr. H. said he had made this statement with the less reluctance, as it enabled him to rebut an insinuation, which was unkindly made the other day, that the Faculty at West Point prepared these reports for the Board of Visitors—a declaration altogether erroneous and unjust, as the report to which he referred was made without the slightest communication with the Superintendent or Professors. He would now say a single word, before he concluded, in reference to the compensation which the members of the Board received for their attendance at West Point, and he could not do this more effectually, than by stating what he had received himself, and the labors he underwent, he could not say performed. He received an invitation, whilst in Charleston, from the Secretary of War, to attend the examination on the 1st of June. For his passage from Charleston to New York, by water, and his expenses thence to West Point, he received thirty-five dollars, and the quartermaster paid him a similar sum for his expenses on his return home.

In pocketing this enormous amount, he confessed he had no very alarming twinges of conscience. The Board met at 5 o'clock, A. M., and sat until 8; they met again at 9, and sat until 2 P. M.—convened at 8 and adjourned at 7. After this laborious confinement, he confessed that the appetite with which he ate his meals, was not affected by the reflection that it was the public food—as he believed he had honestly earned it, as he did his present compensation. He could not say that he understood every thing that he saw and heard; for he did not profess to be a master of the complex and abstract relations of the higher mathematics, but he trusted that, within the scope of a very plain understanding, he had observed enough of the prosperity and admirable progress of this noble institution, to authorize his putting his hand to the report, which he had done. He never had been engaged in an avocation more laborious, or in a duty more satisfactory; and if he left the institution with any impression stronger than the absolute conviction of its inestimable usefulness to the country, it was this: that its annual examination, by intelligent and respectable men, was an essential auxiliary to its future success and prosperity.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. INGHAM, and negatived without a division.

Mr. BASSETT then moved to strike out the whole item. He had no question as to the importance and value of the Board of Visitors. His objections to this appropriation arose from an entirely different principle. He had been greatly surprised by the course of argument when this subject was last up. It had been but a few days since, the House almost unanimously passed a resolution declaring that it was necessary to examine into the public abuses. But, when he compared the arguments on that occasion, with those employed on this appropriation, he felt greatly astonished, and could hardly believe that he was in the same region. Talk of abuses? and as soon as you are presented with a barefaced abuse, to turn round and justify it! Am I not justified, said Mr. B., in calling this an abuse? that the duties performed may be very valuable, I do not dispute; but will you sanction, in the Executive branch of this Government, the power to appoint persons—prescribe their duties, and pay for their performance, without the sanction of legislative enactment? Is not the constitution plainly against it, as well as all the arguments used by gentlemen on the other side? Here is an appointing power without limit, as to the extent of time or the number of persons, and the whole Treasury is thrown open for their payment. Gentlemen tell us, indeed, that the Executive discretion will limit all this. I ask, does the constitution admit it? or can language more plainly forbid it than does that instrument? The gentleman from Florida, indeed, read, with some exultation, what he considered as definitive authority on this subject; and what was his authority? The army regulations: and by whom were these enacted? By Congress? No: by the War Department. I admit the arrangement to be an excellent one; but, be it ever so good, it is one which devolves on us; the duty is ours; and it is our shame and reproach that we have not done it before. But let us now do our duty, though it be at a late hour. Let us not use the abuses of the past, as a mantle to cover abuses for the future. Let us have a Board of Visitors; but let that Board exist by law, and let the law fix and authorize their compensation. The danger of the principle on which the matter now stood, was plainly illustrated by the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY,) who said that it was important that a knowledge of this institution, and of the progress and relative standing of the cadets, should be disseminated through the nation. On this principle, I suppose we shall hear that one member of the Visiting Board must be taken from every State in the Union; and as the Executive may go to the ultimate of its discretion, very possibly they may require two members from the larger States: see, then, to what a body this Board may grow. A gentleman from Massachusetts, with more of liberality than had been exhibited by some others, had admitted that there should be a limit fixed, and contended that this limit is established by the appropriation. But I confess that I see no limit at all. We have given the Department $1,500, while, before, they had nothing; and they still have the same contingent fund within their grasp as they had before. The same gentleman has said, that we ought to pay the expense of the Visitors only while they are in actual attendance at West Point. But, take the doctrine of the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, for our principle, and where is our limit then? That gentleman tells you that, if the Executive has made a contract, and a work has been performed under it, the House is bound to make the appropriation. If so, it is nonsense to talk about limiting the Executive. He has no limit whatever as to the States whence the Visitors are to be taken, the length of time they are to serve, the number of the Board, or the compensation they are to receive. All this may be embraced in a law. If the Executive wished for such power, he might have recommended the subject to the Legislature, and obtained it in a regular manner. The regulation read by the gentleman from Florida, said, that the Board was to consist of not less than five members. But the number has already grown to 11, 12, and sometimes to 14 members. I hope the House will either agree to reject the doctrine of limiting the Executive, or reject this item of the bill, and that we shall not take up a doctrine one day, and lay it down the next, just as may suit gentlemen's temporary convenience. We have been told that it belongs to an appropriation bill merely to provide the means of carrying into effect pre-existing laws. But here, no law is so much as pretended. But we are called upon to sanction, by a side-wind, a lawless assumption of power by the Executive. One word more, and I have done. We are all sensible of the extent of the Executive patronage, and it seems generally agreed that that patronage ought not to be extended without urgent necessity. Now, there is no form in which it exists, which strikes me so unfavorably as this. All have declared that no man, while a member of this House, can receive and hold any Executive appointment; but here is a case in the very teeth of that declaration; he receives an appointment which, if not of honor and profit, is at least complimentary in its character, while he retains a seat here: and though we now propose to allow only his expenses, yet there is no limit nor safeguard. The same principle would authorize the enlargement of the emoluments to any extent. To such a principle I can never lend my sanction.

The motion of Mr. BASSETT was rejected.

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department, for 1828. That bill having been taken up,

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to insert, after the above amendment, the following:

"For aiding the emigration of the Creek Indians, providing for them for the period of twelve months, after their emigration, and for rendering them such assistance as the President of the United States may think proper, in their agricultural operations, $50,000.

"For enabling the President of the United States to extinguish the title of the Cherokee Indians to any lands in the State of Georgia, where it can be done upon 'peaceable and reasonable terms,' and for aiding the said Cherokees, and such other Indians, as may be so disposed, to emigrate to places west of the Mississippi, $50,000."

Mr. McD. said, that the War Department had asked a large sum for this object; that the Committee of Ways and Means, not feeling competent to decide, had moved to be discharged from the consideration of this part of the subject, and, at their request, it had been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; that committee had reported on the subject, recommending the sum now in the bill, and, on their recommendation, it had been inserted. He believed the appropriation to be a perfectly proper one, and hoped it would prevail.

Mr. HAILE inquired if the Chickasaws were included in the amendment?

The Chair replied that they were virtually included in the words "all such other Indians," which immediately followed.

Mr. HAILE then moved to insert the word "Chickasaws" immediately after the word Cherokees.

Mr. McLEAN (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) said he could see no need of inserting this word—a bill had been prepared and reported by the Indian Committee to provide aid for the removal of the Chickasaws, and would soon come up in order.

Mr. HAILE replied, that his State was vitally interested in this matter. He thought that the Committee on Indian Affairs had done her great injustice in excluding her from the appropriation bill. That was a bill that always passed. The private bill to which the gentleman had alluded might not, and probably would not, be reached during the session; and he should like to know why a distinction was to be made in favor of the Creeks and Cherokees, when no agent had been sent among them; while the Chickasaws, to whom an agent had been sent, and who had expressed their willingness to remove, were excluded from the bill. Other States and Territories could be aided, and the Treasury exhausted to relieve them from the burden of their Indian population; but his State, in which an Indian country, of 150 miles in extent, separated an entire county, with all its inhabitants, from the residue of the white population, was to be neglected, although her Representative had been the very first to move a consideration of this subject. This he considered as great injustice.

Mr. LUMPKIN observed, in reply, that this subject had early been brought before the Committee on Indian Affairs. They had given a prompt and serious attention to it, and there now lies on the table of the House a bill prepared and reported by them for the very object the gentleman from Mississippi had in view. But, in this case, he saw verified that ancient declaration, that the last shall be first, and the first shall be last. The appropriation bill providing for the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees had brought that subject first in order. But he trusted that, if the gentleman would exercise a little patience, the subject he had so much at heart would come up in its turn, when he promised that gentleman he should find him (Mr. L.) disposed to act with the utmost liberality, and to promote his views, as far as it was in his power. But, to lug in that subject at present, could only defeat other objects, and take $15,000 or $20,000 from an appropriation already, if any thing, too small.

Mr. HAILE replied, and remonstrated. He had moved a resolution respecting the removal of the Chickasaws. The gentleman from Georgia had introduced the Creeks into his resolution, and then the Cherokees, and the gentleman from Florida brought in the Seminoles. He had entreated the gentleman not to embarrass his motion in this manner. But, embarrassed as it was, it went to the Indian Committee. That committee had taken up the Creeks and Cherokees, and sent them to be provided for by the Committee of Ways and Means, leaving the Chickasaws, who were the first-named in the resolution, to the precarious hope of coming in afterwards, by a separate bill. In this he thought they had done him very great injustice. That committee had no right thus to separate the tribes. If any went into an appropriation bill, the Chickasaws should have gone first. He had expected some little liberality from the gentlemen from Georgia, but they had crowded down his resolution, and then left him out. He perceived that a man could expect little from his friends in this House. He was resolved, for the future, to rely upon the liberality of no man. He demanded nothing but justice, and that House should ring with his voice till he obtained it.

Mr. HAYNES said, that this difficulty could easily be reconciled. Let the amendment of the gentleman be adopted, and the sum appropriated be proportionably increased. He thought there was a propriety in including all the southern Indians, as the same policy applied to them all.

Mr. HOFFMAN had no desire to interfere in a matter of this kind, but he was one of those who believed that the United States Government is bound to take the earliest opportunity of extinguishing the Indian title to lands in Georgia; and he desired the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to state whether that was not the object intended to be provided for in this appropriation.

Mr. McLEAN replied in the affirmative.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied, if that was the case, he thought there was good reason why the amendment should not be adopted. Every reflecting man must be anxious to see the compact of 1802 fulfilled in good faith. But the Chickasaws were not involved in its provisions, and stood upon an entirely different footing.

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, wished to know whether the provision for the Cherokees was introduced in fulfilment of any treaty with that tribe.

Mr. McLEAN replied, that it had been inserted in conformity with the compact between the United States and Georgia, by which compact it became the duty of the General Government, at all times, to stand in readiness to extinguish the Indian title within that State, so soon as it could be done on reasonable and peaceable terms. The subject to which the gentleman from Mississippi alluded, had been among the very first to which the Committee on Indian Affairs gave their attention; and they had accordingly reported a bill providing for the request of that tribe, that they might be permitted first to examine the land proposed to be given them, before they should decide on relinquishing what they at present possessed. It would be surely improper to provide for extinguishing their title at this time, when it was but a few months ago that they had expressly refused to remove. He was therefore at a loss to know where was the ground for the complaints of injustice so loudly made by the gentleman from Mississippi. The estimates of the Department had been referred to the Indian Committee; their report upon them had been approved by the Committee of Ways and Means; and this last committee had, in consequence, inserted the item in the bill.

Mr. HAILE replied, and insisted upon the ground he had formerly taken. $50,000 had formerly been appropriated in the case of the Creeks, and now $50,000 more are proposed, although the Creeks say positively they will not remove. But the Chickasaws have written a letter to the Governor, signifying their willingness to emigrate, and yet they are to be excluded from the bill. An appropriation in their case, Mr. H. insisted, was the only one from which the Government could derive the least shadow of benefit. He thought a new system of legislation was getting into this House, by which an appropriation bill was made the lever to force measures in favor of one section of the country to the injury of another. He protested against this, and then proceeded again to urge the claims of the Chickasaws.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said he understood this to be a bill regularly reported every year, providing for the ordinary annual expenses of the Indian Department. If special objects were to be provided for, special appropriations ought to be made to meet them; and if such an object as was contemplated by the amendment, was to be brought into this bill, all other special objects might as well be brought into it. In addition to this, something might be said on the question where the Government meant to invite these Indians to settle. He was aware that it would not be in order to discuss that question at this time. One objection to the amendment was this, that it gave unlimited authority to the officer at the head of the War Department, to give direction to the march of this tribe when it should remove. It either allowed him a boundless discretion, or else it was a barren appropriation, effecting nothing. When the bill which had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs should come up, the whole subject would be open for discussion; but, at present, such an appropriation would be perfectly anomalous in a regular annual appropriation bill for the Indian Department. It was well known, that the regular expenses of that Department amounted to less than the irregular expenses of it—the former amounted to about $80,000, while the fund for contingencies was $95,000.

Mr. B. said he could not vote understandingly in this matter, unless he had the means of inquiring further into it. He would go heart and hand with the gentleman, if the Indians were troublesome neighbors, and they wished to get rid of them, provided this could be done without injuring other people. The bill says, "to emigrate west of the Mississippi." Now it was not the first time that Indians had been brought from other parts of the country, and placed down in the bosom and very heart of the State from which he came. Here he enumerated the Kickapoos, Weas, and several other tribes, who had thus been removed. He said his constituents, many of them, lived, to be sure, in the woods, and were on the borders of the republic—but still they had some desire to improve their situation, as well as other people—and they did not wish to have a body of Indians placed down in the midst of them by their Government, and still less, if the power to do this was to be exercised by a sub-agent of the War Department. If once the promise was given to the Indians, although by an unauthorized agent, they would count upon its fulfillment. They knew none of our distinctions as to authorized and unauthorized officers of the Government, and if the promise was not fulfilled, their sense of justice and good faith was shocked. The gentleman from Mississippi, however, need fear no opposition from him, with respect to the removal of his Chickasaws, if he would only act on the good old maxim, so use your own as not to injure others. Mr. B. concluded by saying he should vote against all propositions like that now moved.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that, in justice to the Committee on Indian Affairs, it was proper to state, that, if any complaint at all was made in this matter, it should be against the Committee of Ways and Means. The item came from that committee in the same manner as every other item in the bill. It was not the Committee of Indian Affairs that had placed it there. They had only reported in favor of a measure which appeared to them expedient and proper. He hoped the House would not go into a general discussion of all our Indian affairs on the present bill. It was very evident that gentlemen in all parts of the House were alive to the subject, and it must be acknowledged, that it was one attended with extreme difficulty at all times. Mr. S. said he had himself had many and great difficulties to surmount in assenting to the appropriation already agreed to, and he hoped that, in a mere incidental debate, the general policy of the removal of the Indians would not have to be taken up and decided. It had forced itself on his observation, since he had been a member of this House, as a great evil in the mode of its legislation, that subjects of the greatest weight were forced upon the House in the most unexpected manner, by mere incidental motions. The consequence was, that they were discussed when gentlemen were not fully prepared for them, and hours and days were wasted on questions not properly connected with the main subject before the House. There were special reasons applying to the case of the Creeks and Cherokees, which did not apply to the other Indian tribes. If the Chickasaws were introduced, all the other Indians would have to follow, because gentlemen stood ready to introduce them, to whose States they were as great an annoyance as the Chickasaws were to the State of Mississippi. The same argument would be urged in every case, and there would be no end to the amendments. He hoped, therefore, that now proposed, would not prevail.

Mr. WHITE should only detain the committee a few minutes at this late hour of the day. If there was any merit in having the subject first proposed in the House, the gentleman from Mississippi would do him the justice to say, that his was the second proposition on this subject, having been moved as an amendment to the resolution of that gentleman, referred to in debate, and which would have been moved in a separate form, if it had not been adopted in conjunction with that. This, said Mr. W., is a subject of deep interest to the Territory I represent; and, if the amendment now proposed, be adopted, I shall feel myself bound to move to insert in this bill the Florida Indians. I do not wish to embarrass the amendment of the member from Mississippi, but he must perceive that the success of his motion will leave me in a worse situation than the one in which he is placed. The bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, provides an appropriation for the purpose of enabling "the Chicka-and other Indians," to explore the country west of the Mississippi. Now, sir, I understand that the "other Indians" in the bill, are those which are the annoyance of my constituents; and, if the Chickasaws are now included in this bill, I shall be without a "loop to hang a hope upon;" and I now give notice, that, if this succeeds, I will not depend on the remote hope of reaching the other bill, but also move my amendment. I cannot concur with the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE,) that this is not the time or place to discuss this subject. The subject now under consideration, as legitimately belongs to this bill, as the proposed appropriation for the Creeks and Cherokees. Where is the difference? The member from Maine, who is a constituent member of the Committee of Ways and Means, says this subject comes from the War Department, has been sanctioned by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is contained in a certain convention between Georgia and the United States. Now, sir, I tell that gentlemen, that the subject of the removal of the Florida and Chickasaw Indians also comes from the War Department, under grave recommendations, and has also met the favorable consideration of the Standing Committee of this House, to whom the subject appropriately belongs. So far the parallel is complete: and, as to the convention with Georgia, I cannot agree that, on that account, one shall be placed in a regular appropriation bill, and the other left to the uncertainty of its fate, at a session that promises so little. I ardently hope that Georgia may succeed in having her convention executed to the letter and spirit. But, sir, the obligations of humanity, and the imperative dictates of sound policy, impose as strong an injunction on this Government to provide for the removal of the Florida Indians, as any compact or convention can require. The miserable condition of these people has been presented to you, by your own officers, in a language not soon to be forgotten. You have been told that they cannot subsist within their present assigned limits, and must starve, or plunder their neighbors. An appropriation has been made by Congress to feed them; re-examinations ordered by the Secretary of War, and a return again made by General Gaines, that they cannot live within their limits. A very respectable and highly distinguished officer, Colonel Clinch, of the 4th regiment of infantry, attended General Gaines on the last examination, and he concurs in the opinion that they must steal or starve. Now, sir, the claims of Georgia may be strong, but how can we, looking to the humanity and policy of our Government, and, moreover, referring to the certainty of future collision, which must be attended with the loss of blood and treasure, and demands for indemnity, refuse to place the two objects on the same footing? If this motion was to add the appropriation of $15,000, reported for our object, to that in this bill, and include the Chickasaw and Florida

Indians, I should be glad to see it carried; but, in its present form, I am opposed to it, without including ours. I can inform the gentleman from Missouri, that it is not contemplated to locate the Indians within his State, but west of it, and north of Arkansas, and upon lands to which the United States have an undisputed title, not within the limits of any State or Territory.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he perceived the subject was misunderstood, and this could arise only from a want of attention on the part of the House. He was aware that this was not the time for a general discussion of our Indian affairs. He thought the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BATES) were well worthy of attention. But he thought this was not the time or place for considering it. Mr. L. said he would endeavor to point out the distinction between the cases of the Creeks and Cherokees, and that of the Chickasaws and other tribes. The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, and which provides for the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, had been introduced in consequence of the estimates received from the War Department, in relation to that subject. When those estimates came into the House, they were referred, as of course, to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee very properly moved for their reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs. This latter committee had carefully examined the estimates, and had reported favorably upon the subject. It was then sent back to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. L. said, that, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, he had expected this item to be provided for in a separate bill, but the Committee of Ways and Means had thought otherwise, and had concluded to provide for it in the present appropriation bill. Now the distinction which gave a preference to the Creeks and Cherokees was, that a treaty had already been made with the Creeks, which could not be fulfilled, without a part of this appropriation, and the residue was equally necessary to enable the Government to fulfil its compact with Georgia, in relation to the Cherokees. No such treaty or compact applied to the other tribes. It was the understanding of the committee that the application of this sum depended on the free consent of the Indians; neither force nor favor was to be made use of; if their removal could be effected on such terms, it was well; if not, the means appropriated would remain in the hands of the Government. But without the appropriation, it was impossible that the Government could fulfil its compact with Georgia. Mr. L. said he would not enter, at this time, on the subject of the claims of that State. He knew the impressions which many gentlemen had received in relation to them. But, whatever warmth was charged upon her Government, by those who had misrepresented her motives, when the truth was fully known, it would appear, that, so far from being chargeable with urging unwarrantable demands, her forbearance on this subject had been without a parallel. She had waited for twenty-five years for the fulfilment of the contract made by the General Government, and she had witnessed, during that time, the extinction of the Indian title to entire States which had been admitted into the Union. Yet she had continued to wait, until she perceived it to be adopted as a settled policy, that those Indians were to be kept within her limits. He knew that the people and the Government of Georgia had been represented as wishing to bear down these unhappy people, and to treat them with harshness and oppression. Nothing could be farther from the truth, or could do more injustice to the feelings of the people of Georgia. Their pity and solicitude for these wretched tribes, were felt to a degree which could not be expressed. Their removal was never contemplated, or intended as a compulsory measure. They were to remove in a peaceable and voluntary manner, or not at all. The arrangement provided for by the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, appeared to him fair and just. He was equally willing to remove the wretched remnants of these people from all the other States, for he could truly say, that it was among the warmest wishes of his heart, to benefit these poor suffering remnants of the aboriginal race, in a way the most effectual and permanent.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. HALE, and negatived.

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, moved to amend the amendment of Mr. McDUFFIE, by striking out the words "and for aiding the said Cherokees, and such other Indians as may be so disposed, to emigrate to places west of the Mississippi."

This amendment, he thought, would meet the views of both committees, and would, also, remove the difficulty of the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES.) The subject was not a new one. It had been agitated for years, and had been particularly discussed at the last session, at which session a bill had been introduced, similar to that now reported, from the Indian Committee, but had never been called up. If a general course of policy was thus to be introduced and sanctioned by an item in the appropriation bill, that bill might be made an instrument of changing the whole course of the Government. He did not wish to interfere with the obligation of treaties, but he knew of no treaty with the Cherokees which provided for their emigration. He was willing to do all that was necessary to fulfil the compact with the Government of Georgia, but he was not willing to say that it was the settled policy of the Government that those Indians were to be removed. The gentleman from Kentucky had been right, the other day, in saying that there ought to be no treaty with any Indian tribes, unless there had been a previous appropriation; but a different practice had prevailed; and if called upon to make out a list of the sins of this Administration, he would set down, as a prominent item, the sanction which it had given to this system. He was for tying up the hands of the Executive until the House had an opportunity to know what plan was to be pursued. He was against removing the Indians west of the Mississippi, and as far as principle was concerned, he would as soon vote to place them northwest of the Ohio. The subject was one of deep interest to the country. Gentlemen would recollect that his amendment did not touch the sum appropriated, but only a particular application of that sum. If it prevailed, the appropriation would be left for removing the Indians from Georgia. He did not wish to sanction the policy of the Administration in this matter, which he considered as one of their errors. Treaties were made by men invested with almost unlimited discretion, and over whose acts, when once done, this House had little or no control. He would not go farther into the subject, except to state, that, no longer ago than last year, the Government had received a positive refusal from the Chickasaws to emigrate. Since then, an agent has been sent to make his bow, and they had consented so far as to examine the lands.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that the Committee of Ways and Means had not only felt no disposition to give a preference to this provision for the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, but had felt a disposition directly the reverse. The proposition had not originated with them, but came strongly recommended from the War Department. He had, in consequence, been instructed to ask that the Committee of Ways and Means might be discharged from the consideration of the subject, and that it might be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. This last committee had reported upon it, and recommended the appropriation in the very language now inserted in the bill. He could not agree with gentlemen who thought this an improper time to discuss the general policy of removing the remnants of the Indian tribes to the west of the Mississippi. He thought that policy was now fairly before Congress: that if gentlemen meant to discuss it at all, now was the proper time to do so. It had heretofore been the custom to embrace these appropriations for the Indian service in the Military Appropriation Bill. The Committee of Ways and Means had thought it more proper to present them in a separate bill. They were all subjects for fair discussion.

On the general subject of the policy of aiding the emigration of our Indians to the West, he had no hesitation in saying, that he regarded it as the settled policy of this Government. The Executive, under the last, as well as the present Administration, had clearly expressed an opinion in its favor. It was true, Congress had not yet officially expressed such a sentiment. But he believed it to be the settled opinion of a large majority of the House, that the Indians within the limits of our settled States must either be induced to emigrate, or must infallibly sink into a state of indescribable and irretrievable wretchedness. He considered the idea of civilizing and educating them as wholly delusive. The experiment had been tried, and the result had proved, that, while surrounded by the whites, the Indians acquired all the vices of a civilized people, and none of their virtues. He thought the Government ought to make use of all proper and legitimate means to remove them, and he trusted it would be left in the power of the Executive to try the effect of money in inducing them to emigrate.

TUESDAY, February 19.

Emigration of Indians.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department, and the question immediately before the committee being on the motion of Mr. Woods, of Ohio, to amend Mr. McDuffin's amendment, by striking out from it these words: "And for aiding the said Cherokees, and such other Indians as may be so disposed, to emigrate to places west of the Mississippi"—

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said, he had not expected that the question now before the Committee of the Whole, for our consideration, would have been discussed on the general appropriation bill. I did believe, sir, that this question would have been submitted more properly to the consideration of the House, on the bill reported on this subject by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which bill is accompanied by a special report from that committee. But, sir, the House has determined otherwise. The Committee of Ways and Means has reported, as one item in the appropriation bill, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, for the purpose of aiding in the removal of the Cherokees, and such other Indians as may be disposed to emigrate to a section of country west of the Mississippi, with a view to their permanent location forever. This appropriation, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Woods,) proposes to strike out. Hence, sir, as has been correctly remarked by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. McDuffin,) the subject is fairly before the committee at this time; and I admit that it can be of very little importance to the committee at what time the question is met, discussed, and finally decided. The Chair has remarked, that the question on the amendment does not involve or embrace the appropriation to comply with the contract on the part of the United States, with the Creek Indians, under the late treaty with that nation; and, upon this intimation, the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. OWEN,) declined making any remarks on the question before the committee. For my own part, sir, I am not disposed to abandon the discussion of the question before us, because the Creek Indians are not included in terms, as I consider the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as covering the whole ground, and as bringing up for discussion and consideration the past, the present, and the future policy of this Government, in relation to this unfortunate people. Sir, this amendment submits to us, as the Representatives of the people, the important consideration, whether we will continue the same destructive policy which has heretofore been pursued by the United States, or whether a more liberal and humane policy shall be adopted in relation to this people.

Sir, I consider the question now before the committee as one of momentous importance; it is of importance to the character of the United States, and of much greater importance to that most unfortunate and wretched people, that the future policy of the Government, in relation to them, should be marked with justice, humanity, and a magnanimity of purpose, that will atone, as far as possible, for the great injustice which we have done them. We cannot retrace our steps; we cannot affect the past; we cannot resuscitate or bring to life the thousands of this miserable people, who have wasted away and perished under the influence of our baneful policy. But, sir, we may, and I do most sincerely hope will, profit by the past experience of the nation, in the policy which has been pursued, and in our future legislation on this subject carefully avoid that course of policy which has produced such dire effects.

Sir, I do not address the committee in my place, exclusively as the advocate of the Indians; but I wish to be understood as being the advocate of a just, humane, and magnanimous course towards them, on the part of this Government. No, sir, they have no representative on this floor; they must rely for justice on the philanthropy and humanity of the representatives of that people, who have reduced them to their present wretched situation, and, sir, I feel well satisfied that this committee will not turn a deaf ear to their complaints.

Sir, in order to determine the questions correctly, which arise on this amendment, it is important for us to decide, whether the situation of the Indians is such as to require the interposition of the strong arm of the United States in their behalf, and whether the United States are under any obligation of justice, humanity, morality, or religion, to afford the relief necessary to prevent the total extinction of this people. Sir, let me examine for a moment and see who these Indians now are, and who they once were. Great, very great, have been the vicissitudes in life, which they have been doomed to experience. We cannot shut our eyes against the facts, sir. We found them the lawful occupiers of this vast extent of territory, now circumscribed by the boundaries of the United States. We found them the lords of the soil; we found them a great and powerful nation, or rather a number of nations in the rude state. As individuals, it is true they were emphatically the children of the forest; yet they were, in a degree, prosperous, and, to all appearances, happy; they were possessed of constitutions, which put at defiance the assaults of cold, hunger, thirst, and fatigue. The water from the fountains was their only drink, and the common diseases which are now sweeping away this wretched people, as with the breath of a pestilence, were then unknown to them; the causes which produce the effect now, had not reached them then; I allude, sir, in part, to the introduction of spirituous liquors amongst them, by their white neighbors, of which, most unfortunately for them, they are passionately fond.

Sir, such were these people when we first knew them; what are they now? It does seem, that, from the time of the first settling of our forefathers at James Town, and at Plymouth, the lands of the Indians had been considered as a lawful conquest. A war of extermination from that time, or as soon after as the whites supposed that they had acquired sufficient strength to maintain their conquests, was waged against the aboriginal inhabitants of the country; and it is but a very short time since, that we have stayed the sword of desolation. We have seen their most powerful nations dwindled down to poor wandering tribes, and their greatest kings reduced to beggarly chiefs. We have seen them driven by the whites, from river to river, from State to State, from hill to hill, from mountain to mountain, and from forest to forest; the tide of white emigration still flowing West, and still pressing close upon them; and if we continue the present policy, the time cannot be very far distant, when the last sound of the Indian must die on the Pacific. I am aware, sir, that it is contended by writers of celebrity that a country inhabited as this was belongs to the nation that happens to discover it, and that it is a lawful subject for conquest. But, sir, I cannot subscribe to this doctrine, to such an extent. It is founded on a principle, maintained by arbitrary governments alone, that power gives right. Sir, if my neighbor being the owner of a farm, is not as good a husbandman as I am, if he lets his farm grow up with weeds, briars, and thorns, or even refuses to cut off the timber, shall I, because I have the power, drive him from the possession of his premises, and take possession myself, under the pretext that he did not cultivate his land as it ought to be cultivated?

I know, that, in some instances, formerly, and many instances of latter years, you have pretended to hold treaties with them, and to acquire their lands by contract; but, sir, how has this been done? It has been done nine times out of ten, by bribing their chiefs, and not unfrequently with arms in your hands. What kind of a contract is this when concluded? It is such a one as ought not to be binding on the party thus imposed upon. You had better, yes, ten thousand times better, resort to the law of conquest; for in that case, you could plead the custom of nations as an apology for your wrongs. Your treaties have been not unfrequently held immediately after the most bloody and destructive war to the Indians had terminated in favor of your arms, and as a consideration for the injuries they had done you. With arms in your hands, you take their lands, and restore to them peace; and they retreat further into the wilderness, and are at rest until the eyes of your avarice have again counted the acres of land which they occupy, and added them to the countless acres which you had previously taken from them. Then a new treaty is held, and they are again dispossessed. But, as an excuse for your conduct towards them, it is said that, in some instances, they had inhumanly murdered some of the whites. This is no doubt true; but cannot we find some little excuse for them, although we are not prepared to justify them in the fact, that they have been generally defending their homes—the country that contained the bones of their fathers, and in which they found, at all times, an old associate in every spring, in every running stream, and even in every silent tree that stood near the wigwam or travelling path. Who would not have disputed the occupancy of a country under such circumstances, with any daring intruder?

Sir, it is true, that you have, by some of your treaties, stipulated to pay, and that you actually have paid to the different tribes of Indians, certain annuities, in consideration of lands received from them; and, sir, however much gentlemen may differ from me in opinion, I am constrained to say, that, in my opinion, this is the most destructive policy which you have ever pursued towards them; your annuities are melting them away, like snow under a meridian sun. When they had to rely on their own exertions for procuring a livelihood, they were a reasonably industrious people; they attended to their trapping at the proper season, and, most generally, expended the moneys arising from a sale of their skins, in necessities; but, now, you have held out to them a lure to dissipation and idleness; relying on their annuity, their traps are neglected; they spend their time in idleness and the most abandoned dissipation, and their whole mind is steadfastly bent on getting spirituous liquors. I know there are exceptions to the character which I have described, but they are lamentably rare. There are always men found, where they are surrounded by the whites, base enough to prey upon their wretchedness—the money, the annuity, is a sufficient inducement for such conduct. And yet, sir, there are many honorable men within my own knowledge, who are called Indian traders, who furnish them with the necessities of life, and who would not condescend to such meanness.

Sir, a part of your policy at present is, to send missionaries amongst them. I have no doubt but that they have been of essential service in promoting the present, the future, and eternal welfare of many of these wretched beings; but I have heard some of the most enlightened of them say, that the benefits they are enabled to render, can only be partial, so long as the present policy of the Government is continued in other respects. You might as well attempt to moralize, civilize, or christianize a maniac, as an Indian who has no inducement to reform, and who has it in his power to be daily intoxicated.

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

I have attempted to tell you who these people formerly were; I have endeavored to show who, and what, they now are. Will any gentleman, who is conversant with this subject, say, that the shades of the picture are too highly colored? I think not. Then, sir, these people do stand in great need of the interposition of the strong arm of this Government to relieve them; and this Government is bound, by every tie of humanity, justice, morality, and religion, to do all in her power to save the wreck of this people. Will gentlemen say, that nothing shall be done in this glorious work? Will gentlemen say, that, after being the cause of reducing these people to their present state of wretchedness and misery, we shall fold up our arms and see them perish—see their total extinction—without making one more effort to save them? I feel satisfied, sir, that we shall all agree to do something; but I fear we shall differ so widely as to the modus operandi, as to endanger the major proposition, by the details of the minor. Judging by the motion now pending before the committee, and the remarks that have fallen from gentlemen, there are those in this committee who would be willing to leave the Indians on their present location, and continue, and even increase, the annuities. To such gentlemen I would say, that we have tried this policy long enough, and if we persist in it, the most of the Indians must perish. They feel themselves to be a poor, degraded, outcast, and subordinate race of beings—they have nothing, where they are, to stimulate them—they have no evidence that they will be permitted to continue where they are—they see that the States wish to get rid of them; that they wish to extend their jurisdiction over their soil, and in some recent instances, over their persons. All the respectable missionaries, and all the respectable agents, who are amongst them, the last and the present Administration of the Government, have pointed to the course which the Committee on Indian Affairs has thought proper to adopt, as the only probable remedy, left untried, for their preservation. I know of no better remedy, and I am frank to admit, that I am not entirely certain that this remedy will have the desired effect; but I feel disposed to try it, unless gentlemen can satisfy me that they have a remedy which will prove a more powerful antidote in counteracting the poison which has been infused into the Indians by their general policy. The policy proposed by the committee, and of which this bill is the first step, is to grant to the Indians, and their children, forever, in fee simple, a district of country west of the Mississippi, and beyond the limits of the States, near the Rocky Mountains, sufficiently large to contain, advantageously, all the Indians in the United States, where they will have assurances that they will never be again disturbed by the whites, and where they may be stimulated to advance in civilized life, by forming a constitution and laws for their own Government, and by betaking themselves to industrious pursuits to obtain a livelihood.

It is true, sir, I am not prepared to say that we should use compulsory means to remove the Indians; they should be induced to remove of their own voluntary free will and accord. It is upon this principle that we propose to make the appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars, to enable such as are now willing to remove, to migrate, and such as are not willing, at this time, to send a deputation of their chiefs, warriors, and head men, in company with such commissioners as the President of the United States may appoint, to explore the country, and to satisfy themselves of its fitness for the purposes of their future residence.

It is altogether important that the Indians should be satisfied with the country to which we purpose to transfer them, with their consent; and I know of no way to produce the effect with greater certainty, than by affording them an opportunity of exploring the country, by deputations of their chiefs, warriors, and head men, on whose judgment they can rely, and in whose statements they will place implicit confidence.

I have heard it said on this floor, that we have no lands on which to locate the Indians, were we so disposed; that all the lands will be wanted for the whites. Sir, if we have not now surplus lands within the limits of the United States to exchange for the lands on which the Indians now reside, when, let me ask, shall we have them? Will it be after the tide of emigration has rolled westwardly to the Pacific Ocean? Sir, in my humble opinion, now is the accepted time to commence this great and glorious work. Let us do it, while we have it in our power; and, although we should not succeed to the utmost of our wishes, yet we shall have the gratification of having done all in our power to accomplish it.

Some gentlemen seem to think that the Indians cannot be qualified for self-government, they have not sufficient intellect to perform the duties incident to the government of a nation—that they are too wild and savage in their nature to submit to the laws and regulations necessary to the security of civil society. Sir, I think very differently from gentlemen on this part of the subject. Whenever we have had an opportunity of seeing the expansion of their minds, and the powers of their intellect, we have been compelled to say that they are not inferior in natural powers to the whites. Sir, you have established schools amongst them, for the purpose of educating their youth, under the superintendence of benevolent missionary institutions, and, considering the great difficulties which they have had to encounter, they have furnished most conclusive evidence of the susceptibility of the Indian mind to improvement, in every thing, moral, civil, and religious. While upon this part of my subject, permit me to refer the committee, as an evidence of the qualifications of the more enlightened of the Indians for self-government, to the late constitution formed by the Cherokees for the Government of that nation, within the limits of Georgia. This constitution will apprise gentlemen of two things: first, that the Indians, where they have had an opportunity for improvement, have shown themselves to be entirely susceptible of acquiring a sufficient quantum of knowledge to govern their own concerns; and, secondly, that it is absolutely necessary that the General Government should do all in her power to induce the Indians to remove to a territory beyond the limits of the States. As much as I wish to see the Indians independent, prosperous, and happy, I do not wish to see them establish separate and independent Governments within the boundaries and jurisdiction of the sovereign and independent States, as such a clashing of jurisdiction could not but prove destructive of that feeling of kindness which I wish to see manifested towards them by the whites.

It is not my purpose, sir, at this time, to go into the details of the course to be pursued by the Government, provided this appropriation should pass, and a favorable report should be returned to the next Congress by the commissioners and deputies. It will be time enough to arrange the details at the next session of Congress, when we shall have the additional light of the report before us.

Sir, some gentlemen appear to dread the effects of this policy of concentrating the Indians in one section of the country, supposing that we shall thereby render them more formidable against us, provided they should become hostile to the whites. There may be something in this objection; but I do not apprehend that any serious inconvenience can ever result to the United States from such a concentration. They know that they have felt our power, and they would most carefully avoid giving us cause to exert our power, and direct our arms against them. Besides, I believe the charge of ingratitude cannot be made, with propriety, against the Indians, and I have every reason to believe that they will be grateful to us as their benefactors, should we relieve them. The recollection of past injuries will be buried and forgotten in feelings of gratitude for your philanthropy and kindness. Sir, as an evidence that this feeling of gratitude is not extinct in the Indian breast, I beg leave to relate an anecdote, the truth of which I have no reason to doubt: A short time before the late treaty held with the Miami and Pattawatamie Indians, on the Mississinawa, in the State of Indiana, a Pattawatamie Chief, by the name of Legro, was at Fort Wayne, and being very much intoxicated, he got into some difficulty with the other Indians, and was very much abused by them; in this situation he was found in the street by a little girl, the daughter of a gentleman of that place, who had him taken to her father's kitchen, where she continued to give him nourishment for several days. Before he left, having recovered, he promised to get her a reservation of land at the treaty then shortly to be holden. Accordingly he attended the treaty, and had half a section of land inserted for her, as a donation from the Indians, which the commissioners on the part of the United States ordered to be stricken out; no sooner did the old chief learn from the interpreter that the reservation was stricken out, than he rose indignantly in the Council House, and before his nation required it to be inserted again, stating, that, unless it was done, he would never sign the treaty; that she had been kind to him, and he would remember her. The commissioners were induced, under the circumstances, to permit her name to be reinserted, and she actually received the reservation.

Sir, a remark that fell from the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BATES) on yesterday relative to the removal of the Delaware Indians, made a strong impression on my mind. That gentleman complained that the Delawares are located in the vicinity of Missouri. Is it possible, sir, that, in so few years, the remnant of the Six Nations, who inhabited and owned the country on the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers, and who were so powerful once as to give laws to the whole aboriginal population in the middle section of the country, cannot now find a resting place this side of the Rocky Mountains? That remnant left the State of Indiana, a few years ago, for the West, but I did not know, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman, in what part of that district of country they had stopped. I do hope they may shortly find a resting place, where they will not be again disturbed: they have for years been the warm friends of the United States, and we ought to protect them.

Sir, is the committee prepared, let me ask, to support the amendment of the gentleman, or will the committee rather adopt the policy recommended by two Administrations of the General Government, by the Missionaries, by the Agents, and by the successive Committees on Indian Affairs? The appropriation to enable the Government to comply with its contract with the Creek Indians, is not attempted to be stricken out. Why, let me ask, shall we make a distinction between the Creeks and the Cherokees and other Indians? We all know the difficulty which has existed, and which still exists, though in a less degree than formerly, in Georgia, relative to this matter, and how desirable it is to the State and General Governments that it should be amicably and finally settled. Sir, I know Georgia is much censured in consequence of this difficulty; as to myself, I have had some occasion to look into that question since I have been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, from all that I can learn on the subject, Georgia has not complained without some cause. But, if the amendment of the gentleman does not prevail, that embarrassing subject can be finally settled to the satisfaction of all parties. Sir, to those gentlemen who view this subject in a pecuniary point of view, I must say, that if we can induce the Indians to believe that the country which we propose for their final location, will answer their purpose, we shall be able to make the exchange for the lands on which the Indians now reside greatly to the pecuniary advantage of the United States.

Let us then, sir, pursue that course, relative to this question, which will redound to our glory and the present, future, and eternal happiness of the Indians.

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, rose and said, that, having submitted the motion now before the committee, he deemed it proper to present, for their consideration, the reasons which had induced him to offer the amendment. I did not bring this question before the committee, (said Mr. W.) It was brought forward by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, sanctioned by the recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I did expect some notice, before this subject would have been taken up; and that, on the bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and now among the orders of the day, this question, in all its relations, would have been fully considered. Such is not, however, the course adopted by that committee.

I have always thought, the ordinary appropriation bills should not be embarrassed by any new measures. They should be confined to objects of appropriation required by existing laws. This bill, without the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie,) is similar to the one making appropriations for the Indian Department, which has, for several years, been regularly passed. I may ask, sir, why we should, in this case, depart from the usual mode of proceeding, and now bring forward this proposition disconnected from the most important parts of the original measure? I do not complain or find fault with gentlemen for the course they have taken. I am ready to meet the question, by my vote, as promptly, now, as at any other time. Indeed, I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that this measure is thus brought forward, and that it stands before us in its proper form and nakedness, stripped of the pretence of disinterested humanity, which has been thrown around it. It is now presented in its true character, as a measure, not for the benefit of the Indians—not for their civilization and preservation—but for our interest, and only our interest. This appropriation is asked, as the means to effect measures for the removal of the Indians out of the limits of our States and Territories, that they may, by our aid, trail their bodies into the wilderness, and die where our delicacy and our senses may not be offended by their unburied carcases.

What was the proposition recommended by our late Executive Magistrate? It was for the establishment of a Territorial Government over the Indians, for their preservation and civilization—for their benefit and not for ours. The bill reported at the first session of the last Congress, which I now have in my hand, provided for the location of the Indian tribes somewhere west of the Mississippi River, and north or west of the State of Missouri. It proposed to create all the paraphernalia of a Government, not of the Indians themselves, in which their laws and manners were to prevail, but in which our laws were to be administered by our officers, and enforced by our soldiers. Is the measure now submitted to us by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffie,) the same which was thus recommended by the Executive, and sanctioned by the Committee on Indian Affairs by whom it was brought before Congress, in the bill reported by them to this House? No, sir. That bill, which I supposed would be brought forward, and acted on, is now abandoned by its friends. The measure is strip of its prominent features. The gentlemen who recommended it as a scheme for the benefit of the Indians, no longer place it on that ground. The amendment now offered by the gentleman from South Carolina goes farther, much farther, than the bill and report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, now among the orders of the day. That bill contains, in its provisions, nothing which bears even a resemblance to the grand scheme formerly presented to us. It has dwindled down almost to nothing. It asks less than the sum required for the expenses of holding an ordinary Indian treaty. It only proposes to appropriate $15,000 to defray the expenses of making an examination of the country west of the Mississippi, by the Indians. But as this proposition now offered, is to supersede that bill, and places the question upon broader grounds involving the whole merits of the proposed measure, we may as well now discuss the question upon its general principles, which go to the foundation of all our Indian relations. So far as the State of Georgia is concerned, we have done forever with the difficulties between that State and the Creeks. It is now a matter of no more interest to Georgia than to Ohio, whether the Indians shall be removed west of the Mississippi or driven into the Gulf of Mexico. The Creeks have ceded to us the last acre of their land in Georgia, and the provision of the treaty, by which the United States were bound to aid them in removing west of the Mississippi, has already expired. I shall therefore consider this question on its broad and general principles.

We are told, sir, that this a measure necessary for the happiness and preservation of the Indians—that we must adopt it, or they will perish, and become extinct as a people. I do not believe this is the only way in which we can save the Indians, or promote their happiness. In my opinion, this measure would effect more rapidly their extinction. Instead of being entitled “An act for the preservation and civilization of the Indian tribes within the United States,” it should be called a scheme for their speedy extermination. If the Indians cannot live on the rich and fertile lands which they now own, they can live nowhere. When gentlemen call upon us to sanction this as a measure of humanity, it may be proper to consider whether the sums necessary to carry into effect this plan, could not be more beneficially expended, by the adoption of a policy which would elevate and improve the Indian character, and secure their happiness, without removing them from their present possessions and homes.

Let us, sir, for a moment, inquire where the Indians are to be removed. We are informed it is intended to plant them west of the Mississippi. This is a pretty extensive region, and we might as well at once send them west of the Rocky Mountains, to people the new territory proposed to be established by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr FLOYD.) They would there have one advantage, which gentlemen deem of great importance: they would not soon be intruded upon by our citizens and settlements. I am aware that I may be told that I know nothing about the Indians, or the system to be established for their Government, or of the country to which they are to be sent. This may be true. I do not pretend to any great knowledge on the subject, but am willing to learn from others, and to obtain information from those who have brought this measure before us for our sanction. Let me ask these gentlemen if they have examined this country? Do you know whether it is suitable to the circumstances and necessities of the Indians? Their answer is, no; we know nothing about these matters, but first adopt the scheme,—provide that the Indians must remove west of the Mississippi—let us decide that we will drive them from their lands which we want to occupy; and then, sir, we will send our agents and commissioners with the Indians, to examine this country. Our agents can be instructed to pursue such measures as will obtain the consent of the chiefs and head men of the tribes, who can be drilled into acquiescence with our plans. There will be no danger of the failure of the measures, provided our commissioners have in their pockets, a “large amount of means, as an auxiliary aid.”

should reflect on this subject. Here they may find a pertinent occasion for their scrutiny. We know that the lands now owned by the Indians are fertile and valuable. It is this which gives activity to our sympathies. But we know nothing of the country to which we propose to remove them. The Secretary of War was called upon by a resolution of this House to give us the specific information possessed by the Department on the subject, and to state “whether the Indians are acquainted with the nature and situation of the country to which they are to be removed; and to what particular district of country west of the Mississippi they ought to be removed?” (See Journal of 1826–7, page 66.)—To these inquiries we received an answer informing us that “the Indians are not acquainted with the nature and situation of the country to which we propose to remove them;” and, “that, as no examination had been made with a view to its occupancy by the tribes now in the States east of the Mississippi, it cannot be known what particular district of country west of Mississippi they ought to occupy.” (See Ex. Doc. 28, of 1826–7.) Such, sir, is our ignorance upon this subject; such is the profound ignorance of those who have pressed this measure upon us. Yet we are zealously called upon by gentlemen to give it the sanction of our approbation.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, examine into the situation of the country which the Indians now possess within the limits of the several States; and into the advantages which they enjoy in their present homes. The Indian lands lying within our borders is that portion of their original possessions which they have never sold or transferred to us, or to any other Government. We are told by one of our sovereign States, while urging upon us her claims to the Indian country within her limits, that it belongs to her, and that she must and she will have it; that we are bound, at all hazards, “and without regard to terms, to procure it.” (See Doc. 102, page 12.) Sir, the same argument may be urged, or rather the same language may be used by all the other States, within the limits of which there is any Indian territory. It was by virtue of the same sovereign right, that the Pope, in the name of St. Peter, gave to Spain all the countries which Columbus discovered. It is the right which power gives, and not justice. Shall we be told that Congress is to disregard the right of the Indians? That the lands on which they now reside shall be taken from them “without regard to terms?” That it is the interest—the determination—the settled policy of the United States, “at all hazards,” to drive them from their country and homes? I hope not, sir; for the honor of my country, I hope not. I may be told that I am unacquainted with the true interest of the Indians, and that they are in the most wretched and miserable situation where they now reside. I will, Mr. Chairman, refer you to the information given to us by the Indian Department, and by the Agents of our Government. The facts stated by these agents, and in the documents to which I will refer, have been frequently reiterated, and if untrue, would long since have been fully disproved. The whole number of the four largest nations within the limits of the States, is stated at more than fifty-four thousand. The Creeks, 20,000; the Cherokees, 9,000; Choctaws, 21,000; and the Chickasaws, 3,625.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

It appears, from more recent information, that the number is probably much greater and is rapidly increasing. These Indians enjoy all the advantages which our own citizens in our new States and settlements possess, except the political rights and privileges of which we deprive them. If they are degraded and wretched, I believe it is occasioned by our injustice and oppression. Let us, by extending to them political rights and privileges, and by the influence of education, remove the cause of their moral degradation, and they will soon stand on as high an elevation as that occupied by ourselves. To prove that these Indians are not in the wretched and degraded situation which is stated by many, I will turn the attention of the committee to the document which accompanied the bill formerly reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. In this document, the Secretary of War informs us, that schools have been established, by the aid of private as well as public donations, for the instruction of their youths. They have been persuaded to abandon the chase—to locate themselves, and become cultivators of the soil. Implements of husbandry and domestic animals have been presented to them, and all of these things have been done, accompanied with professions of disinterested solicitude for their happiness. Yielding to these temptations, some of them have reclaimed the forest, planted their orchards, and erected houses, not only for their abode, but for the administration of justice, and for religious worship. And when they have so done, you send your agent to tell them they must surrender their country to the white man, and recommit themselves to some new desert, and substitute, as the means of their subsistence, the precarious chase for the certainty of cultivation. "I will add," continues the Secretary of War, in another part of this communication, that "the end proposed is the happiness of the Indians; the means of its accomplishment their progressive, and, finally, their complete civilization. The obstacles to success are their ignorance, their prejudices, their repugnance to labor, their wandering propensities, and the uncertainty of the future. I would endeavor to overcome these by schools, by a distribution of land in individual right, by a permanent social establishment, which should require the performance of social duties." (See Ex. Doc. of 1825-'6, Doc. 102.) This, sir, is the language of the Secretary of War, (Mr. Barbour,) a language which does equal honor to the head and to the heart of that distinguished statesman.

Let me now, Mr. Chairman, turn the attention of the committee more directly to the present situation of the several tribes or nations to which I have before referred. What, sir, is the situation of the Cherokee Indians? We are told, in the same document to which I last referred, that, in the Cherokee country, "horses are plenty, and are used for servile purposes. Numerous flocks of sheep, goats, and swine, cover the valleys and hills. On Tennessee and Ustanalla Rivers, Cherokee commerce floats. The climate is delicious and healthy. In the plains and valleys, the soil is rich, producing Indian corn, cotton, tobacco, wheat, oats, indigo, sweet and Irish potatoes. Apple and peach orchards are quite common. Butter and cheese are now on Cherokee tables. There are many public roads in the nation; and houses of entertainment are kept by the natives. Numerous and flourishing villages are seen in every part of the country. Industry and commercial enterprise are extending themselves in every part of the country. Nearly all the merchants in the country are native Cherokees. Agricultural pursuits engage the chief attention of the people. The population is rapidly increasing." "The census taken this year, (1825,) shows that there are 18,568 native citizens; 147 white men and 78 white women are married into the nation; and they have 1,277 African slaves." Are not these people, sir, in the possession of all we propose to give them—of all their warmest friends promise them, in the new home in which they wish to place the Indians? I ask gentlemen, why we should remove them from this situation? It is our interest, and not theirs, which prompts us to this measure, and warms our unasked benevolence into action. What is the situation of the Chickasaw tribe? I will turn gentlemen to the report of the special agent who has just visited this nation. He informs us, that "the population of the Chickasaws may be put down at four thousand. They have increased about four hundred within the last five or six years." He says, "I will suppose the families to average five souls, which will give eight hundred houses. The number of mills, it is believed, does not exceed ten. The workshops I do not think exceed fifty. Their orchards are few and limited in extent. Their fences may be estimated to have cost fifty thousand dollars." Their stock of all kinds, averaging two horses, two cows, and five hogs and a dozen poultry, to each family, this agent estimates at eighty four thousand eight hundred dollars, (see Doc. 2, page 179.) It is to remove these people, who are thus increasing, in a ratio as rapid as the most flourishing part of the United States, from the homes in which they already enjoy so many comforts and advantages, to some happy Elysian fields, that gentlemen have seen in their imagination, but which exist nowhere else, that we are so earnestly solicited to make this appropriation.

The present situation of the Indians, as proved by the documents to which I have referred, is not worse, in regard to the means which they possess of obtaining subsistence, and the ordinary comforts of domestic life, than that of thousands of our own hardy and independent yeomen, who are the pioneers of a more dense population. Among our own citizens in the new States, we will not find, in a population of four thousand, more than eight hundred houses, ten mills, and fifty workshops. Yet, sir, with all this evidence before us, gentlemen insist that these Indians are a wretched and miserable people, who can be preserved in no other way, than by removing them into the wilderness, to seek their subsistence by pursuing the game of the forest. In my opinion, sir, nothing more is necessary to make them prosperous and happy, than to extend to them the rights of a free people. Make them a portion of the great American family.

Sir, I am in favor of the policy proposed and pursued by the late Secretary of War, (Mr. Calhoun.) The system which he first proposed to Congress, and to the nation, and which had long before been sanctioned by the recommendation of several of our wisest and greatest statesmen, was to extend to them the advantages of civilization, not by driving them from their lands into the wilds of the untrodden forest, but by a system of education, which would teach the Indian, and particularly his children, the pursuits and the habits of civilized man, and thus make his present home more valuable to him. In urging this subject upon the consideration of Congress, Mr. Calhoun says, "it will require the enlightened co-operation of the General Government, and of the States within which the Indians may reside. With zealous and enlightened co-operation it is, however, believed, that all difficulties may be surmounted, and this wretched, but, in many respects, noble race, be ultimately brought within the pale of civilization. Preparatory to so radical a change in our relations towards them, the system of education which has been adopted, ought to be put into extensive and active operation. This is the foundation of all other improvements. It ought gradually to be followed by a plain and simple form of Government, such as has been adopted by the Cherokees. A proper compression of their settlements, and a division of their landed property. By introducing gradually and judiciously those improvements, they will ultimately attain such a state of intelligence, industry, and civilization, as to prepare the way for a complete extension of our laws and authority over them." (Ex. Docs. of 1821-'2 vol. 4, Doc. 59.)

Sir, this is the language and the recommendations of the statesman who lately presided over the War Department with so much distinction. He did not dream of proposing the scheme which is now urged with so much zeal. He wished to provoke no angry collisions in this work of humanity, of justice. Let us banish from our councils the narrow feelings of self-interest, and give to the Indians a right to the soil which they possess—or, rather, let us have the magnanimity to acknowledge that they have now that right. Let the Indians be the owners of the soil in fee—let the right of individual property be extended to them—let the strong passion awakened in the human bosom by self-interest, be called into action, and they will no longer be a degraded people. They will stand upon the proud eminence of Americans. They will feel no shame on account of their origin. No, sir, it will be to them a source of conscious pride. I might support these views by the opinions of many gentlemen well acquainted with the subject. I will refer to one. Mr. Merriwether, of Georgia, formerly a member of this House, remarked to me, that "the only way to elevate the Indian, is to give him property." He said, "give an Indian a slave, and he at once becomes a man." I say give him property much more valuable—give him the rights of a freeholder and a citizen.

But, sir, we are told that the Indians are oppressed by the encroachments of the white population which surrounds them; that they are trampled on and oppressed by our own citizens. This, sir, is a poor encomium on our people—a wretched compliment to the nation. While we are talking about our justice, our generosity—our feelings of humanity for the Indians—in the same breath we say, that our citizens—that the American people—with ruthless violence and injustice, are trampling the weak remnant of these once powerful nations into dust. If we cannot protect them within the limits of our State Governments, in sight of our courts of justice, and within reach of the arm of the laws, we cannot protect them when placed beyond the reach of our laws, and out of the limits of any organized civil government. Sir, this system, spun out of wild theories, is all a dream—it is an Utopian scheme. If you cannot here stay the oppressing hand of avarice, where will you remove them to be beyond its grasp? Where you propose to plant them, will not our soldiers be placed over them? Will not our people surround them there? Those who now prey upon them as vultures, will follow them to their new abode. There is no place fit for the residence of any civilized people, east of the Rocky Mountains, which has not been visited by American citizens. A few years ago, had the proposition been made to plant the Indian tribes in a remote colony, the spot most likely to have been selected would have been north-west of the Ohio River, or, perhaps, just west of the Alleghany Mountains. I ask gentlemen to reflect on the consequences of this measure. It appears to me to be a scheme by which the extension of our settlements and States is to be limited and restrained, unless you leave the Indians exposed to all the uncertainty, to all the evils, of which you now complain. Their situation will be worse than it now is. In proportion to the distance to which you remove your Territorial Government from the seat of the General Government and from its supervising care, you necessarily increase the abuses to which it will be liable. You may hide the oppression of these people from the nation by this measure, but you will not thereby relieve the poor Indians from its weight and consequences.

It is said, sir, that the Indians, while in our vicinity learn only our vices, and that they cannot be civilized here. I ask gentlemen what they will gain by removing them, when the evil is not in the Territory which they inhabit—not in their local situation—but in the relation in which they stand to us? Their condition cannot be improved by the establishment of a military despotism over them. If man can rise to a high state of improvement under these circumstances, where he is taken from half-cultivated fields and placed in a wilderness, and where he had become partially civilized, I confess, sir, that I do not understand the human character. Instead of rising in civilization, he will sink beneath the despotism which makes him little less than your slave, or he will return again to the chase, and take refuge from your power and oppression in the more remote depths of the forest. I do not wish, sir, to preserve the Indians in distinct tribes, or as a separate people. I would as soon propose to plant in our country a colony from the Highlands of Scotland, and to provide that they should always continue to wear the Tartan plaid, and to speak the Highland dialect, as to preserve the Indians among us a distinct people.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to turn the attention of the committee to the expense which will attend this measure. If adopted, whether successful or not, the expense must be incurred. This experiment is to be made at the hazard of human life. The happiness, nay, sir, the existence of one hundred thousand people, depends upon the doubtful success of this untried project. But, if all the arguments and reasons opposed to the scheme and its practicability can be successfully answered, still it may be proper to examine the subject in relation to its demands upon the Treasury, and our disposition to meet these demands. I will not trust to my own conjectures upon this point. I will present to the committee the estimates which are made by the friends and advocates of this scheme, and will then ask gentlemen whether they are prepared to go forward. I will not take into consideration the expenditure necessary to purchase the Indian title to the lands which they still hold in Georgia. This matter has been pressed upon the committee, but I will not stop to examine it. I am ready and willing to fulfil all our obligations to Georgia, so far as we can do so in justice to others, and without the violation of other rights. If, sir, I agree with my neighbor to convey to him a clear title, in fee, for your farm, and you should obstinately refuse to sell your land to me, what am I to do? Have I a right to turn you off your land, and out of your house, and to seize upon your property? No, sir; I become responsible to my neighbor for the damage he may have sustained. I will forfeit the penalty of my obligation; but your title remains good. I am ready to pay Georgia the penalty of our obligation, if we have violated it. But I will not do flagrant injustice to the Indians, even to gratify a sovereign State.

The estimate now presented to us of the expense of removing the Chickasaw nation of 4,000 persons, amounts to nearly half a million. This embraces the sum proposed to be paid for their houses, farms, shops, horses, and other articles of personal property; and if we calculate that the farms, houses, and property, of the other tribes, is as valuable, in proportion to their numbers, as that of the Chickasaws, it will require more than six millions of dollars for this part of the expense. The estimate made for the subsistence of the emigrating Creeks, is twenty cents per day, or $73 per annum for each individual. The amount of this item of the expense would be about four millions of dollars. Thus we have the sum of more than ten millions of dollars as a commencement; without including "contingencies;" and the whole expense of supporting the Government to be created in this new territory; and the army to be sustained for its defence;—without adding the sum necessary for the establishment of schools and other means of education. This is not my calculation. It is furnished to us by the Indian Bureau; by the friends of this scheme—as the foundation or data upon which we are to make this appropriation. I refer gentlemen who wish to examine this subject in detail, to the report of the commissioners sent to treat with the Chickasaws and Choctaws in 1836, printed by the Senate, pages 18 and 14; and to the document accompanying the President's message, page 179; also, to document 44, page 6. I ask in behalf of the Indians only for a pittance of these enormous sums, to be expended in establishing schools among the Indians, in teaching them the pursuits of agriculture and the mechanical arts, and in establishing proper regulations for their government, and for the distribution and security of their property. Sir, in the language of the late Secretary of War, let "the system which has been adopted, be put into extensive and active operation," and the result will be infinitely more honorable to us; the prosperity and happiness of the Indians will be more effectually promoted and secured, than by any new invention for their benefit.

Before we carry the eighty thousand Indians, now on this side of the Mississippi, over that river, I conjure gentlemen to look at the situation of the two hundred thousand which are already there. I ask the friends of this measure to prove the correctness of their theory, by organizing these tribes under their new system of Government, by teaching them to respect your laws, and by learning them to pursue the occupations, and adopt the laws and habits of civilized man. Let gentlemen do this, and come with the evidence of their success, and I will then believe in their theory; I will then vote for this measure. But, sir, while I know and have the evidence before me, to prove that the most powerful of the Indian nations, now west of the Mississippi, living upon the very territory to which these are to be removed, are still more miserable and destitute than the most degraded of those for whose benefit gentlemen are urging us to adopt this measure, I will not consent to drive the eighty thousand now among us, enjoying the comforts of their homes and native land, into the country, where they can meet nothing but death, either by the hand of their enemies or by the lingering sufferings of famine. Our utmost efforts could not preserve them in this wilderness, which is already filled with all the horrors of Indian wretchedness. The Indians already in that region are enjoying the fruits of our benevolence and humanity, by an accumulation of misery and suffering beyond a parallel. Sir, I draw no imaginary picture. I cannot portray, in language sufficiently strong, the wretchedness of these people, now west of the Mississippi, where we promise their brethren "a last home," where they may flourish in peace and happiness! I will read to the committee an extract of a letter from Gov. Clark, Superintendent of the Indians west of the Mississippi. He says, "the situation of the Indians west of the Mississippi is the most pitiable that can be imagined. During several seasons in every year they are distressed by famine, of which many die for want of food, and during which the living child is often buried with the dead mother, because none can spare it as much food as would sustain it through its helpless infancy. This description applies to the Sioux, Osagee, and many others; but I mention these, because they are powerful tribes, and live near our borders; and my official station enables me to know the exact truth. It is in vain to talk to people in this situation about learning and religion. They want a regular supply of food; and until this is obtained, the operations of the mind must take the instinct of mere animals, and be confined to warding off hunger and cold."

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, said, that it was with great reluctance, and unaffected embarrassment, that he rose at that late hour of the day, after the already protracted discussion, to which the subject had unexpectedly given rise, to throw himself upon the indulgence of the committee, knowing, as he did, that every member was more anxious the question should be taken, than to hear further debate. I, however, feel myself called upon, said Mr. McL., by the peculiar situation in which I stand in relation to this measure, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have recommended its adoption, to submit a few remarks, and as far as in my power, to answer some of the arguments and allegations which have fallen from my colleague, (Mr. Woods), who has just resumed his seat. Great complaint has been made in relation to the manner in which this subject is presented for discussion, and imputations have been thrown out against the Committee on Indian Affairs, for having (as gentlemen suppose) been instrumental in calling forth this debate in an incidental way, upon an ordinary appropriation bill. Sir, if this be objectionable, the Committee on Indian Affairs are not responsible for it. The Department of War transmitted to the House an estimate of the amount which would be required during the present year for Indian purposes; those estimates, and the documents accompanying them, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, whose peculiar province it is, under the rules of the House, to report all bills of ordinary appropriation, and that committee reported the bill now under consideration, leaving out, however, certain items contained in it, and called for by the estimates, which they very correctly thought proper to refer to the Committee of Indian Affairs, who were instructed by a resolution of the House to make a special report thereon. Those items are in part contained in the general estimates from the Treasury Department, and which are particularly specified in the document marked "submitted," amounting to 25,124 dollars. The Department of War also asked an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars to defray the expenses of the emigrating Creek Indians, and the further sum of fifty thousand dollars to aid other emigrating Indians. The Committee on Indian Affairs, after a full investigation of the subject, were unanimously of opinion, that all the appropriations asked for in the estimates ought to be made, except the item for the emigrating Creek Indians; and believing, that, with proper economy, half the amount asked for that object might be made to answer the end proposed, they, accordingly, in obedience to the order of the House, made a special report, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and in doing this, the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs terminated. I had no knowledge of the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means, to move to attach those items to the ordinary appropriation bill; consequently, the present debate has risen most unexpectedly to me, and I am as much taken by surprise, as any other member can be. I, however, can see no objection to the course pursued. The subject is one of great importance, but it might as well be acted upon and determined now as at any other time.

In relation to the appropriation now required to aid the Creeks in their removal west of the Mississippi, no objections can be made. It is but the fulfilment of a solemn obligation en-tared into with them, on the part of this Government, by treaty stipulations. A part of that nation of Indians have already gone, and several hundred of them are now on their way to their place of destination, and the United States have expressly agreed to defray all their expenses in their emigration, and to make provision for them at least twelve months after their arrival at their new homes, and also to furnish them with such domestic animals and implements of husbandry, as the President, in his discretion, may think proper.

I will now submit a few remarks in relation to the expediency and necessity of the proposed appropriation, to be placed at the disposition of the Executive, for the purpose of enabling him to extinguish the title of the Cherokee Indians, to any lands within the limits of the State of Georgia, whenever it can be done upon "reasonable and peaceable terms," and to aid the said Cherokees and such other Indians as may be disposed to emigrate west of the Mississippi. The Committee on Indian Affairs, on adverting to the compact between the United States and the State of Georgia, and having been instructed, by a resolution of this House, to inquire into the subject, and to make report thereon, could not hesitate as to the proper course to be pursued; they believed that, in good faith to the citizens of Georgia, it was the duty of the Government always to hold itself in readiness to comply with the provisions of the compact, which expressly requires that the Indian title shall be extinguished whenever it can be done upon "reasonable and peaceable terms." The committee also believed that the request of the War Department to have funds placed at their disposition to aid such other Indians as might be disposed to emigrate, was reasonable and expedient; and, for myself, I am utterly opposed to depriving the Indians of their present homes, unless provision shall be made for them elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman: The subject of the colonization of the Indians beyond the limits of our States and Territories, west of the Mississippi, has long since been presented for the consideration of the American people, and, however visionary the scheme may appear to some gentlemen, of one thing I am thoroughly convinced, that it had its origin in the best feelings of the human heart. It was first, in an official way, presented for the consideration of Congress, by Mr. Monroe, late President of the United States; it was approved, and strongly pressed upon their attention, by Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, and the same policy appears to have met the approbation of the present Administration. Governor Barbour, the now Secretary of War, furnished this House, through the Committee on Indian Affairs, three years ago, with a bill prescribing a form of government for this Indian colony, accompanied by a detached report, which I will say, as others have said, did honor to his head and heart. I confess, sir, for myself, that I have never, in my life, attempted to investigate any subject, in which I have found so much difficulty in coming to a conclusion. The question is asked, why have not the Committee on Indian Affairs reported to this House the bill to which I have just alluded, providing a form of government for the Indians? I answer, for myself, that although I am strongly inclined to believe it to be the best policy that can be pursued, in reference to this unfortunate race of people, yet I am not prepared to say it shall be adopted. I want further information; I wish to know something more in relation to the country in which it is proposed to settle them. I wish the Indians, themselves, to have an opportunity of examining the soil, the climate, and every thing connected with it, and to be fully satisfied, before I would ask them to abandon their present habitations. The attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs was particularly directed to this subject, not only by the correspondence of the special agent, to whom allusion has been made, but by various resolutions of this House, at an early day of the present session, instructing them to make report thereon. The committee, after the most mature deliberation, made their report in favor of the expediency of making an appropriation to afford the Indians an opportunity of exploring the country, which it is proposed to offer them, in exchange for their lands within the limits of the States and Territories; and, as the Chickasaw nation, in particular, had made or acceded to propositions of this nature, the committee reported a bill, making an appropriation, for the amount estimated by the Department as sufficient to enable them, and also such other tribes as might be disposed to explore the country, to do so, and authorizing the President to appoint, and send with them, suitable persons, who could, on their return, furnish such information as would enable Congress to legislate understandingly upon the subject. That bill, accompanied by a detailed report, showing the views of the committee, and fully explaining the object contemplated, was printed and laid upon the table of every member, and need not, by me, be now repeated.

Mr. Chairman: as I before said, if, on a full examination of the country west of the Mississippi, beyond the limits of our States and Territories, it should be found well adapted to the Indians, and the Government can obtain a title to it; and if the Indians should freely and voluntarily choose to go: I say give it to them, in exchange for theirs: and let them understand it is to be their permanent home: that it is theirs forever: afford them the means of removing to it: aid them in every shape and form: furnish them with the necessary implements of husbandry: teach them, as far as possible, the arts and sciences: establish schools among them: give them a form of Government, suited to their condition: distribute their lands among them individually, by metes and bounds: in short, endeavor to inspire them with a desire for civilization: but if, on the contrary, the country should be found unsuited to them; or, if they should be disinclined to change their residence; then I would say renew your exertions in their behalf, where they now are. Sir, it has, however, been said, that many of the Indians are now in a flourishing condition; that they have their mills, their comfortable dwellings, and smiling fields; this may be true, in reference to a few individuals of a solitary tribe: but we all know, that more than nine-tenths of them are, even at this hour, in a most wretched and pitiable condition. If I am not a stranger to the feelings of my own heart, I would do nothing in reference to this people, that shall not, in my best judgment, be calculated to promote their present and eternal interest;—and those gentlemen who differ from me in opinion, will, I trust, at least do me the justice to believe, that, if I am in error, it is an error of the head, and not of the heart. In all my acts of legislation, I will endeavor to keep an eye single to their welfare.

The vast expense which would accrue to the United States by the removal and colonization of the Indians, has been urged as an argument against the policy; but I believe it would be no difficult task to prove, did time permit, that it would be to the pecuniary interest of the Government. I will not, however, on this occasion, weary the patience of the committee by entering upon this topic. I must be permitted, before I sit down, to say, that, however visionary the scheme may by some be considered, it has for its advocates all the superintendents, agents, missionaries, and teachers of schools, among them, in every section of the country, almost without an exception; and I confess this circumstance has had great influence upon my mind; we know that, in giving their opinions in favor of the measure, they are actuated by the most patriotic motives; for it is directly opposed to their pecuniary interest.

I have letters and other evidence in my possession, from the most intelligent superintendents, agents, and missionaries, all urging and pressing this subject in the strongest possible language, and all giving it as their decided opinion, that there is no other salvation for the Indians. One word more in relation to the particular item of appropriation now under consideration, and I shall have done. If it be deemed proper to place the means at the disposition of the President of the United States to extinguish the title of the Cherokees to their land in the State of Georgia, then it will be certainly necessary to furnish them with another home, and to aid them in going to it. Other Indians, as I have already shown, have been long since induced by the Government to remove west of the Mississippi, some of whom are now on their way, in the most deplorable condition, unable to reach their places of destination without assistance; and I now hold in my hand a letter, just received from Governor Clark, of Missouri, representing the suffering condition of some of those Indians, and making an appeal to Congress to aid them, which he who can resist, must possess a heart more hard than mine. I will ask the Clerk to read it, and then leave the committee to determine the subject, feeling a consciousness of having, as far as in my power, discharged what I considered an indispensable duty.

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

Improvement of the River Wabash.

On motion of Mr. BLAKE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to deepen and improve the channel of the river Wabash, at the Grand Rapids below Vincennes.

In offering this resolution, Mr. BLAKE said that he deemed it proper, before the question was taken, to trespass on the House for a moment, by submitting some remarks in relation to it. I am induced to do this, he said, not for the purpose of promoting the passage of the resolution and the reference of the subject to the committee, for, in this particular, I trust to the courtesy and practice of the House; but to impress it on the minds of that committee, if any of its members should be within the hearing of my voice, that I am altogether serious in the application I have made, and that the subject is well entitled to a portion of their time and consideration. Sir, the Grand Rapids of the Wabash are about twenty miles below Vincennes, and about a hundred from the mouth of the river; and at this point, the river is the boundary between the two Governments of Indiana and Illinois. Below the rapids, the navigation is generally good, and above them, it is equally good for the distance of nearly three hundred miles. The contiguous soil through this whole extent of navigation, with but little exception, belongs mutually to the Federal Government and the citizen, and in fertility and productiveness, is probably not exceeded by any on the globe. Now, sir, it not unfrequently happens that steamboats and craft destined for Vincennes and other places of importance, ascend the river as far as this point, and cannot proceed farther; and what is worse, infinitely worse, the freighted boat of the enterprising citizen is often stopped on its way to a Southern market; and he is compelled to remain there pining away under the expectation of a rise of water, not only losing the benefit of a prompt arrival at his place of destination, but, in the mean time, his cargo of corn and pork is spoiling, and his all rapidly disappearing.

These obstructions, as it is said by gentlemen who have been employed for the express purpose of ascertaining, can be easily removed, so as to create a good and sufficient channel, by a comparatively trifling expense. They are occasioned by rocks of a soft, shelly substance, extending across, and, for a short distance, along the river, and the sum of three or four thousand dollars, judiciously expended, it is believed, would enable us to effect the very desirable object. And, sir, permit me to ask, why should the treasure of the nation be expended in the improvement of the Ohio and the Mississippi, when their important tributaries are neglected, and permitted to remain in their natural condition? Our western waters, in their impetuous career to salute the king of rivers, should be made to take with them the rich presents of the products of the interior.

Sir, if there is any portion of the West entitled to the especial attention and guardianship of Congress, the particular district of country I now speak of, may safely present its claims in comparison. From the time that the gallant General Clark first came to their succor, and planted his standard upon the battlements of Vincennes; from that time down to the present, its citizens, and the highly respectable and hardy yeomanry in the neighborhood, have sustained one uniform character for fidelity and zeal, and a sensitive regard for the honor of the nation. They have stood the brunt of wars, both against a civilized and a savage foe. Their ancient town has been for many years the rallying point of emigrants to the West; and it may justly be considered as the maternal source from which has spread a population which now covers the region of the Wabash. But, sir, I believe I am indebted to the indulgence of the Chair, that I am, in some degree, trespassing on your rules, by detaining the House on a mere question of reference. It is a subject about which I entertain fixed and lively feelings, and about which I have before exerted myself, in my humble way, when acting on another theatre of public life.

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The following amendment, yesterday moved by Mr. VINTOX, being under consideration:

"Provided, That no Indian or Indians, north of latitude 36 degrees 30 minutes, shall be aided in removing south of that degree; nor shall any Indian or Indians, living south of said degree of latitude, be aided in emigrating north thereof."

Mr. VINTOX said, that, when he yesterday submitted the amendment now under consideration, he remarked, that, for some time past, he had observed, with some attention and much interest, the progress of the proposed measure of Indian emigration, which had been recently brought before the House in a great variety of forms. That he thought he could discern, gradually and silently collecting, the elements of serious discontent among the States; and that, unless means were devised to dissipate the gathering tempest, the time was not far distant, when it would burst upon us. To point out the threatened danger, it will be necessary, (Mr. V. said) to advert to the state of things in the Western and Southwestern States and Territories; and to give some account of what has been done towards a removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi.

It so happens, said Mr. V., that various tribes of Indians inhabit greater or less portions of these States; which shut out the white population from their Territory, and thus cut off from improvement so much of these States as the Indian country embraces. All the States feel a strong and very natural desire to increase their population; and from this cause, more than from any other single circumstance, the Indians are everywhere regarded as a burthen, which all are anxious to throw off as soon as possible. And hence, the great efforts that are constantly made, here and elsewhere, to possess ourselves of the remnant of their country, and push them before us into the wilderness. Extensive regions of country, in a state of nature, are still to be found beyond the inhabited parts of the Western and Southwestern States and Territories, to the peopling of which, it is not to be disguised, each of these sections of country look forward, with deep interest, as the certain means of great accession to their positive power at home, and to their relative power and consequence in the Union. Any legislation here, having a tendency to defeat these certain, though somewhat distant results, cannot but excite the decided opposition of the section of country so to be affected.

In a Government organized as ours is, surrenders of this sort are not to be claimed; nor can they be taken without injustice, and, consequently, without danger. Hence, it must be obvious, that, if, in the prosecution of the proposed plan of removing and colonizing the Indians, you transfer them from one section, thereby relieving it from its pressure, and put them down upon the other, thereby adding to the pressure the latter already feels: or, if you transfer them from one section to the uninhabited regions adjacent to the other, and thus enlarge the sources of the future, but certain power and wealth of the former, at the expense of the latter—discontent and angry collision must inevitably spring up. Not to expect this result, is to shut our eyes upon all history, and upon the fixed laws and motives of human action. To the friends of this plan, it cannot but be apparent, that if these collisions do spring up, the efforts of humanity, in behalf of this unfortunate race, will be paralyzed, and perhaps, put down forever. The amendment now under consideration is intended to avert the consequences I have pointed out, by causing the Indians to move forward on the same parallels of latitude they now live on. Such a movement would lead the Indians in the Southwest into the extensive unsettled country beyond the Territory of Arkansas, and those of the Northwest into the uninhabited parts above and beyond the State of Missouri. They cannot be removed in any other direction, without subjecting one section of the country to the dangers and pressure from which another is relieved. Any attempt, for example, to transfer the hordes of the Northwest into the Southwest, or into the unsettled country bordering on the Southwest, would be resisted by the latter, as unjust and oppressive, especially if the transfer were to be accompanied by the guarantees and solemn pledges of the Government, (which form so prominent and important a feature in this plan of emigration,) "that the country to which they went should never be purchased of them, nor peopled by the whites." A similar lodgment of the Indians of the Southwest in the Northwest, cannot fail to excite opposition, sufficiently powerful, to bring about the final failure of the whole plan. That such a lodgment of the Southwestern Indians is in contemplation, I shall undertake to show is indicated by the preliminary steps that have been taken, and by the more direct avowal of gentlemen on this floor, since the opening of the present debate. And here, Mr. Chairman, it may be well enough to go into a short review of the progress and modifications of the idea of Indian civilization, for some years past; from which it will be more easy to discern its real aspect and tendency at the present time.

In the year 1816, Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of War, made a report to the Senate, in which, among other valuable suggestions, he recommends the extension of our laws over the Aborigines within our limits, under such modifications as might be adapted to their circumstances. This report attracted much notice at the time; but no steps were taken to carry this part of its recommendations into effect. Here the matter rested until 1820, when Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, made a report to Congress, (Ex. Doc. 46, 1st sess. 16th Cong.,) in which, after giving a highly flattering account of the progress of Indian improvement, under the influence of the means adopted by Congress, and by individuals, for their education, he also recommends the gradual extension of our laws over them, as the only means of effecting their civilization. Again: in 1822, Mr. Calhoun makes another report (Ex. Doc. 59, 1st sess. 17th Cong.) giving a like flattering account of the prospects and improvements of the Indians, and renews his recommendation to extend our laws and protection over them. Up to the year 1825, we continued to receive the most encouraging accounts of the improvement and promising prospects of these people. The friends of humanity, relying upon the accuracy of this information, everywhere took courage. As yet, no great movement of the Indians beyond the Mississippi had been recommended by the Executive, or thought of by the nation. So far from it, the seed of civilization had been planted and sprung up in their native soil—where this tender plant daily grew, and promised ere long the happiest fruits under the delicate and skilful cultivation of Christian and public benevolence. In the mean time, great changes were going on among ourselves. Flourishing States and communities had suddenly risen up in the neighborhood and around the Indians, whose territory presented a barrier to our advancing population.

The very prosperity of our settlements created a strong desire in them to remove the Indians from their vicinity, which manifested itself in almost daily applications to the Executive and to Congress for the extinguishment of the Indian title. With the State of Georgia the Government had become involved in a very delicate and embarrassing controversy. Perplexed by Georgia and pressed on all sides by the importunities of the new States to extinguish the small remaining remnant of Indian territory within their limits, the Executive sought by a great effort to give itself relief. At this crisis, Mr. Monroe sent in a message to Congress, breathing the language of the purest benevolence, but which, I hesitate not to say, proposes the boldest experiment upon human life, and human happiness, that is to be found in the history of the world. It proposes to take a whole people, nay, more, the remnant of forty nations, from their abodes, and place them down in the recesses of a distant and forbidding wilderness, and there, after creating a Government over them, to reform, amalgamate, and civilize them. This message, sir, in my opinion, had its origin in the circumstances by which the Executive was then surrounded, and not in any well-founded conviction of the practicability of the plan, deduced from facts or experience. I feel myself justified in coming to this conclusion, from the fact, that, when a call was made upon the Executive for information concerning the leading provisions of the bill of the last session based upon that recommendation, the answer disclosed to the House a total want of all facts and data, in support of it. Indeed, so striking and obvious was the deficiency of information, upon which to base so great a measure, that, though much anxiety had been previously manifested to call it up, at an early day of the session, yet, after the answer to the call came in, no attempt was made to call up the bill, nor any desire evinced by its friends to move it. The message of 1825 was accompanied by a communication from Mr. Calhoun, going, in detail, into the proposed plan of removal, and, among other things, makes a distribution of the western country, beyond the settlements, among the various tribes of Indians inhabiting the country within them. I shall have occasion, before I sit down, to call the attention of the committee again to this document, to which I now refer, for the sole purpose of showing what disposition Mr. Calhoun proposed to make of the tribes in the Southwest. He says: "Of the four Southern tribes, two of them, the Cherokees and Choctaws, have already allotted to them a tract of country west of the Mississippi. That which has been allotted to the latter, is believed to be sufficiently ample for the whole nation, should they emigrate; and if an arrangement which is believed not to be impracticable, could be made between them and the Chickasaws, who are their neighbors, and of similar habits and dispositions, it would be sufficient for the accommodation of both. A sufficient country should be reserved, to the west of the Cherokees, on the Arkansas, as a means of exchange with those who remain on the east. To the Creeks might be allotted a country between the Arkansas and Canadian River, which limits the Northern boundary of the Choctaw possessions in that quarter." At the next session (the first session of the last Congress) an act was passed to authorize the President to hold a treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, (certain tribes of Indians living in Alabama and Mississippi,) and to provide for their removal west of the river Mississippi. When the bill was under discussion, the inquiry was then made to know to what district of country, west of the Mississippi, it was in contemplation to remove them. It was then said, they were to be removed west of Arkansas. But, sir, how did the fact turn out? A commission was appointed to go and treat with them. The commissioners first went to the Choctaws, and after making to them the most unprecedented proposals, one item of which was, a million of dollars for their lands, utterly failed to treat, in consequence of the decided and unyielding refusal of the Indians to sell their country. They then went to the Chickasaws, with whom they were equally unsuccessful. To them, they proposed, among other things, to exchange their country for a like quantity of country north and west of Missouri. This they refused. These Indians were then further pressed, as a last resort, to send a deputation, under the pay of the United States, to explore the country—not in the west—no, sir, but more than a thousand miles north of their present abodes. To this proposition, also, they gave a decided negative, and expressed, in the strongest terms, to the commissioners, their desire that they might not be again solicited to part with any portion of their country, with which they were contented, and desirous to live upon it in peace and quiet. But, notwithstanding all this, it appears, from a document laid upon our tables during the present session, that the chief clerk of the Indian Department was, within a twelvemonth after, sent among them again, to feel out their disposition on this delicate subject of selling their country, and going into some inhospitable wilderness. What did he do? Did he propose to them to emigrate to the west of Arkansas, and unite themselves with the Choctaws, on that side of the Mississippi, where Mr. Calhoun says, in the document I have already read from, there is land enough for both tribes? No, sir; he renews the proposition of the preceding year, for them to remove North of Missouri. He enters into a sort of unofficial, or rather unauthorized, arrangement with them, on the subject of a removal—the most prominent provision of which is a stipulation, that the United States shall never re-purchase nor settle the country proposed to be given to them, and that all the whites now in the country shall be driven out of it. The gentleman from Georgia, who sits at the left, (Mr. LUMPKIN,) took occasion, on an early day in the session, to speak in terms of marked approbation of Col. McKenney's report of his proceedings on this mission, whence I infer, that gentleman is not only in favor of removing the Indians, but that he is for sending those of the Southwest into the Northwest. The delegate from Florida, who is ever attentive to the interests of his constituents, has said, since the present bill has been under discussion, that it was the intention of Government to send the Indians north of Arkansas and west of Missouri, and gave the committee to understand, that, if a proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, then under consideration, should be adopted, he should follow it up by a proposition for the removal of the Indians of Florida into that country; assigning, as a reason for the removal, that, pressed by hunger, they had broken out of their country, and were plundering and robbing his constituents. With these indications of the direction about to be given to the proposed measure of emigration, I feel myself bound, as one of the Representatives of the West, to urge the proposed amendment upon the committee; and I feel assured, that, if gentlemen from the Southwest are anxious for this measure for the good of the Indians alone, and do not intend, as a part of the operation, to relieve themselves of their Indians, and throw them upon the frontier of the West, they will give to this proposition a ready and willing support—a proposition, the justice, fairness, and reciprocal equity of which, no gentleman can deny. It proposes to them to do as they would be done by.

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

Before I proceed to an examination of the effects of the proposed plan of emigration, upon the western country, as well as upon the Indians themselves, I must beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee again to the report of the Secretary of War, which accompanied the Message of 1825. When the plan there marked out is understood by the people of the western country, it will fill them with alarm. And here, permit me, for a moment, to point out some of its leading features. It proposes, for the purpose of preserving the Indians from the effects of being brought in contact with our people, to give them a solemn guarantee that they shall not be disturbed by the encroachment of our citizens upon them, and that the Government shall never extinguish their title to the country to which they may remove, and which, under the faith of this Government, solemnly pledged, they are forever to occupy as a perpetual home. Under this pledge, it proposes to remove the Southwestern Indians in the direction already stated, when I first adverted to the report. Those of Arkansas and Missouri to be moved forward beyond their boundaries; while it is proposed to transfer those of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and the Peninsula of Michigan, into the country north of Illinois, and west of Lake Michigan. And last of all, as appears from the Message, separate Governments are to be instituted over each tribe, (about forty in number,) and a General Government, for the regulation of the whole, is to be established over the vast extent of country thus to be apportioned among these various hordes of Indians. These are the leading features of the great plan of Indian civilization and Indian colonization, as originally recommended by the Executive of the country. Let us add to it, the modification which gentlemen seem now to have in contemplation, that of removing the Indians of the Southwest upon the frontier of the Northwest, and then, sir, let us pause for a moment to survey the condition of the western country, and the incalculable consequences that must result to it, to the Union, and to the Indians.

Such a disposition of the Indians greatly endangers the security of the whole western frontier, and renders the condition of Missouri, in particular, imminently perilous. If you succeed in the plan of civilization, the increase of population and moral power that must necessarily result from the success of the measure, added to their preservation as a distinct race of men, and the great extent of country occupied by them, must, unavoidably, bring about the establishment of a Government independent of our own. Sir, I will not speculate upon the consequences that would follow. Suffice it to say, that no lover of his country would subject it to such imminent peril. If you even incorporated them into this confederacy, from the moment their numbers and moral power had risen up to the point of ability to resist, you could not prevent their separation another hour. Between distinct races of men, passions and interests enough to effect this would ever be found ready at hand. But, suppose the experiment to civilize them should fail—as I shall undertake, before I sit down, to show it must—what then would be the situation of the western frontier? Whenever you might happen to be at war with either England or Mexico, or both together, all of which may occur, at least within the range of possibility, not to say probability, in the progress of our history, the enemy has a cordon of savages, extending from the Canadian to the Mexican line. I say the enemy, because while the savage lives on the frontier, you will always find him the enemy; and for this there is no remedy, but to surround and hem him in by your population. The extent of the shocking atrocities that would follow this state of things, no man can estimate. Place around Missouri on the north and west, in conjunction with the two hundred thousand that would be there besides, the sixty or seventy thousand Indians of the Southwest, and what have you done! You have executed, by a single movement, the great plan of Tecumseh, that carried terror and dismay to every cabin beyond the Alleghanies. It was upon these same Indians of the South, that he mainly relied. With them he labored to bring about a concentration of Indian power, not for the purpose of civilization, but to resist and arrest the march of your population, and then to draw a perpetual line of separation between them and us. The savages, by this arrangement, rendered formidable in numbers, and still more so from famine and geographical position, the frontier inhabitants of Missouri would be subject to constant pillage in peace, and the most horrid atrocities in war. Nor, indeed, would the frontier settlers of Illinois and those of the Peninsula of Michigan, be in a situation much more enviable. If the name and the prowess of Tecumseh are so far forgotten here, as to induce us, voluntarily, to concentrate the whole Indian power on the frontier, it is far otherwise in the West—they are not forgotten there. I think, Mr. Chairman, I hazard nothing in saying, that, when at war with either England or Mexico, the whole Indian power would raise the tomahawk and scalping knife against us. The history of the past gives almost certain monition of the future. We have ever found them in alliance against us, and we ever shall, at every favorable opportunity, while they have strength to make an effort for their existence. Their policy towards us has been, and will be, in time to come, the policy of nature and feeling. They know full well that we are the cause of all their calamities, and that, from us alone, they have any thing to fear. The past, the present, and the future, are ever open to their view. When they look back to the Atlantic, and, in the language of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. SMITH,) recall to mind, "that they have been driven from river to river, and from hill to hill, until they have scarce a standing place left," and still see the rising tide of our population sweeping over them with accumulated force, it is natural they should seize upon every opportunity that promises, even by possibility, to arrest their threatened destiny: they will do it, and we deceive ourselves if we think otherwise. But, sir, the consequences to the West, do not terminate with putting in jeopardy its peace and security. Try this experiment of colonization upon the plan proposed, with the proffered pledges and guarantees, and, of all the boundless regions of the West, the Peninsula of Michigan alone would be left, to increase the number of the Western States.

But, Mr. Chairman, passing from this topic, let me direct your attention to the appropriation now proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, and to which the amendment now under consideration applies. The appropriation is asked for, for the avowed purpose of extinguishing the title to the Cherokee lands in Georgia, and to aid in the removal of the Cherokees and other Indians, on this side the Mississippi, to the country west of that river. Gentlemen have said that this procedure is in accord with the established policy of the Government, and that humanity requires, at our hands, the prosecution of that policy. I shall undertake to show, that gentlemen are mistaken in both these propositions. They appeal to the message of 1825, heretofore spoken of, and profess to act upon it, as the basis of the policy now proposed. I am yet to learn, that, when the Executive sends a communication to Congress, recommending legislation on any subject, it is, therefore, to be considered the policy of the Government, until it is sanctioned here. If we look into the subject, it will be seen, that gentlemen are going directly counter to that message. Mr. Monroe, it is true, recommends the removal of the Indians; but he also recommends, in the most impressive manner that not a single step shall be taken towards its accomplishment, until certain preliminary legislation, of the utmost moment to secure their safety, is adopted by Congress. Let me call the attention of the committee to those passages in the message, which contain a general specification of its object, and recommend the mode of its accomplishment.

Mr. Monroe says, "the great object to be accomplished, is the removal of these tribes to the territory designated, on conditions which shall be satisfactory to themselves, and honorable to the United States. This can be done only by conveying to each tribe a good title to an adequate portion of land, to which it may consent to remove; and by providing for it there, a system of internal government, which shall protect their property from invasion; and by the regular progress of improvement and civilization, prevent that degeneracy, which has generally marked the transition from the one to the other state. The digest of such a Government, with the consent of the Indians, which should be endowed with sufficient power to meet all the objects contemplated to connect the several tribes together in a bond of amity; to preserve order in each: to prevent intrusion on their property: to teach them, by regular instructions, the arts of civilized life, and make them a civilized people, is an object of very high importance. It is the powerful consideration which we have to offer to these tribes, as an inducement to relinquish the lands on which they now reside; and to move to those which are designated. With a view to this important object, I recommend it to Congress to adopt, by solemn declaration, certain fundamental principles, in accord with those above suggested, as the basis of such arrangements as may be entered into with the several tribes, to the strict observance of which, the faith of the nation shall be pledged. I recommend it, also, to Congress, to provide by law for the appointment of a suitable number of commissioners, who shall, under the direction of the President, be authorized to visit and explain to the several tribes the objects of the Government; and to make with them, according to their instructions, such arrangements as shall be best calculated to carry those objects into effect."

No digest of Government, or fundamental principles, as here recommended, have been adopted by Congress, as the basis of the arrangements with them in this very important matter to them, as well as to ourselves. In the place of it, we are now presented with this appropriation to allure them across the Mississippi, as fast as possible; and the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs tells us, that a digest of a Government will be brought forward at some future time; but not at the present session, if I understand him right. It cannot be the intention of gentlemen to send them beyond the Mississippi, and then leave them to their fate. But it requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell, that, if they are first taken there, no Government will ever be provided for them afterwards. To carry such a measure through this House, as the organization of a Colonial Government, founded on new principles, will always be a great and difficult work. The policy we are now asked to adopt, of removing them without any previous governmental arrangement for their future regulation, will, if pursued, result in carrying them forward, at a single movement, almost half way to that ocean in which there is too much cause to fear they are destined, ultimately, to terminate their existence and their miseries together. Sir, if we move at all, let us enter upon this business at the beginning. Before they are pushed forward into the wilderness, and there left to anarchy and want, let us present them with an outline, at least, of the Government we intend to institute over them. If their consent is to be obtained, or feelings consulted in this matter, it is surely of some moment to them, when they are about to commit themselves to our hands, to know what laws we intend to impose upon them, as well as the country to which they are to be removed. Within a few years, we have removed some Indian tribes in the mode now proposed, and before we go further, we ought to pause over the miseries and sufferings we have already inflicted upon them. It is our bounden duty to make ample provision to alleviate the distresses of these miserable victims of our cupidity and avarice. Thus far this or any other necessary appropriation shall have my hearty support. But such have been their sufferings, that in my opinion, it would dishonor this House to go a single step further in this work of desolation, until ample and certain means are first provided to prevent a recurrence of similar calamities. Commissioners were sent in the year 1824, to treat with the Florida Indians for their country, who were living in the heart of that Territory in plenty and content. We proposed to send them into the peninsula of Florida; they told us they could not live there, and intreated us to leave them in the enjoyment of their homes, and declared, "that nothing short of force could compel them to go"—[Ex. Doc. 74, 1st sess. 19 Cong., page 29.] We exacted obedience to our demands. With tears and with prayers they threw themselves upon our mercy, and besought us not to drive them from their homes. With prophetic description they pointed out to us the fate we were preparing for them: but all in vain. We told them "they must go." We told them further, (what we are now told,) that in the country we had provided for them, they would be free from the intrusion of the white man, and there they would be rich and happy. In this way we drove them from the land of their nativity. We took from them their cabins and cultivated fields. Our commissioners, moved by their representations, inserted a stipulation in the treaty that, if the country to which they went, did not contain good land enough for them to live upon, their northern boundary, should be extended so as to embrace good land enough for their support. They went, and what followed? It was stated here, two sessions ago, that, out of five thousand who emigrated, fifteen hundred had perished of famine and distress, in the miserable swamps and sands of that peninsula. The voice of their sufferings came up to this House, and we voted $20,000 for their relief. I then had the honor to move a resolution to carry the treaty into effect. And a quantity of land, said to be sufficient to secure them from want, was afterwards assigned them. But it seems their sufferings were not at an end. The gentleman from Florida, but a day or two since, complained that these Indians were plundering his constituents. That, forced into the settlements by hunger, "they must live by plundering, or starve." The gentleman says, it is impossible for them to live where they are, and is for sending them two thousand miles northwest, into regions beyond Missouri, where his constituents will be no longer troubled by them. There, indeed, they might die unheard and unseen: for, rest assured, sir, the frosts of a northern climate would soon cut off the miserable remnant that has survived the famine and pestilence of the sultry swamps they now inhabit. I will point out to the gentleman a nearer and speedier relief for their sufferings—carry the treaty into full and immediate effect. Give them good land enough to live on: for, surely we have long enough delayed to execute the obligations of right, amid the cries of human suffering. And I hope, after this information, that my colleague, the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, will consider that the lives of these perishing men are, in some degree, in his hands; and I invoke him, as a Christian, to see that this treaty is carried into effect. And that I myself may not be wanting in the discharge of the duties of humanity, I will call his attention to the subject on some other suitable occasion. But, sir, the Florida Indians are not the only ones that we have reduced to distress by removal. About the same time, we made a treaty with the Quapaw Indians, a small tribe living in the Territory of Arkansas, and removed them into some distant and inhospitable region, where, when we hear of them at all, it is of the intolerable miseries and famine to which we have subjected them. If other examples of the fruits of this cruel policy are wanting, they are ready at hand. We sent the Delawares, and, perhaps, some other tribes, which lived northwest of the Ohio, across the Mississippi. Let us devote a moment to their condition. My colleague over the way, (Mr. Woods,) yesterday read an extract from a letter of General Clark, the Indian Superintendent beyond the Mississippi, written two years since, in which he speaks of facts within his own knowledge, and as such communicated here in an authentic shape. Speaking of the country where these Indians have been sent, (and to which this appropriation is asked to send more,) he says, "during several seasons in every year, they (the Indians) are distressed by famine, in which many die for want of food, and during which the living child is often buried with the dead mother: because none can spare it so much food as would sustain it through its helpless infancy." It is, sir, to increase the number of these miserable beings beyond the Mississippi, and thus add new and increased distress to these regions of famine, that this appropriation, if granted, is to be in part applied.

To sustain and relieve from suffering those whom we have reduced to distress, is our solemn duty, and so far as this appropriation is to be so applied, it will have, as I have already said, my hearty support. But, sir, the great object of this appropriation is the removal of the Indians. And I appeal to gentlemen to say, whether they can, in their consciences, go forward another step in this work of desolation. A letter from the same gentleman, written a short time since, was also read yesterday, at the request of the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, for the purpose of showing the necessity of making this appropriation. That letter depicts, in language of much feeling, the present sufferings of these unfortunate Indians, whom, he says, we have induced to leave their comfortable homes to go beyond the Mississippi, with assurances of protection and support. The touching appeal of the writer to Congress in their behalf, produced a strong sensation of sympathy upon the committee. The letter, though read as an appeal to that committee, in favor of the appropriation, contains, like all the facts I have adverted to, an unanswerable argument, to show, that with this knowledge before us, we cannot, unless we are totally insensible to human suffering, expend another dollar in seducing these miserable people from their comfortable homes, and which, we have volumes of evidence to show, they are anxious to retain. It also shows, in the same unanswerable manner, the necessity of making ample and speedy provision for those whom we have reduced to suffering and want. I think, Mr. Chairman, I have now shown, that the manner in which we have taken, and now propose to take the Indians beyond the Mississippi, is not only contrary to the mode pointed out and recommended by Mr. Monroe, but that what we have done is a high-handed outrage upon humanity, the further progress of which we are under solemn obligations to arrest. But since gentlemen, during this debate, have asserted that they are proceeding according to the recommendation of the Executive, for the purpose of giving them the full benefit of the assertion, I shall grant they are so proceeding, however incorrect the admission may be, in point of fact, as I have already shown. I shall now maintain, that the plan of colonizing the Indians and establishing a Government over them, and thereby bringing about their civilization, is wholly visionary and impracticable. Let us first look into the argument of gentlemen in its favor, and see what it amounts to. They begin with a moving description of the wretched and degraded condition of the Indians, and assert that they are sinking in intellect, morals, and numbers. All this may be true of some of the tribes; but it is quite the reverse, when asserted of the most populous tribes of the South, as the documents now on our tables, and those that have been sent here for some sessions past, incontestably prove. But, for the purposes of the argument, I shall give gentlemen the benefit of this admission also. They next assert that the white people corrupt and maltreat them. This I shall also admit to be true. From all which, they come to the conclusion that the Indian cannot be civilized in our neighborhood; but that, if taken into some distant region, beyond the influence of our example, he will change his habits, and grow up into civilization. The inferences I shall not admit. I shall not admit that he cannot be civilized in the midst of civilization, and shall deny that under the circumstances in which this experiment is to be made, he can be civilized in the wilderness. Gentlemen maintain, and constantly assert, with all the confidence of an established fact, that, when brought together in the wilderness, and shut out from the influence of our people, they will be civilized. This assumes the whole matter in controversy, and it cannot have escaped the notice of the committee, that no gentleman has undertaken to explain the process by which it is to be done; or, what is of more importance, to state the facts or experience to sustain the assumption. It is, indeed, admitted, that they have neither facts nor experience to guide them in this great experiment of human reformation. We are then thrown back upon the original ground, and compelled to look into the nature of the operation to be performed. What is the character of the people to be changed? They are ignorant, averse to labor, irregular in their habits, and strongly attached to the laws, usages and customs, of their fathers, which it is admitted, must be abolished, and new regulations substituted, to give success to the experiment. Next: What are the processes to be performed, in the execution of this plan? When they are examined in detail, it will be found, their number and complexity are such as to render the experiment altogether hopeless. They must be brought to consent to emigrate, and to abolish their laws and usages. You must purchase their country, and pay for their improvements—buy another country for them, and remove its occupants; induce them to adopt the Government you have provided for them, and put themselves under your control; bring their chiefs to consent to relinquish their power and consequence among their people; remove them through the wilderness, in most cases, several hundred miles; provide supplies of food for them on the way, and, after their arrival in their new country, build their houses, open their farms, supply them with agricultural implements, and animals of domestic use; cause them to desist from the chase, and devote themselves to agriculture and the mechanic arts; establish schools; institute a Government over them, and subject them to its laws and regulations; and, finally, keep up a standing military force among them. This is a general outline of what is proposed to be done, and the machinery to be created, as the means of effecting the civilization of the Indians. Passing over the many and difficult preliminary processes, most of which cannot be executed without force, we will, now, suppose one hundred thousand savages, composed of thirty or forty distinct tribes, or nations, are taken into the wilderness to the place of their destination: How are you to make them relinquish the chase, in a country possessing the strongest allurements to it? Unless they change their habits in this particular, you have effected nothing of any value. They have neither knowledge nor inclination to set themselves at work. And how are you to overcome these impediments, and make them submit to the fatigues of labor? How, in case of irregular supply of food, are you to prevent them from breaking in upon the frontier settlements, as they now do in Florida? If you exclude the whites from coming among them, how are you to supply them with provisions? Who is to build their houses, and open their farms? All these things it is intended the whites shall perform, as well as to instruct them in the mechanic arts and in agriculture. If you cause these things to be done by the whites, you necessarily multiply their intercourse with the Indians far beyond any thing that now exists. The idea, therefore, so fondly cherished by gentlemen, that they shall shut out all intercourse between our people and them, and thereby remove them from the contagion of our example, is wholly erroneous. The very operations which it is intended the whites shall perform, (and which they must perform, if done at all,) show that gentlemen have not looked into the practical workings of their own plan, when they tell us it is necessary to remove them, to get them out of the reach of the contaminating influence of the whites.

To build houses and open farms, is a work of time, and the labor of many hands. You cannot get on with the government, and execute its diversified operations, without great and constant intercourse with the whites—intercourse too with soldiers and other mercenaries. Abuses would spring up, and be practised with impunity, from the utter impossibility of superintending the detailed operations of a distant colonial Government.

So far from your being able to shut out the intercourse of the whites, if it were so much as known to what district the Indians were to remove, no matter how distant the country, my word for it, Mr. Chairman, the pioneers would be there in advance of them; men of the most abandoned and desperate character, who hang upon the Indians to defraud them. You cannot run away from these men, nor shut them out from access to Indians, scattered over the wilderness; for, with the pioneers, the law is a jest, and the woods their element; the farther you go with the Indians, with just so much the more impunity will they set your laws at defiance. Indeed, under this plan, the Indians would be nothing more nor less than poor miserable dependents upon those who governed them and supplied them with food.

But again, sir, by what means are a hundred thousand Indians, spread over the wilderness, bearing towards each other inbred hatred, and implacable animosities; pressed by hunger, and pressing upon each other's means of subsistence, to be reduced to order, regularity, and obedience to law? If my colleague, the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, can do this, he will be justly entitled to go down to posterity with a fame, as a law-giver, more immortal than that of Solon or Lycurgus. He will have done that of which history, either sacred or profane, furnishes no example. It is true, the children of Israel were led out of the wilderness into a land flowing with milk and honey; but, contrary to the Divine example, we propose to lead a whole people, nay, more, the remnants of forty different nations of men, out of a land of plenty, into the wilderness. We cannot make this great and untried experiment upon human life and human happiness, without incurring the most solemn responsibility. Let us examine this experiment in another aspect, and it will be found that it is not in the power of the Government to provide for a hundred thousand inhabitants, some five or six hundred miles in the wilderness. Regular supplies, from the very nature of the country over which they must be carried, could not be transported to them.

There can be but little question, that, to support a hundred thousand people in the wilderness, would cost more than twice as much as to feed double that number at home, where supplies are ready at hand. Whatever was transported to them would, from the labor of transportation alone, be rendered almost as costly as silver, before it arrived at the place of consumption. Take the price of the ration for the Creeks, whom we are now supporting in the woods, at twenty cents a day, as appears from a document from the War Department, laid on our tables a few days since, and the cost of this single item will be found to fall not far short of ten millions per annum. How long would we go on at this rate before we left these poor wretches to perish of hunger? The utter impossibility of introducing any system of economy or accountability into such a department, where the supplies are to be furnished, in such a country, would open a door for fraud and speculation, without any example among us.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the contemplation of this oppressed people in their present abodes. We all agree the time is come, when something ought to be done to rescue them from extinction. And here, gentlemen turn upon us, who oppose them, and ask what we will do. I answer, enlarge the means of improvement you are now employing with acknowledged success, and extend your laws over them. Try the experiment where they are. It will cost but little, and if that fail, there is no danger of bringing distress upon them, or making their condition more desperate. It will then be time enough to try the scheme of colonization, which, it is not contended, has any other advantage than that of getting them out of the way of the corrupting influence of the whites, which I have already shown is a mistaken notion. If the colonization plan is tried first, it will be too late to try the other afterwards. When the step is taken, it cannot be retraced. Gentlemen maintain, that, because the tribes in our neighborhood have not become civilized, that, therefore, they cannot be, unless they are removed at a distance from us.

Many of the tribes have made great and flattering advances in improvement. And now, we are called upon to undo all that we have done, by breaking them up from their very foundation. But what is the argument? It is, that civilization cannot spring up in the midst of civilization. That civilization is a plant that cannot grow beneath the shade of the full-grown tree. Sir, we have done nothing to civilize them in a form that can touch the evil to be corrected; nor have the Indians the intelligence and moral power necessary to reach and correct it, without our aid. The great difficulty now in the way of their improvement, may be traced to the nature of their government, and the tenure of their property. With the exception of the Cherokees, who have lately formed for themselves a constitution on Republican principles, which has given some gentlemen here so much alarm, there is not a single tribe that we do not now find under the same government and usages, that existed on the day when the Pilgrims first landed on our shores. It is the government of the savage, fitted to the savage state, and wholly at war with the rights and usages of civilized man. Efforts at civilization have been made by those who have not had the power to touch and heal this evil. And, until the government of the savage, and the basis upon which he holds his property are broken up, all efforts at civilization, directed either by individuals or by the Government, will and must fail. To expect that they, unaided, will do this, is to require of them more than miracles. Ignorance is everywhere wedded to the usages in which it has grown up; and were they to make the attempt to change their Government, they could not do it. They are without the moral power, knowledge, and experience necessary to make so great an effort—an effort, always great, when and wherever made. They do not know how to set themselves at work; and, if even the chiefs had the necessary knowledge and moral power, they would naturally use it in perpetuating their own influence.

Indian Appropriations—Emigration of Indians.

[H. OF R.]

We cannot reasonably expect they will voluntarily assist in a work of reformation that must end in the extinction of their own consequence. Begin, then, here; take away your whiskey, and extend your laws over them, and see what they will do. Give them the right of individuality of property, and fertilize them with your schools; then, and not till then, will you make an experiment worthy of the name. By so doing, you bring upon them no accumulation of misery and distress, endanger no frontier, excite no sectional jealousy, nor exhaust the Treasury with a wasteful expenditure of public money. Being in the bosom of the country, and separated from each other, their influence would be, comparatively, unfelt. If they can be civilized at all, it must be done by these means; and I cannot subscribe to the declaration so often made, that they feel themselves to be a degraded race, and that our people will always treat them as such.

The Indian has an innate sense of dignity; and those among them who have property, feel their personal importance, and are everywhere treated with respect. Personal dominion over property never fails to impart to its possessor a feeling of personal consequence, and to command for him the respect of others. The poor, naked, and starving Indian, feels a sense of personal degradation, because he is dependent; he is compelled, by his wants, meekly to submit to insult and indignity. But give him property, and make him feel that his means of subsistence are within his own command, and you lift him up at once from his prostrate condition. We have the means ready at hand to try the effect of individuality of property upon him, without costing the Treasury a dollar, or the country a single effort. We have more than a hundred millions of acres of land in market, seeking a buyer from year to year, and finding none. Give to every head of an Indian family the right to go into the Land Offices, and select for himself a half section (320 acres) of land, wherever he pleases, on condition that he settles upon it, and secure it to him by such guards and restrictions as will protect him against the frauds and artifices of the designing, there can be but little doubt that very many, especially among the more improved tribes, would gladly avail themselves of such a provision. In this way, they would place themselves voluntarily under the action and jurisdiction of our laws. All that is proposed to be effected by a removal beyond the Mississippi, is thus brought about, secretly and silently, by a single operation. To do this, the creation of no governmental machinery, or enlargement of Executive patronage is required—we have the whole machinery ready at hand for the operation. Our Land Offices are established, and lands surveyed; or, if the Indians should prefer an apportionment of the country on which they live, our surveying department is already organized to execute the work. Estimating them at a hundred thousand, six and a half millions of acres, out of the hundred millions now in the market, would give to the head of each Indian family three hundred and twenty acres; with it, we make him respectable in point of property, and, what is more, we diffuse them through the country in search of good land, where we should hear no more of their suffering and want.

My colleague (Mr. Woods) yesterday said, that a gentleman from the South, well acquainted with the Indian character, had, on a former occasion, observed to him, "give to an Indian a slave, and you make a man of him." The condition of the Southern Indians, no doubt, fully verifies the truth of the remark. Permit me, sir, to say, by way of modification, give him a farm of 320 acres of land, and you as certainly make a man of him, and a much better man.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, it was always with reluctance that he rose on that floor, to submit any remarks of his. When I look round (said Mr. L.) and see the intelligence by which I am surrounded, I cannot have the vanity to enter the list of competitors for the eclat or distinction which will be awarded to him who makes the greatest display of words on this floor. Nor am I disposed to take a part in the discussions of this House, with a view of encouraging the manufacture of Congressional speeches. I consider that of speech-making one branch of domestic manufacture, or of the American system, if you please, sir, which does not require encouragement or protection. It has already arrived to a maturity, which can enter into fair competition with any country whatever, with a fair prospect of success. But, sir, I stand so connected with this subject in several points of view, that I cannot shrink from addressing the committee on the present occasion.

The two very distinguished gentlemen from Ohio, (Mr. Woods and Mr. VINTON,) who have consumed so large a portion of the time of this committee, in displaying and exhibiting their opposition to the extinguishment of Indian title to lands, and to the removal of the Indians to some eligible situation west of the river Mississippi, have introduced such a mass of foreign matter into this discussion, that they will excuse me in my present state of health, for declining to follow them in all their labored arguments and details upon this subject. The best refutation which can be presented, to all that these gentlemen have said upon this important and interesting subject, will be found in the fact that they stand opposed to the wisdom, the experience, and benevolence, of the whole country. In opposition to all their opinions, doctrines, and reasoning, I will place those of James Monroe, John C. Calhoun, James Barbour, and a host of others, who are experienced and distinguished statesmen and patriots, and who have long deliberated and reflected upon the subject of our Indian policy and relations. These distinguished individuals have all arrived at the same results; that the only hope of saving the remnant tribes of Indians from ruin and extermination, was to remove them from their present abodes, and settle them in a permanent abode west of the Mississippi River.

The views of all our Indian agents, so far as my knowledge extends, coincides with the friends of the emigration plan; and, with very few exceptions, we find the benevolent and pious missionaries, who have long labored for the benefit of this unfortunate race, decidedly in favor of the emigrating plan. One respectable denomination of Christians have memorialized the present Congress on this subject, and urged, with much earnestness and ability, the results of their labors and experience, in favor of the emigration plan; which is the only plan by which the Indian can ever be considered permanently located and settled. Sir, these opinions of wisdom, experience, and piety, I present as a reply to the voluminous details of the two distinguished gentlemen from Ohio, (Mr. Woods and Mr. Vinton.) If the committee, or the country, ask for any further reply to the remarks of these gentlemen, I will refer to the remarks of another gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. McLEAN,) the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. His pertinent and very appropriate remarks, must be impressed upon the recollection of every gentleman who was present yesterday when he delivered them. That gentleman, with all his known vigilance and assiduous attention to the local interest of his immediate constituents, when his duty requires it, enters upon the business of national legislation, with a liberal dignity of purpose which embraces the general interests of the whole country. And, upon this occasion, the brief view which he took of this subject, and the information which he submitted to this committee, is, to my mind, sufficient of itself, to obliterate all the labors of his two colleagues. Sir, the remarks on this subject, submitted by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, reminded me of the saying of the wise man of antiquity: "Words, fitly spoken, are like apples of gold, in pictures of silver."

Gentlemen deny that the policy of this Government is settled, in relation to the question of Indian emigration. I am of a different opinion. Mr. Monroe's Administration marked out the plan, and recommended its adoption in strong terms. The present Administration has continued to urge, upon all fit occasions, the views of its predecessors upon this subject. Congress, I admit, have never sanctioned the plan to the full extent which it has been recommended by the Executive Government. Nevertheless, many acts of legislation might be cited, which were based in the execution of this plan. Look at the various appropriations of money to extinguish Indian title to lands within the States, and to provide for their removal and settlement west of the river Mississippi.

It is true, I am myself in favor of legislating upon a more extended and comprehensive plan, upon this subject. And, with a view to general legislation upon this subject, at an early day of the present session, I introduced a resolution, which was adopted, "instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the removal of all the remnant tribes of Indians, within the limits of any of the States or Territories of this Union, to some eligible situation west of the river Mississippi."

The report of the committee, in answer to this resolution, has long since been made to this House, and is altogether favorable to the objects embraced in the resolution. As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I was, however, disposed to go much further than a mere favorable report. I was disposed to make ample provision for carrying into full effect the emigration plan, and did, accordingly, submit a report and bill to the committee, in lieu of the report which was made to the House. But the majority of the committee preferred the report made to the House, and I felt it my duty to acquiesce.

But, that the time has arrived, when this Government must change its policy in relation to the Indians, appears to me so plain, so clear, and so self-evident, that I cannot see any reason for delay or hesitation. From the commencement of this Government, that is, from the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, this Government has assumed and exercised an almost unlimited control over the Indian tribes settled within our boundaries. It has assumed and exercised the right of legislating for them, in all their most important interests. We have taken the guardianship of them, and treated them as minors, orphans, and persons who were incapable of managing their own estates. And the exercise of this power has heretofore been recognized as legitimate, and has been acquiesced in by the Indians, by the States, and by foreign nations. But, sir, the day has already arrived, when this state of things cannot longer exist. The inefficient course pursued by this Government, in matters in which one of the States has a deep interest, as well as the Indians, has weakened the confidence of the Indians, as well as the State, in this Government, to an extent which has disposed all the parties in interest to look to their own sovereignty for a remedy of the evils under which they are, and have been laboring, "for, lo, these many years."

It is known to every gentleman of this committee that my allusions are directed to the state of things existing between the State of Georgia and the Cherokee Indians, and the Government of the United States. It is a subject, sir, which, after all that has transpired, I can but approach with reluctance. But, as one of the Representatives of that State, and as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, duty impels me to use every effort to draw the attention of the present Congress, and of the nation, to the importance which is necessarily attached to this subject. I feel it my duty to warn this committee, and the nation, of the impending evils which must necessarily grow out of an imbecile course on the part of this Government. I deem it to be unnecessary to enter into all the details of the compact, entered into between Georgia and the United States, in the year 1802. The history of that transaction seems at last to be well understood here, and everywhere else. I know the subject is perfectly understood by every member of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I will avail myself of this opportunity to add, that I have the most entire confidence that every member of that committee are disposed to do justice to Georgia, as well as to the Cherokee Indians. Indeed, from what we daily hear from members on this floor, I cannot doubt but what the long-delayed rights of Georgia upon this subject have gained the attention of the Representatives of the people of this nation—and that the cause of right and of justice will no longer be urged in vain. In relation to the compact between Georgia and the General Government, entered into in 1802, I will briefly state, in a summary way, that whenever Georgia has urged the fulfilment of this compact, the United States have never denied the debt, but urged the plea of inability—alleging that the Indian title could not be extinguished "upon reasonable and peaceable terms." Upon the other hand, Georgia has alleged, and continues to allege, that the very impediments which lie in the way of extinguishment, have been produced by the policy pursued by the United States. But I find, sir, that the feeble state of my health will not admit of my extending my remarks to many important details which I had intended to present to this committee; I will, therefore, again advert to the actual state of things in relation to the Cherokee Indians at the present time.

The Cherokee Indians, who principally reside within the limits of Georgia, have, in the course of the past year, renewed their often-repeated declaration, that they will never—no, never—relinquish their present possessions. They have placed this declaration in a constitutional form; and, with all the formality of a sovereign and independent State, they have set up for themselves. They not only disregard Georgia, and the rights of Georgia, but they have actually enacted laws, and execute them, too, which are in direct violation of the laws of the United States. I have the highest authority for making this statement, which I will submit to the committee.

The Legislature of Georgia, at its last session, have extended the jurisdiction of the criminal laws of that State over the Cherokee country lying within the limits of Georgia, and have added the country to the former counties of the State of Georgia. And, in the State paper of Georgia, printed at the seat of Government, (Milledgeville,) I, this day, see the proclamation of Governor Forsyth, notifying all persons whom it may concern, of the provisions of the act of the Legislature, and requiring obedience and respect to its provisions, and execution from citizens and officers of every grade and description. Now, sir, what must be the result of this anomaly of three separate and distinct Governments, exercising sovereignty of jurisdiction, under conflicting laws enacted by three separate and distinct legislatures, over the same people, and at the same time? and, in some cases, these three distinct sovereign legislatures have enacted laws upon the same identical subjects, which laws do not harmonize in their provisions.

I will give you one or two cases, out of many, which actually do exist, and are in daily conflict. The United States laws prohibit the introduction of spirits into the nation, and, if introduced by a citizen, it is liable to confiscation, with all his packages of goods, &c., the one-half to the informer, and the other to the United States. The Cherokee laws prohibit the introduction of spirits also, under a fine or penalty of one hundred dollars, and a forfeiture of the spirits—one-half to the informer and the other half to the treasury of the Cherokee nation. The laws of Georgia do not prohibit the sale of spirits in large quantities at all; and those who wish to retail, procure a license from the county court for that purpose. Another similar case I will present to the committee. The United States law prohibits peddling in the nation, or selling merchandise at any other than the places designated by the agent; and annexes its fines and forfeitures for a violation of the law. The Cherokee law authorizes any citizen to peddle or trade where they please in the nation, on paying twelve dollars a year to the treasurer of the nation, and one dollar to the officer issuing the license. The laws of Georgia admit of no peddling, without first obtaining a license, for which the applicant pays one hundred dollars a year, which entitles him to peddle and vend his goods anywhere within the limits of the State.

This state of things cannot exist: something must be done, and the sooner it is done the better. It is high time these unfortunate people should know their destiny plainly and positively. They should know precisely in what relation they do stand to the United States, and in what relation they do stand to the particular States in which they reside. A state of suspense is the worst of all cruelty that can be exercised towards this noble race of people. If they are to be resigned to the States and the State laws, I call upon this Congress to tell them so. If we determine upon their emigration to the West, the sooner they know it the better, that they may send their Caleb and Joshuas to search out and view the promised land: for, situated as they now are, and where they are, there is no rest for the sole of an Indian foot.

Mr. WHITE said he felt great reluctance, at all times, in troubling the House with his remarks on any subject, and more especially at this moment, when its patience must be exhausted by the elaborate discussion of the bill under consideration. He would not have taken part in the debate on the present motion, if the gentleman from Ohio had not made some observations on the condition of the Florida Indians, and suggested a mode of relief, which, in his opinion, it was not within the power of Congress to grant. Before I go into that subject, however, said Mr. W., I will say a word or two on the singular course of this debate. The Committee of Ways and Means have reported a bill for the Indian service, which, among other things, provides an appropriation of money to enable the President of the United States to send exploring parties of Indians from the east to the west side of the Mississippi River, to examine the country. This exploration may, or may not, be followed by treaties of cession of their lands on the east side, for lands on the other. If treaties are formed consequent upon the examination made by them, it must be by their own consent, so long as the United States pursue their present policy. The two gentlemen from Ohio have discussed this question, not as a proposition to obtain information, by this unfortunate race, to see whether their condition may not be bettered, by an exchange from their present deplorable situation, to one more congenial to their nature, and better adapted to their habits of life. They appear to discuss it as if it were a proposition for their removal, without respect to their inclinations or rights. One motion to strike out having failed, the gentleman who has addressed the House with so much zeal and ability to day, proposes an amendment that none of the Indians, south of 36 deg. 30 min. north latitude, shall be removed north of that line. Sir, the gentleman well knows that the United States own but a small portion of Territory, if any, south of that line, which is not within the limits of the States and Territories. If he supposes that we do not understand that the object of his amendment is to destroy the effect of the appropriation, he gives us less credit for perspicacity, than we accord to him. We understand this, as well as we do the ultimate objects he has in view, in proposing the amendment. It would not have been mistaken, if something about the formation of new States and Territories, and the balance of power, had not fallen from him. The United States are acknowledged to be the undisputed owner of all the Territory north of Arkansas, and west of Missouri, to the Rocky Mountains. Now, sir, if it should be ascertained that the miserable remnant of the Aborigines of this Continent could find, in that extensive wilderness, a home remote from the white settlements, before the advances of which they have withered and decayed, is it consistent with our policy, or that long-sighted humanity that I trust will always characterize the course of this Government, to prevent them from enjoying it, upon mere political calculations? It is acknowledged, by every man who understands any thing of our Indian relations, that they are more indolent, vicious, and worthless, in the vicinity of the whites, than remote from them. They imitate all the bad habits of the worst part of our population. They are, in some measure, emancipated from the restraint of their own Government, such as it is, by the facilities afforded them of retreating to the white settlements. They lose the native independence of the savage, and, instead of imitating the white man, in any thing which is proper, they lose all energy, become drunkards and vagabonds, and depend more on stealing from the whites, to save them from starvation, than the chase. Whether from nature or habit, their indolence in every situation is invincible, except only in the pursuits of their fathers handed down to them by tradition. I need not tell this House that their subsistence is derived from hunting principally, and as their hunting grounds are diminished, by the encroachments of the white population in the State, that their diminution has been in the same ratio; and all concur that, in their present condition, reduced as they are to such limits, it must progress until they are utterly extirpated. They are rapidly melting away—no one can deny this—and the question is, how is this doom to be averted? The present policy must result in their annihilation. Is it better to pursue the course recommended by that excellent man and profound statesman the late President of the United States, as the result of his matured experience, to colonize them to the west of the Mississippi, or to leave them the annoyance of their neighbors, in their perishing condition, where they now are? Are the benevolent objects proposed for the Indians themselves, the peace and quiet of your citizens, in the States where they are, the rights of property, the protection the Government is bound to afford to the persons and property of the people to the South, to be entirely disregarded, or counterbalanced by the prospect of multiplying new States and Territories west of the Mississippi? This is the true question. There is no disguising it. Sir, I cannot believe that a majority of this House can leave the most exposed part of the United States subject to the constant annoyance and depredations of this half-starved erratic race, and ready, at all times, to be operated upon by a foreign enemy to destroy our frontier settlements. Notwithstanding the evils of which we justly complain, and the strong claim we have on the Government, to change their policy in relation to the Indians, this bill only proposes to furnish the means of an examination, for their own benefit and for ours. For one, I think the practice of negotiating with Indians a solemn farce. I think it is our right and our duty to assert the superiority which all civilized nations have exercised over savage; and with that view, I introduced a resolution, two years ago, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of subjecting the Indians to our absolute control. I think that ought now to be the course, and let our legislation be dictated by humanity. They are, and ought to be, considered minors, and governed as such. Of this, however, it is not proper here now to speak. The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Woods,) upon the amendment he proposed, took occasion kindly to suggest to me a relief for the Florida Indians, by restoring to them the country they had prior to the late treaty. I do not doubt his sincerity, and am perfectly satisfied he would be glad to see the country restored to them. If he means the country owned by them by any title, absolute or qualified, such as other Indians possess within our limits, my answer is, that nothing would be restored to them. If the gentleman means the lands over which they hunted, and, in one sense, occupied, before that treaty, I answer, that you would restore to them the whole country between Pensacola and the St. Johns, about three hundred and fifty miles in extent. If the Indians were the owners of all this country, how did the United States ever commit the egregious folly of negotiating with Spain for it? The gentleman from Ohio who last addressed the committee, (Mr. Vinton,) has gone more into detail as to the Florida Indians. He has pledged himself to introduce a resolution requiring the Committee on Indian Affairs to report a bill for the extension of the northern boundary line, and has alluded, in terms of reprobation, to the manner in which that treaty was negotiated and carried into execution. This is not the first time that this subject has been introduced here, and I feel it due to the Territory I represent, and to myself, to give some explanation of the matter. If the gentleman had referred to the documents communicated to Congress on the 28th of January, 1823, and among the Executive papers of the second session of the Seventeenth Congress, he would have seen a very different picture of these Indians, than that presented to him by some officer to whom he alluded. If he will look to the official reports of the agents then charged with this business, he will find, that, instead of being a contented, happy, and industrious people, that they are represented to be "very poor, very lazy, and great beggars," loving the English, and hating the Americans; "as lawless freebooters, among whom runaway slaves find a refuge," and to have been governed by the negroes among them. They were further represented, so early as 1821, when Florida was surrendered to the United States, and long before that time, in possession of that vast extent of country on the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico, with all its game, to have been reduced to great extremities for the want of food, and to have plundered the frontier settlements of Georgia and Alabama. The gentleman, after having presented this view to the House, states that he is informed that, since the treaty was forced upon them, about 1,500 per annum have died of starvation. I do not know from whence this information was derived, but I am informed, upon good authority, that their number has not diminished more than five hundred since the treaty, which is four years gone by, and a part of them have returned to the Creek nation, from which they were fugitives, and the others have perished for want of food. If the suggestions of the Governor of Florida, Gen. Jackson, in 1821, had been adopted, the people of that country would have been saved their present grievances on this account, and the humanity of some persons would not have been shocked by the spectacle alluded to. He recommended that the Creeks who had run away from their nation, during the war, should all be compelled to return, and that the natives of the country should be disposed of as justice and humanity might dictate. He recommended that all of them should be removed from the country. Whatever may have been the title of the aboriginal Indians to any portion of Florida, which I shall examine presently, no one can pretend that the fugitive Creeks, under McQueen and Francis, who run into that country under the enticements of British agents, to continue the war, became proprietors of the soil. When the Indians called on General Jackson, he demanded the number and names of their towns, and the population of each, and from what parts of the country they removed; which was given, and communicated in the documents I have mentioned. After enumerating a number of towns, there is this emphatic declaration, to which I invite the attention of the gentleman: "The greater part of all these fled from the upper Creeks, when peace was given to that nation." These are that peaceful, happy, contented, and prosperous people, whose violated rights excites so much commiseration—and yet, these fugitives, freebooters, and vagabonds, who did not pretend, in the presence of General Jackson, to claim any lands whatever, but threw themselves on his clemency, on the mercy of the Government, are parties to this treaty. But, sir, to recur to the title of the Florida Indians—I mean the natives: They are the fragments of several tribes, which have more nearly approximated that destiny to which all seem to be doomed—final extinction—unless they are removed to the west of the Mississippi. What claim they had, is difficult to be determined. The Spanish Government, it is believed, never acknowledged any absolute ownership in the Indians within the limits of their provinces. They have gone somewhat farther than we have in limiting their rights. The United States, by their act of disfranchisement, have declared all sales of the Indians, only to themselves, void, and it may be asserted, that their policy, like that of most Governments, was regulated by their power. In 1784, shortly after the retrocession by the British Government of the Floridas to Spain, a treaty was formed between the Indians then in Florida, and his Catholic Majesty, in which they are incorporated as Spanish subjects, promised allegiance, and are to be protected in the lands they occupy, which was construed, afterwards, by Spain, to be their farms and villages, to be usufructuary interest, and they tenants at will of the Spanish king, and any sale of theirs without the assent of the Spanish authorities, would be a relinquishment of possession, and not soil. Spain permitted them to sell, in several instances, the lands they occupied, but the sales were of course to be ratified by the legitimate authorities of the king, which demonstrates that it was a title sub modo. When these documents were submitted to this House, and referred to the Committee of Indian Affairs, they made a report declaring their opinion, that, as a nation, the Indians owned no lands in Florida—that they were incorporated as Spanish subjects, and, like all others, could obtain grants. This report was then concurred in. I admit that the instructions of the Secretary of War, under which the treaty was negotiated, was a partial recognition of some right in them; but, whether absolute, qualified, or possessory, is not indicated. If the view taken by General Jackson, and by the Committee of Indian Affairs, be correct, we were not bound to negotiate with them at all. They were the subjects of legislation, not of treaty. Whatever diversity of opinion may exist as to the nature and extent of the title of the natives, however, no one will pretend that these fugitive Creeks, by seeking a hiding-place in Florida to carry on the war, had any right of soil—and yet they are there; and we are asked to restore them to their rights, or to extend the northern limit of the treaty among our own population, for their benefit. Spain ceded the provinces to the United States in full property. They had no right, before we held a treaty with them; that treaty gives them four millions thirty-two thousand acres of land. It is reported they cannot live within the boundary; an application was made to Congress to extend it; the bill failed, and the Secretary of War, under one of the articles of the treaty, after the adjournment of Congress, upon the application of the agent, removed the line so far north, as to cover twenty thousand acres of sugar land, upon a part of which there are private grants made by the Spanish Government, and confirmed by the United States. I have said it is not in the power of Congress to extend this line. There is no good land between the present limit and the Georgia line, that it is not covered by Spanish grants, the most of which have been confirmed by the United States. The treaty with Spain, prior in date, binds the United States to confirm them, and the Constitution of the United States protects the rights of individuals against any power under this Government. These claims are confirmed by act of Congress, and I ask what authority we have to extend an Indian boundary over the land of an individual, whose right is fortified by treaty, by the constitution, and by our own law? The deplorable condition to which these Indians have sometimes been reduced, cannot be ascribed to the small quantity of land which they have. It has its origin in other causes. The only articles ever cultivated by them, or most generally cultivated, are corn and peas, and neither the soil nor climate is adapted to that cultivation. I do not hesitate to pronounce that, under this article of the treaty, by which this Government is alleged to have power to remove this line, if it were removed up to the limits of Georgia there would not be good land enough, under their modes of culture, or habits of life, to supply that number of men with a sufficient quantity of corn; and yet, with the economy, care, and skill, of a well-informed agriculturist, a few thousand acres of such land as we have west of the Mississippi, would supply their wants. You must produce a radical reform in their habits, a revolution of their modes of life, before they will live by agriculture anywhere; and the difficulties are always increased, as the soil and climate interpose barriers to such an object. The Indian population in the Floridas is about four thousand. The agents, in the documents referred to, say that two-thirds are Creeks—the most of whom fled at the period I have adverted to, and others for bad conduct; and I should be satisfied to restore these to their former country—I mean the Creek lands; or to incorporate the whole with the emigrating party, which it is the duty of this Government to do. I intended to have said something more on the subject of their colonization, but am admonished, by the lateness of the hour, of the impropriety of going into that now. I will only say that I consider it required by policy, justice, and humanity. It is alike due to ourselves, and to the Indians; and I trust the day is not distant, when the plan of that practical statesman and benevolent man who is the author of it, may be carried into execution.

[Here the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House.]

THURSDAY, February 21.

Nearly the whole of this day was spent in discussing the several amendments offered in Committee of the Whole to the Military Appropriation Bill. The bill was finally ordered to a third reading.

SATURDAY, February 23.

The Claim of Mr. Meade.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House now go into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Richard W. Meade, [who claims nearly half a million of dollars, being the amount of his demand upon the Spanish Government, acknowledged and liquidated by that Government, but not allowed by the American Board of Commissioners under the Florida treaty, for want of the original documentary testimony, all of which was in Spain. The bill proposes to empower the Attorney-General of the United States, and any two of the auditors, to examine and decide upon this claim, under the same rules, and according to the same principles, as were observed by the Commissioners under the Florida Treaty, in examining and deciding upon other claims.] The motion prevailed—ayes 96, noes 27.

Mr. EVERETT stated that this bill was accompanied by a report, and a selection of documents, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. These papers had been for some time on the tables of gentlemen, and were, at any rate, too voluminous to be read. He would endeavor briefly to state to the committee the leading facts and points of the case, reserving to himself, and to the gentlemen with whom he had the honor to be associated, in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, an opportunity of hereafter submitting such further views and arguments on its merits, as the course of the discussion might require. This important and interesting claim, (continued Mr. E.,) arises, as is doubtless well known to the committee, under the provisions of the Treaty between the Governments of the United States and Spain, which was signed on the 22d of February, 1819. Negotiations of an exceedingly complicated, protracted, and, I may add, vexatious character, had subsisted between the two Governments, for a long course of years. Various demands and pretensions were advanced on either side: and the long-desired accommodation and settlement were finally effected, by a mutual renunciation of several of these demands, respectively, on the part of the two Governments for themselves and on behalf of their citizens and subjects. The renunciation, by the United States, of claims against Spain, was expressed in five specifications in the ninth article of the treaty. The four first of these specifications extend to classes of matters capable by their nature of being particularized as such; and the fifth extends to "all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty."

The committee perceive that no description could be more broad, as respects the nature of the claims. It carries with it but two limitations, neither of which touches the origin and source of the claims. It requires only that they fall within August 11th, 1802, and February 22, 1819, and that statements of them soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, should have been presented either at the Department of State, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain. This is the main foundation of Mr. Meade's claim. All the demands, of which it is made up, as proposed to be provided for by the committee, arose after the date of the convention of 1802, and prior to the signature of the treaty of 1819, and statements of it, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, had been presented both to the Minister of the United States in Spain, and to the Department of State in this country; to the latter, a short time before the signature of the treaty, and with the express purpose of thus fulfilling what it was supposed might be a preliminary condition, necessary to its being included in the provisions of the treaty. These facts (said Mr. EVERETT) are substantiated in the papers appended to the report of the committee, to which I will, therefore, only in general refer.

It may be added, though I would not admit, in all cases, this rule of interpretation of treaties, that it has been declared by the two functionaries who negotiated the treaty—by the Secretary of State of the United States, (now the Chief Magistrate,) and by Don Onís, the Representative of the Spanish Government—that Mr. Meade's claims were understood, and intended by them to be included under the provisions of the treaty. This fact, therefore, may be assumed as certain.

What, then, was the remedy provided by the treaty for those citizens of the United States, whose claim to relief from Spain had been renounced? It was as follows: A fund of five millions of dollars was provided by the United States in the eleventh article of the same treaty, in order to make satisfaction to their citizens for the claims against Spain, which had been renounced. To ascertain the amount and validity of these claims, a Board of three Commissioners was provided for, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, which Board, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, should receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims, included within the descriptions of the ninth article of the treaty.

Mr. Meade was among the earliest of the claimants who applied for relief to the Board thus constituted. In January, 1822, he presented his case to them, by a memorial, setting forth the principal facts contained in it; and, in the close, submitting two questions to the Board; first, "Whether his claims be not clearly comprehended in the list of renunciations declared on the part of the United States, in the ninth article of the treaty?—and, secondly, whether, being so comprehended, your memorialist be not entitled to a substantive and full satisfaction of his claim, whatever may be the pro rata allowance to the general mass of the claimants, out of the specific fund provided by the treaty?"

The commissioners appear at first to have inclined to the opinion, that claims of citizens of the United States, growing out of contracts with the Spanish Government, were not intended to be provided for by the treaty; and as a considerable part of Mr. Meade's claim, and of other claims grew out of such contracts, they were at first disposed to reject them on that ground. Inasmuch, however, as a large amount of property might be affected by such a decision, and, still more, as it might possibly involve the good faith of the United States, pledged by the treaty to a foreign Government, and to the citizens of the United States, the commissioners addressed an official inquiry to the Secretary of State (who had negotiated the treaty on the part of the United States) whether claims founded on contracts were intended to be excluded. By direction of the President, the Secretary of State returned an answer in the negative, and informed the commissioners, that, "in providing for the claims of the citizens of the United States on Spain, by the treaty of the 22d February, 1819, it was not understood nor intended by the Government of the United States, nor, as is believed, by the other party to the treaty, that claims arising from contract, as they existed at the signature of the treaty, should be excluded from the benefit of the treaty."

The Board had likewise submitted to them, evidence equally authentic, that such was the opinion of the other party to the treaty, viz: the Spanish Minister and the Government which he represented. They accordingly decided, on the 27th of June, 1822, that Mr. Meade's memorial should be "received," as one reciting a claim which was considered as being included in the provisions of the treaty. This term "received," it is to be observed, is a technical term, as used by the Board, and was applied to claims which were admitted to be examined and liquidated; among those provided for by the treaty. And in this sense of the word, the commissioners, after due advisement, as already stated, received the memorial of Mr. Meade. This was the first question, pro-

Touching the second point, viz: the amount of his claim, and the evidence necessary to establish it, difficulties unfortunately arose, which have, thus far, resulted in depriving Mr. Meade of all benefit of the treaty, and which constitute a case of extraordinary hardship. Mr. Meade's claims on Spain, consisted of several items, accruing at different periods, and complicated by partial settlements, by delayed payments, by demands for personal injuries, and (in point of fact, not of justice) by the political events of the time. He had prosecuted his suit for a final adjustment and settlement of these claims, by the Spanish Government, for several years, and with various success, amidst the vexatious delays too apt to attend the adjustment and settlement of large private claims, under all Governments; aggravated, in the present case, by the embarrassed condition of the Spanish monarchy. At the period of the signature of the Florida treaty, Mr. Meade's claim was in suit, before the Spanish Government, but still unliquidated. The efforts of Mr. Meade were, however, continued, without abatement, till, at length, on the 19th of May, 1820, the Spanish Government, after a most deliberate and solemn examination, according to its own approved official forms, concluded the adjustment and liquidation of these claims, and acknowledged itself indebted to Mr. Meade, on his own account, in the sum of 373,879 dollars, including therein, a sum of 75,000 dollars as damages and losses, arising from wrongful imprisonment; and, on account of the debts due to him as the agent of others, 117,278 dollars, (omitting parts of a dollar in each sum;) and granted to him a certificate, under the hand of the royal Commissioners of Liquidation, of the Minister of Finance, and under the Royal seal, acknowledging the said debts accordingly.

It was in this form of liquidation and acknowledgment, by the Spanish Government, that Mr. Meade presented his claim to the American Board of Commissioners under the Florida treaty, soliciting the substantive and full allowance and payment of the same.

The Board of Commissioners, however, took a different view of the case. They were authorized to allow and pay only such claims as were renounced in the treaty; and the renunciations in the treaty were bounded in time by the day of the signature, viz: 22d of February, 1819. Considering the Royal Spanish certificate, therefore, as creating in itself a claim, it was inadmissible, under the terms of the treaty, because it bore date more than a year subsequent to the signature of the treaty. Considering it only as evidence of the amount and validity of claims existing previous to the signature of the treaty, it was inadmissible, because the American Board of Commissioners was the only tribunal, clothed with power, by the treaty, "to decide upon the amount and validity of the claims," and

"to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same." In the discharge, therefore, of the duty, under the stipulations of the treaty, and in justice to all the other claimants, whose demands were subjected to the same ordeal, the Board of Commissioners, on the 27th of June, 1823, at the same time that they received Mr. Meade's memorial, as reciting a claim, within the provisions of the treaty, rejected the Royal Spanish certificate, as evidence of its amount and validity.

The decision threw on Mr. Meade the necessity of establishing the amount and validity of his claim, by procuring the original vouchers from Spain. Anticipating, from the letter of the Secretary of State, already mentioned, that the commissioners would reject the Royal Spanish certificate, Mr. Meade had already, in April, 1823, addressed a letter to Mr. Anduaga, the representative of Spain in this country, apprising him of the fact of the probable rejection of the certificates, and praying him "to become my (Mr. Meade's) mediator with his Catholic Majesty, to obtain for me all the documents, vouchers, and evidence, whatsoever, in the possession and under the control of Spain, appertaining to my demands, that I may prepare them in case of need for exhibition to the commissioners."

It may here be observed, as appears by the same letter of Mr. Meade, that the original vouchers and documents, by which many of his demands were supported, had been delivered up by him to the Spanish Government, upon a formal requisition to that effect; and that, in some instances, the records and papers of certain of the Spanish officers furnished material evidence upon the subject. It is also further very important to be observed, that, by the eleventh article of the treaty, it was provided as follows: "that the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims, according to principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of the 27th of October, 1795."

Mr. Anduaga, the Minister of Spain, appears to have communicated to his Government the request for vouchers, thus made by Mr. Meade, in April, 1823, and in October, 1823, in answer to a second letter from Mr. Meade, to the same purport as his first, Mr. Anduaga, taking a tone somewhat lofty, it must be confessed, wrote a letter to Mr. Meade, in which he stated, "that the Spanish Government will regard as a serious insult, that what, in Spain, is acknowledged as most sacred and respectable, should here be pronounced of no value; that it will never consent to have questioned the legality and purity, with which your liquidation was made, and which is accompanied by all the marks of authenticity which it can give it; and, in fine, though it should be practicable to re-unite all the documents, upon which that liquidation was made, his Catholic Majesty knows too well what is due to his own dignity, to the reputation of his Ministers, and to the integrity of his tribunals, to consent that a foreign commission shall deem itself authorized to revise their decrees."

After receiving this reply from the Spanish Minister, Mr. Meade addressed another memorial to the Board of Commissioners, informing them of the attempt which he had made to procure his vouchers from Spain, and of its failure; expressing the hope, that, in his failure, and under the circumstances of the case, the Board would not persist in considering as inadmissible the Spanish certificate of liquidation; but, in the event that they should persist in so considering it, soliciting their interposition to procure a formal demand of the vouchers, to be made by the American Government on the Government of Spain, conformably with the stipulations of the eleventh article of the treaty.

The Board persisted in considering the Spanish certificate of liquidation as inadmissible; but acceded to Mr. Meade's request, that a formal demand of the original papers should be asked by the Board of the Government of the United States, and through that Government, be made on Spain. Accordingly, on the 18th of April, 1823, the commissioners forwarded to the Secretary of State, a specific list of the documents and elucidations required by Mr. Meade, in pursuance of the provisions of the treaty, that "the said documents were to be specified, when demanded at the instance of said commissioners."

The Secretary of State, in compliance with this request, instructed Mr. Nelson, then about departing from the United States as their Minister at the Court of Madrid, to present this specified list of papers to the Spanish Government, and to claim the delivery of them, under the stipulations of the treaty. The committee will recollect the delays with which the mission of Mr. Nelson was attended. On arriving off Cadiz, that port was found blockaded by a French squadron, and he was not permitted to enter. Several months elapsed before he reached the Court of Madrid, and entered on the discharge of the duties of this mission. It appears that the formal application for the papers of Mr. Meade was made by Mr. Nelson on the 19th of December, 1823, in a letter addressed to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo, first Secretary of State. In this letter, Mr. Nelson urged a prompt and immediate attention to the several demands of papers, which had been presented on behalf of Mr. Meade and other claimants, on the ground that the Boards created under the Florida Treaty were of limited duration, and that the interest of individuals entirely depended on the records asked to be furnished. On the 11th and 25th of February, 1824, Mr. Nelson renewed, in a letter to Count Ofalia, the demand of the papers, which he had addressed, on the 19th of December, to the Marquis of Casa Yrujo. The delivery of the papers was promised by the Count Ofalia, in a letter bearing date 8th March, 1824; but owing to various circumstances connected with the state of Spain, delays arose in fulfilling the promise.

Meantime, the three years, fixed by the treaty as the period of the commission, drew near a close, and, on the 29th day of May, 1824, (ten days before the termination of the commission,) the Board decided that the evidence produced was not sufficient to establish the validity of any claims upon the Spanish Government, within the meaning of the treaty, upon account of the matters mentioned in the memorial of Mr. Meade, and they were accordingly rejected. Such is a brief statement (pursued Mr. EVERETT) of the case, presenting Mr. Meade to the consideration of Congress, under the following circumstances: He was a claimant for a large amount on the Government of Spain, and his claims were of a character, deemed by that Government to be in the highest degree meritorious. It is acknowledged by the authorized representatives of the Government, both of the United States and Spain, that they intended to make provisions for its payment, under the stipulations of the treaty. No one, I think, can doubt, who will examine the documents before the committee, that (in the language of the Hon. H. L. WHITT, one of the commissioners, in his opinion delivered April, 1823) "Mr. Meade had claims upon the Spanish Government, which that Government felt itself bound to satisfy." There can be, of course, as little doubt, that, could Mr. Meade have received (as he had a right to receive) his original documents and vouchers from Spain, some part at least of these claims would have been allowed and paid. In presenting his claim to the Board, under the advisement of the ablest counsel, he naturally offered, as very strong and authentic testimony of the amount and validity of his claim, the Royal official certificate of liquidation and acknowledgment of debt. Reason being given him to think, that, under the limitations and restrictions of the treaty, this kind of evidence would be deemed inadmissible by the Board, he applied to the Representative of the Spanish Government in this country, earnestly requesting to be furnished with the vouchers and documents which had been taken from him by the Spanish Government, after the liquidation of his claim. This demand was made by Mr. Meade immediately on receiving the intimation that the royal certificate of liquidation would probably not be admitted, and more than two years before the expiration of the commission. This demand was rejected, and even with expressions of indignation, by the Spanish Minister, speaking on behalf of his Government. Mr. Meade then makes a more formal demand, through his Government, nearly fourteen months before the close of the commission, for the vouchers and documents needed to substantiate his claim, but, in like manner, without success; and his claims are rejected, for want of sufficient evidence to support them.

Mr. Meade, therefore, has been deprived of his rights under the treaty. He had a right to his portion of the fund, as far as his claim should be substantiated; and to substantiate it, he had a right to all the documents and elucidations necessary for that purpose, and in the possession of Spain. He did not fail in anything which he could do, in order to the enjoyment of these rights. He demanded his papers from Spain at the earliest moment he had any reason to think they would be wanted, more than two years before the expiration of the commission; and in a manner not inconsistent with any of its provisions. At a later period, but still at a time when, if it had been instantly complied with, he might have received the benefit of his vouchers, he procured a formal demand of his papers from the Spanish Government. He could do no more. His Government alone could compel Spain (if compulsion were necessary) to furnish the papers. Though Spain was bound to furnish them, she was bound to the Government of the United States, and not to Mr. Meade. The Government of the United States by renouncing and cancelling his claim on the Spanish Government, bound itself to Mr. Meade to secure him in the enjoyment of all the stipulations of the treaty, among them the use of his vouchers, to be furnished by Spain; and contracted an obligation to make the demand of these papers effectual. He could not, of course, make that demand effectual himself. He could not go to Spain, and compel her to open her archives. He could go only to his own Government, and solicit her to cause them to be opened. He did so; and his own Government, having announced his claim on Spain, must cause them to be opened. I do not say that either Government has failed in its duty. That is a subsequent question, to be settled, which it will be time enough to agitate, when a liquidation of Mr. Meade's claim shall have shown the extent of the injury accruing from the failure of Spain promptly to furnish the papers. Meantime, Mr. Meade has certainly a right to be put on as good a footing as he would have stood upon had he enjoyed the right stipulated to him by the treaty—the right of using his original papers.

But the three years have elapsed, and the commission has expired. What, then, can be done? The Committee of Foreign Affairs have known no other way in which they can provide a remedy for Mr. Meade than to approximate, as nearly as possible, to the extension of the former commission, that is, to create a new tribunal, to examine, and liquidate the claim, on the same principles as those which governed the decision of the other Boards; and to allow to Mr. Meade the same proportion of his claim as was allowed to the other claimants, to be paid by the United States in the first instance, because the United States contracted an obligation with Mr. Meade to secure him in the enjoyment of all the privileges of the treaty; and ultimately by Spain, if it shall appear that Mr.

Claim of Mr. Meade.

[H. OF R.]

Meade and the United States have not failed, on their part, in doing any thing proper to be done by them, to procure the papers from Spain.

The committee have proposed, in composing the Board, that it shall consist of the Attorney-General and two Auditors. Their object in introducing this law officer of the Government into the Board, was to protect the rights of the United States in the discussion and settlement of all questions of a legal nature which might present themselves in the examination and liquidation of these claims. In all other respects, the Board is, as nearly as circumstances required or permitted, identical with the first. The second section of the bill provides, that it shall proceed on the same principles of examination as those which governed the former Board, and that there shall be paid to Mr. Meade the same proportion of what may be found valid in his claim (between 92 and 93 per cent. of the principal and no interest) as was paid to the other claimants. The third section is in blank, and proposes a suitable compensation for the Attorney-General and Auditors employed on this extra duty. At a proper stage of the consideration of the bill, I shall have the honor to make a motion to fill the blank.

With this brief development of the subject, I shall, at present, leave it. I have not attempted, certainly have not succeeded, in giving it a discussion commensurate with its importance. It is an extensive subject, capable of being connected with many great questions. Justice, I have no doubt, will be done to it by other members of this committee, and especially by gentlemen with whom I have the honor to be connected in the Committee of Foreign Affairs. It was but yesterday that it became probable that the bill would be called up to-day. I have only aimed, therefore, under the circumstances, at a brief introduction of the case to the favorable notice of the committee. I cannot, however, sit down without expressing the earnest hope, that the committee will be disposed to pursue to a close the consideration of this subject, and to do, what I regard, as an act of long-delayed justice.

Mr. POLK, said that, having been a member of the committee that reported this bill, and differing in opinion with a majority of that committee, he felt it to be his duty to assign the reasons which would induce him to vote against it. For a series of years previous to the signature of the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, between the United States and Spain, the present claimant (Meade) had set up a claim against the Government of Spain, for a very large amount. He had pressed his claim on that Government unsuccessfully. All his efforts to obtain a liquidation of it, or even a recognition of its justice, had proved unavailing. The sum claimed by Mr. Meade was little less than half a million of dollars. Having despaired of obtaining satisfaction of his demands by his own individual exertions, he sought the interposition of his Government in his behalf. The kind offices of the Government, through its Minister resident at Madrid, were interposed in its behalf, but without effect. Before the signature of the treaty, "Mr. Meade desired that provision for his claim should be made in the treaty which was then negotiating; and made known this desire to the Government of the United States." A general statement of his claim was filed with the Secretary of State, and with the American Minister resident at the court of Spain. The treaty was finally concluded and signed on the 22d of February, 1819, and by its provisions was to be ratified by the two Governments within six months from that day. By the terms of the treaty, the two Governments respectively renounce to the other, certain enumerated and specified classes of claims of its own citizens on the other; and assume the payment of its own citizens under certain limitations and conditions. The 5th renunciation of the 9th article of the treaty is—"the renunciation of the United States will extend"—"5th. To all claims of citizens of the United States under the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty." By the 11th article of the treaty, the United States stipulate to pay the claims of its own citizens on Spain embraced in the renunciations of the treaty, not to an unlimited amount, but "to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars." By the same article of the treaty, it is provided that a Board of Commissioners composed of three citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who should convene at Washington, and within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, should examine and decide on the validity of all such claims within the renunciations of the treaty, as should be presented to them. It was made the duty of the said commissioners "to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same." The Spanish Government entered into the following stipulation, to wit: "And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties, of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners." These are the provisions of this treaty, which have particular application to this claim. It will be remembered that this treaty was not ratified by Spain, within the six months limited for its ratification. The United States did ratify it on their part within the six months. Spain, long after the limitation had expired, to wit, on the 24th of October, 1820, ratified it on her part; and in the act of ratification, she declared "that the present ratification be as valid and firm, and produce the same effects, as if it had been done within the determined period." The United States ratified it a second time on the 23d February, 1821, and it then became obligatory on the parties. In the year 1820, just before the treaty was ratified by Spain, but after it was known that the Cortes had advised its ratification, and when the Government of Spain had determined to ratify it, Mr. Meade's claim, towards which a favorable ear had never before been given by that Government, was directed to be liquidated, evidently with the expectation, on the part of Spain, that, when liquidated, it was to be paid by the United States and not by Spain. The claim was accordingly liquidated by the Spanish officers, for the sum of $491,153 62, without the privy or knowledge of the United States. Of this gross sum, acknowledged to be due to Mr. Meade, evidently in a spirit of great liberality by the Spanish officers, under the delusive impression that their own Government was not to pay it, is an item of $75,000 for the imprisonment of Mr. Meade—an occurrence in the history of that period that must be familiar to every gentleman here. It is not material, however, here to notice the various items composing this gross sum. This liquidation, then, of Mr. Meade's claims, was made by the Spanish Government, between the signature of the treaty, and its final ratification by Spain. It was made, too, after the six months limited for its ratification had expired. This is the claim, and for the enormous amount of $491,153 62, which Mr. Meade afterwards presented (as I shall presently notice more particularly) to the Board of Commissioners, under the treaty, and which the Board rejected, on the "ground that the evidence produced was not sufficient to establish the same." This is the claim embraced in the bill now before us.

The commissioners were regularly appointed, according to the provisions of the treaty, and commenced their session at Washington, on the 8th of June, 1821. On the 6th of January, 1822, Mr. Meade presented his claim to the Board of Commissioners, and offered as evidence to support it, this Spanish liquidation, made long after the signature of the treaty. The commissioners at first inclined to the opinion that claims founded on contract, such as Meade's was alleged to be, were not embraced by the 5th renunciation of the treaty. But, in order to satisfy themselves more fully, what was the intention of the Government, at the time of negotiating the treaty, on this particular point, they, on the 5th of March, 1822, addressed a note to the Secretary of State, expressing the doubt which they entertained in the construction of the treaty, and requesting information on that point. On the 9th of March, 1822, the Secretary of State answered, that claims founded on contract, "as they existed at the time of the signature of the treaty," were not intended by the parties to be "excluded from the benefit of the treaty;" and that it was "the full understanding that all the claims should have the same benefit of the provision, be subjected to the same investigation, and be decided upon, not by any subsequent transaction between the claimant and the Spanish Government, but by the commissioners, in the manner prescribed by the treaty, and upon such proof as they should think proper to require, for ascertaining its amount and validity." And again: "To ascertain in the manner stipulated by the treaty, and in no other, the full amount and validity of their claims, as existing on the day of the signature of the treaty, the commission instituted under the eleventh article of the treaty, was provided." The commissioners, on the receipt of this answer, and on reconsidering the first impression they had entertained, determined to take cognizance of Mr. Meade's claim, and considered it embraced in the 5th renunciation of the treaty, and it then remained for Mr. Meade to support it by suitable authentic testimony. Mr. Meade offered, in support of his claim, this Spanish liquidation of it, made, as has been already stated, long subsequent to the signature of the treaty. This the commissioners rejected, as incompetent testimony, and not such as was contemplated by the treaty, and required the production of the original testimony, documentary and otherwise, on which this liquidation was alleged to be made. Mr. Meade was early apprised of this decision of the commissioners. He, as early as the 4th of April, 1822, in a note to Don Joaquin Anduaga, the Spanish Minister resident here, complained that the commissioners had treated this liquidation as "a nullity." He at the same time pressed upon the commissioners, with increased earnestness, the propriety of receiving this liquidation as conclusive evidence of his claim; and that he ought not to be required to produce the original testimony. The commissioners adhered to their first decision, but extended to Mr. Meade every indulgence, by affording an opportunity to produce testimony; and by not finally rejecting his claim, until the 7th of June, 1824, the day before the period of three years, limited by the treaty for their session, expired; when they did finally reject it, on the "ground that the evidence produced was not sufficient to establish the same." Mr. Meade, then, was apprised, as early as the 4th of April, 1822, more than twenty-six months before the period limited for the session of the commission expired, that this Spanish liquidation would not be received by them as evidence in support of his claim, and yet he did not, at that time, call upon the commissioners, as he had a right to do under the eleventh article of the treaty, to require the original "documents and elucidations," in the archives of Spain, (if, in fact, there were any there,) to be furnished. But he preferred to complain of the decision of the commissioners, to the Spanish Minister, and to continue, unceasingly, to press his claim before the commissioners upon the evidence he had already; and which had already been rejected. Mr. Meade, not satisfied with having written his note of the 4th of April, 1822, already alluded to, again, on the 10th of October, 1822, wrote a second note to the Spanish Minister, reiterating his complaints against the commissioners, for having rejected the Spanish liquidation, as testimony in support of his claim. On the 16th of October, the Spanish Minister answered his note of the 10th of the same month, in which, among other things, in speaking of the rejection of the Spanish liquidation, by the commissioners, he says, "that the Spanish Government will regard as a serious insult, that what in Spain is acknowledged as most sacred and respectable, should here be pronounced of no value." And again he says, that "his Catholic Majesty knows too well what is due to his own dignity, to the reputation of his Ministers, and to the integrity of his tribunals, to consent that a foreign commission shall deem itself authorized to revise their decrees."

The Board of Commissioners were not, however, to be intimidated by these high-sounding and pompous declarations of regal dignity and ministerial infallibility. Like honest men they adhered to the decision they had made, and which they believed to be correct. Mr. Meade continued to press his claim before the commissioners, but without producing any change in their decision, until the 15th of April, 1823; on which day Hilario de Rivas y Salmon, the Spanish Chargé des Affaires, who had succeeded Don Anduaga, addressed a note to the Secretary of State, repeating, in substance, the view which had been taken by his predecessor, of the rejection of the Spanish liquidation, as evidence, by the Board of Commissioners. To this note the Secretary of State replied, on the 29th of April, 1823, sustaining the decision of the commissioners, in rejecting the Spanish liquidation as evidence to support this claim. And I will here hazard the opinion, that no gentleman here, who will take up that reply, and the opinion delivered by one of the commissioners, and give them an attentive perusal, can doubt for a moment the correctness of that decision. Mr. Meade having failed to goad the commissioners to a favorable decision of his claim—having failed to intimidate them, by appeals to the Spanish authorities, and finding that they were sustained in their decision by their Government, at length, on the 18th of April, 1823, more than twelve months after he had been distinctly informed that the Spanish liquidation would not be received as testimony in support of his claim, applied to the commissioners "to require of the Spanish Government certain papers and documents," which, he alleged, he considered necessary to the establishment of his claim, and which he specified. The commissioners promptly made the demand of the Spanish Government, through the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State instructed the American Minister to the Court of Spain, then about to sail on the duties of his mission, to make the demand of the papers specified, of the Spanish Government, and which they were bound to furnish, when so demanded, by the stipulations of the eleventh article of the treaty. The American Minister did demand them of the Government of Spain, several months before the period of three years, limited for the session of the Board of Commissioners, expired. They have never yet been furnished, (if, in fact, they exist,) so far as we have been informed by the claimant, or from any other source. We have no assurance that they ever will be.

From the review which I have taken of the facts and circumstances attending this case, upon what ground is it that the Government of the United States are now called upon to assume the payment of this enormous claim? Has not the United States performed, in good faith, to the letter and the spirit, every stipulation which she was bound to perform by the treaty? No gentleman will say she has not. The Committee of Foreign Affairs themselves, who reported this bill—with a majority of whom I differ in opinion, in relation to this claim—admit this fact. In the report of the committee accompanying this bill, they say: "Should this view of the subject be correct, it will follow that the responsibility of failing to furnish the papers ultimately rests with Spain; and that good faith must eventually require her to meet the consequences of this failure." Here it is distinctly admitted, by the committee themselves, that Spain, and not the United States, is responsible for the payment of this claim; and, if so, why should we gratuitously take it upon ourselves? If it is intended to revise the decision of the Board of Commissioners in this case—and such will unquestionably be the effect of passing this bill—I would remind gentlemen that, by the stipulations of the treaty itself, this Board were constituted, by the parties, the exclusive judges of what was "suitable authentic testimony," in support of any claim which might be brought before them. Their decisions, by the agreement of the parties, were to be final and obligatory, not only on the claimants, but on the parties themselves. From their decision no appeal was provided. This claimant has had every opportunity afforded to him of presenting his claim, and supporting it by testimony, before the commissioners, so far as the United States were bound to afford that opportunity, that all other claimants under the treaty have had. The Board was created, and continued its session for three years, as stipulated by the treaty. This claimant presented himself before that Board. The evidence he offered in support of his claim was rejected by the Board, as incommpetent to be received, at an early period of its session. When he applied to them to demand certain documents and papers from the Government of Spain, that demand was promptly made. No evidence was adduced by him sufficient to support his claim, and it was finally rejected. But it is urged that the claimant in this case could not procure the "documents and elucidations," necessary to support his claim, from Spain, in time to present them before the American commission closed its sessions; that Mr. Nelson, the American Minister to the Spanish Court, was delayed in his arrival there, in consequence of the blockade of Cadiz by a French squadron; that, when they were demanded by him, Spain failed to furnish them. The answer to this argument is, first, that Mr. Meade might, if he had not preferred another course, have applied to the Board of Commissioners to demand these "documents and elucidations" from Spain, immediately on being informed by them that the Spanish liquidation had been rejected. He was informed that the Spanish liquidation had been rejected, and that the original evidence was required, twelve months before he applied to the commissioners, to make this demand. If the demand had then been made, it could have been forwarded to Spain before the blockade had taken place, which prevented the speedy arrival of Mr. Nelson at the Spanish Court, twelve months afterwards. Mr. Meade, however, chose to take a different course. He chose to resist the decision of the commissioners, in rejecting the Spanish liquidation as testimony in support of his claim. He preferred to lodge complaints against them with the Spanish Minister. He suffered twelve months to elapse before he required them to make the demand. The next answer to the argument is, that Spain, having failed to furnish the "documents and elucidations," when they were demanded, violated the treaty; for, by the treaty, she bound herself to furnish them when demanded at the "instance of the commissioners." They were demanded at the "instance of the commissioners," and were not furnished. Spain, then, and not the United States, upon every principle, is bound to this claimant. Take another view of this claim. Admit, for the sake of the argument, that this individual had a just claim against the United States, but was unable to establish it, because he was unable to procure his testimony in proper time, it would be his misfortune, and not the fault of the United States. He would stand precisely in the same situation that all other claimants under the treaty do who failed to establish their claims, because they were unable to procure their testimony—and there are many such. Suitors, in the ordinary courts of justice, lose their causes daily for want of their testimony. It is their misfortune, and not the fault of the Government, or the particular tribunal that decides the cause.

But, to what will the passage of this bill lead? The United States only stipulated, in the treaty, to pay claims "to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars." That amount has already been paid. The whole fund has been exhausted. The commissioners adjudged, as valid, claims to the amount of about five millions five hundred thousand dollars. Each claimant suffered a deduction of something like 8½ per cent. of the principal of his demand, in order to be paid out of the fund of five millions set apart for that purpose by the treaty. Each received a pro rata of his demand. If I have been correctly informed, the amount of claims presented to the Board of Commissioners was about forty millions of dollars; and I see, from a document which I hold in my hand, to wit: a report made by a committee of the Senate of the United States adverse to this claim, at the first session of the Nineteenth Congress—the amount stated to have been presented is the same. The amount of claims, then, rejected by the Board of Commissioners, was about thirty-four millions and a half of dollars. If we once commence revising the decisions of the Board of Commissioners; if we once open the door, and commence paying, there is no end to the flood of rejected claims that will be pressed upon us. Your table, sir, is already covered with memorials, all waiting the event of this bill, and each assigning some plausible reason why his claim was rejected by the Board of Commissioners—some unavoidable circumstance beyond his control, that prevented him from procuring his testimony when his claim was before the Board of Commissioners. Rely upon it, sir, if you once disturb the decisions of the commissioners, there will be no difficulty in procuring specious pretexts and plausible reasons for the interposition of Congress, and, in many cases, fraudulent claims may and will be bolstered up and passed. If we once commence, we know not where we are to stop; and the United States, instead of paying five millions of dollars—the sum which she stipulated by the treaty to pay, and which she has already paid—may have to pay a vast amount more, never contemplated at the negotiation of the treaty. But it is insisted that the United States have, by the treaty, renounced the claim of her citizens to Spain; that they cannot now apply to Spain for payment; and that, therefore, the United States ought to pay them, though the amount should exceed five millions of dollars. The first answer which I have to make to this, is, that, in cases like the claim now before us, in reference to which Spain has violated the treaty, by failing to furnish the "documents and elucidations" demanded, she is not absolved from the obligation to pay. But the general answer is, that the renunciation was made at the instance and at the desire of the claimants themselves. The claimant before us desired it to be made. A general statement of his claim, unliquidated and unsettled, was filed with the Secretary of State, with that view. It should be remembered, that the value of a demand depends as much on the ability to pay, and the prospect of obtaining it, as on its amount—and often more so. In this very case, at the date of the signature of the treaty, the claimant, as, indeed, all others who had claims, must have lost all hope of receiving it from Spain. The prospect, to say the least of it, was by no means flattering. For a series of years Spain had been troubled by disturbances at home and abroad. Her colonies were in revolt, a foreign army invading her territory, her finances deranged, her throne tottering to its base—the prospect of recovery must have been a gloomy one. The certainty of receiving a small modicum of a just demand, was preferable to the great delay and the hazard of losing all.

Sir, I have something to say in reference to the particular provisions of this bill; and I think, on minute examination, they will be found to be highly exceptionable. The bill proposes to refer this claim to a new Board, composed of the Attorney-General, and any two Auditors of the Treasury, for liquidation. The claimant in this case has not submitted to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, who reported the bill, any new evidence. We have no assurance that he has procured, or ever will procure, the “documents and elucidations” which he alleges are in the archives of Spain. We have no assurance that he can procure, or intends to produce, to this new Board, any evidence, other than that which he presented to the Board of Commissioners under the treaty, and which they rejected. We have no assurance, if we pass this bill, that this new Board may not reverse the decisions of the regular Board of Commissioners under the treaty, and receive as evidence this celebrated Spanish liquidation. Are we prepared to hazard this result? Are we prepared to submit the decision of the commissioners to the revision of this new Board? Are we willing to receive this Spanish liquidation in support of this claim, rejected, as it was, by the commissioners, and by the Secretary of State, under the advice of the President, as incompetent testimony? Sir, what is this Spanish liquidation? It is an acknowledgment by Spain of a debt due by her to this claimant—an acknowledgment made more than twelve months after the signature of the treaty. “The treaty, by its express terms, made provision only for unsettled and unliquidated claims. The United States assumed them as they existed, and had been exhibited at the signature of that instrument.” If Spain, subsequent to the signature of the treaty, acknowledged a debt to Meade, without the privity, knowledge, or consent of the United States, that acknowledgment will be binding on Spain, but not on the United States. Spain had no power, by any act of hers, after the signature of the treaty, to bind the United States. Her acknowledgment to Meade, more than twelve months after the signature of the treaty, is no evidence of a demand existing at the signature of the treaty. The American Secretary of State, in his answer to the note of the Spanish Minister, to which I have already referred, says: “If the claims of Mr. Meade upon Spain were included among those provided for by the treaty, it was, in common with all the others, to be treated like all the others, and to abide the same issue with the others.” And in speaking of the effect of the acknowledgment of Meade’s claim, by Spain, he further says: “Nothing can be more clear than that Spain remains, at this hour, bound to satisfy, to the last real, every claim acknowledged by herself to be just, and which she had not the right to transfer to a third party, without the consent of the claimant.”

It is proper to remark, in conclusion, that Mr. Meade has, at different times, taken different grounds in relation to this claim. Before the signature of the treaty, he sought the interposition of his Government, he filed his claim, in its unsettled and unliquidated state. After he had obtained his acknowledgment from Spain, and when the treaty was about to be ratified by the United States a second time, he insisted that his claim was not embraced by the treaty. His counsel urged “that his claim was of a nature that the American Government had no right to interfere with Spain in its favor at all.” He then insisted that a separate article should be annexed to the treaty, providing for the payment of his claim to the full amount acknowledged by Spain. The President and Senate paid no regard to his memorial, but ratified the treaty. Mr. Meade afterwards insisted, before the commissioners, that his claim was embraced by the treaty, and that the Spanish liquidation or acknowledgment of it was conclusive evidence of its justice. Thus, it appears that Mr. Meade has himself, at different times, taken different views of his own claim. There is nothing in this claim that recommends it to peculiar favor. I will again call the attention of gentlemen to the answer of the Secretary of State to the Spanish Minister, to show what his opinion then was, of the merits of this particular claim. He says: “If the American Government could have admitted any discrimination between the claims, and that any one should have been privileged above the rest, Mr. Meade’s claim, if the present argument of his learned counsel is sound, would have been the very lowest on the list, and the least entitled to favor.”

I have detained the House longer than I anticipated when I rose. I am not in the habit of throwing myself often on its indulgence, and especially in relation to private claims. But this bill involves important principles and important consequences—it involves a very large expenditure of the public money; and, differing, as I do, with a majority of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, in relation to it, it was due to myself, and to the House, that I should submit my views.

MONDAY, February 25.

Funeral of General Brown.

The following resolutions were received from the Senate :

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 25, 1828.

"Resolved, That the Senate have learned, with deep regret, the death of Major General Jacob Brown, the late Commanding General of the Army, and the distinguished leader in the glorious battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie, in the late war.

"Resolved, That, if the House of Representatives concur, the Senate will, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, attend the funeral of Major General Brown, on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock."

Mr. HAMILTON, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, said that he rose for the purpose of moving the concurrence of the House in the resolutions transmitted by the Senate; for he was assured that, whilst those who heard him felt the deepest sympathy in the distresses of the bereaved family of the late General BROWN, and the loss which the country at large had sustained, that they entertained the most unfading recollection of the valuable services of this distinguished officer, to whom emphatically belonged the distinction during the late war of having been the first to deprive the British bayonet of its reputed invincibility. The grave of such a man well deserves the tribute of a nation's honors, as well as its grief: I, therefore, move you, not only that the resolutions be concurred in, but that a committee of three be appointed on the part of this House, to meet such committee as the Senate may appoint, to make the necessary arrangements for the attendance of both Houses at the funeral of the late Major General BROWN.

The House unanimously agreed to the motion of Mr. HAMILTON, and the committee consisted of Messrs. HAMILTON, VAN RENSSELAER, and WARD.

WEDNESDAY, March 5.

Tariff Bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Maine, said: It is with extreme reluctance, Mr. Chairman, that I ever rise to address a committee of this House, and nothing short of an imperious sense of duty, can ever urge me to obtrude myself on their notice. But as the subject now under consideration is one of very great importance to my constituents, I feel myself compelled to claim the attention of the committee for a short time. I profess, sir, as well as others, to be a friend to domestic industry, and am prepared to give all necessary protection to every branch of this industry; but am not willing to build up one class on the ruins of another. Before we go farther in taxing this nation for the benefit of a limited number of individuals, we ought to inquire, seriously inquire, where we are to stop in this system of progressive protection. I see no end to these complaints and applications for further relief. Pass this bill, and what comes next? We shall soon be told that still greater investments have been made, the business ruinous, and nothing short of prohibitions will save them; and when you shall have granted this, and secured to them our whole market—when their numbers shall have become formidable, and their influence irresistible, you will be required to establish a system of bounties to relieve future depressions.

I believe the tariff of 1824, if its provisions were fairly carried into execution, will give all the protection the manufacturing interests of this country ought, at this time, to receive, and would enable them, under all ordinary circumstances, to continue their business with a fair profit. This, some of the manufacturers themselves admit. If they have not realized the expected benefits of the tariff of 1824; if the provisions of that law have been evaded, or if foreign legislation has taken away the protection which that law was expected to give, I am willing, and shall feel myself in justice bound, to vote for a bill that shall effectually secure to the manufacturers the full and intended benefit and protection of that tariff. If the foreign manufacturer evades the existing duty by low and false invoices: or if, by a reduction of duty on the raw material by him used, he is enabled to send his goods to our market at lower prices than he could in 1824, I would give to our manufacturer an additional ad valorem duty, equivalent to this reduction of duty on the raw material of the foreigner; clothe our appraisers of imported goods with additional powers, and make every false invoice work a forfeiture of the goods, and a fine on the importer. This, sir, would, in my opinion, effectually prevent fraud, if any does exist, and secure to our manufacturer all the protection the tariff of '24 was intended to give. But, sir, while I am willing to do this, I am not prepared to vote for the bill before us, as it now is, or even after it is amended, as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont. I will not, sir, vote for prohibitions in any shape; and, between certain fixed prices, this bill does amount to a prohibition; and while I would sufficiently protect the manufacturer, I will never destroy a wholesome competition, which is the greatest spur to industry and economy, and the only pledge the public can have of fair and reasonable prices.

Sir, I am far from giving full faith and credit to all the statements in the petitions and memorials that have crowded in upon us without mercy, and almost without number—nor do I give the testimony, here taken, the weight I should give to the evidence of disinterested witnesses. I believe many of the manufacturing establishments of this country, under prudent management, are doing quite as well, yes, sir, and better than some other important branches of industry not claiming our protection; and much of the loss, difficulty, and em-

Tariff Bill.

barragement we hear of, arises from injudicious investments of capital, unnecessary expenditures, and, to make up the loss account, we see charged, salaries to owners, agents and sub-agents, and high commissions in purchase and sale charged by stockholders of the establishments. Even prohibition will fail to render some of these establishments profitable. But, sir, though, as I before observed, I am willing to secure to our woollen manufacturers all the intended protection of the law of '24, by an additional ad valorem duty, I cannot see the necessity of increasing the duty on iron, steel, and manufactures from them, distilled spirits, hemp, flax, and molasses.

Sir, I believe there is not a man in this nation, who would ever have thought of increasing the duty on these articles, had it not been suggested by the excitement and clamor raised by the manufacturers of wool. What evidence have we that these interests are suffering; or, if suffering, that they are any more depressed than any other branch of industry in our country? To be sure, we have the testimony of manufacturers themselves, some of whom, by reducing every thing to cash statements, show a loss. But, sir, in legislating for twelve millions of people, are we to rest on the profit and loss account of two or three manufacturing establishments? Look at them generally, and what do we see? What do these very manufacturers tell us? Why, that, notwithstanding all their losses, and all this depression, the business has increased, and is increasing. If this is such a ruinous business, why do we see new establishments growing up, and new investments annually making? Capitalists rarely calculate in this way. Prudent men never do. Investments are rarely made in business that is permanently depressed, but they are made when stocks are low and depression considered temporary.

What is the evidence on which we are urged to lay an additional duty on iron and steel? These, sir, are articles of the first necessity, used by all classes, the poor man as well as the rich, and, from their weight, are not susceptible of extensive transportation on land, and ought to come to our laborious citizens with the least possible charges. These manufacturers do not complain of want of skill or of a market. The whole testimony shows they are doing well; that they have increased, and are increasing; many of them have little or no competition from foreign iron, and all agree that their expenses have not increased since 1824. Sir, iron has been manufactured from the ore in this country for more than half a century; and if they have not already acquired the requisite skill, they never will, and I believe that those engaged in it would have been satisfied with the present protection, had not their aid been wanted to help through another item of this bill. On what evidence are we acting, while about to lay an additional duty on steel? It does not appear that a single manufactory of this article exists in the country, or that a single pound has ever been made here, and yet we are asked to increase the duty upon it fifty per cent. And for what? Why, the duty will then be so high, that some may be induced to try experiments, and thereby ascertain the fact whether we can make it or not. Pass the bill, sir, and I have no doubt many will try the experiment, and we shall then have them here, showing immense investments under the tariff of 1828, complaining of competition from foreign steel, and their ruin inevitable, unless we give one hundred per cent. more, and so we must go on as we have done, adding protection to protection, till we come to a general prohibition. Sir, in my opinion, it is all of a piece. We are about to impose on our citizens from fifty to one hundred per cent. additional taxes on articles of the first necessity, articles absolutely indispensable to their comfort and subsistence, to break up the branches of business in which they have for years been industriously and happily engaged, for the purpose of trying experiments.

As to hemp, it appears to me, it is abundantly protected. Just look at the prices of Russian and American hemp in our market, and it must convince any man that this article needs no further protection. Russia hemp now commands $275 per ton, while American is quoted at $125. If one hundred and fifty dollars per ton, is not a sufficient protection, what in the name of Heaven will be? The great complaint has been, that foreign manufactures, and articles of foreign growth, were underselling us in our own market; but this does not apply to hemp. And, if one hundred and fifty dollars per ton, or even one hundred dollars per ton, bounty, has not induced the grower of this article to prepare it properly for market, can we expect that ten or twenty dollars more will?

There is one class of manufacturers, and an important class too, who seemed to have escaped the notice of the committee—I mean the manufacturers of cordage. This bill proposes to put an additional tax of nearly one hundred per cent. on the imported raw material, to discourage its use, while your own testimony shows that you cannot or will not furnish them a domestic material fit for use. Yes, sir, while we have just sent our books to the farmers to teach them how to raise and prepare hemp for market, before these treatises have had time to reach them, and before we know whether our farmers can or will attempt to prepare it as prescribed, we are about to lay an additional duty on foreign hemp, progressing to nearly one hundred per cent. We have had before us, dissertations upon raising hemp, and statements of the relative strength of foreign and domestic yarns, to show that our hemp, when properly rotted, is superior to any other. But, sir, I had rather see one ton of it fit for use, than all the statements and experiments that have been made, or that can be made for twenty years to come. The manufacturers of cordage are of the first importance to the country, and indispensable to our commerce; and while this bill will double the duty on their raw material, further to discourage them, it takes away part of the existing drawback on cordage, by deducting the weight of the tar used in manufacturing of it.

This deduction on the drawback will not amount to much protection to domestic hemp: for, while we imported, the last year, five thousand and twenty-two tons of hemp, the whole export of cordage was but one hundred and ninety-eight tons. This, of itself, shows the importance of this manufacture to our commerce, and that all the drawback on the tar must be small; besides, I have always understood, that the hemp lost, in working, all the cordage gained by the tar.

Now, sir, let us look a moment to the necessity of increasing the duty on duck. The principal owner and manager of one manufactory of this article has been here, and states, that it is necessary and expedient to give his establishment further protection. This witness, like all the others, wishes, of course, to advance his own interest. They all think, and are quite clear, that the interest of the nation requires their several manufactories should be further protected—to be sure, they are witnesses in their own favor, and if they do not make out a strong case, it is not our fault. But, in the course of the examination, we have the statement of a year's business of this duck manufactory, from which I should infer, that no further protection was needed. He states the capital invested, at $170,000. The establishment, however, came into his hands at $37,500. Last year, he made 7,010 bolts and pieces of duck, hammock cloth, and cotton bagging; of the latter, only 210 pieces, leaving 6,800 bolts of canvas and hammock cloth. The cost of flax, $8 45 per bolt; cost of manufacturing it, $5 05, making $13 50 cost of the raw material, and the manufacturing it. The price of this duck, in the market, was $15 50, giving a clear profit of two dollars per bolt, which, to say nothing of the profit on the cotton bagging, gives $18,800 for that year. This gives an interest on more than $226,000, on an investment at its greatest extent, of $170,000. Certainly, a business affording such a profit, requires no further protection. Again, sir, I find, on looking at the contracts made with the Navy Department, for the year 1827, which have been laid on our tables since this examination before the Committee on Manufactures, that this same witness, I presume so from the name, has contracted to supply the Navy with six different kinds of duck, at prices from nineteen and a half, down to sixteen and a quarter dollars per bolt, averaging $17 60 per bolt. This gives a profit of more than four dollars per bolt; and if he is as fortunate in his sales as in his contract, the $170,000 invested in that establishment, will give him an interest on $450,000. If this establishment requires further protection, I think gentlemen will be puzzled to find one that does not.

Connected with the testimony relative to duck, we have a piece of hearsay evidence, showing a system of fraud practised by our merchants to avoid the existing duty. The witness says he has heard that our merchants are in the habit of sending out their vessels with old worn sails, and are supplied in foreign ports, to avoid the duty. This, sir, is a "story for marines." Can any man in his senses suppose, that our merchants would risk their vessels and cargoes for the sake of such a pitiful saving as this? Even if a merchant could be found so consummately stupid and foolish as to attempt such a saving, he could not succeed. Sir, the seamen, the moment the sails shook out, before they cleared the land, would refuse to proceed, and risk their lives in a vessel thus fitted out; they would demand a survey, and upon such survey, she would be declared unseaworthy, with a suit of such sails as are here described. Again, sir, most, if not all, of our merchants engaged in a trade where they could supply themselves with duck cheaper than in this country, are insured—and can we suppose they would pay premiums of insurance when they knew, in their own souls, their vessels were not fit for the voyage; and the deficiency so apparent and so easily proved as this would be? No, sir, no merchant will ever risk his capital to this extent, merely to avoid paying a little duty. Sir, duck, hemp, and iron, are the three great articles of consumption in building and equipping our vessels, in which business a vast amount of mechanical labor now finds constant employment. If, while our merchants are barely able, by greater economy in building and equipping their vessels, and superior energy and activity in sailing them, to compete with foreign commerce, you enhance the price of our tonnage to the extent this bill proposes, you will strike a blow, from which our commerce may never recover. It must and will dwindle, and finally sink under such exorbitant taxation.

THURSDAY, March 6.

Tariff Bill.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the House resumed the consideration of the Tariff Bill, the question being on the motion of Mr. BARNEY, to strike out the first section.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, after some remarks on the course which the debate had taken, owing to the form of Mr. BARNEY's motion, and some observations about the price of corn, &c., suggested to gentlemen on both sides of the question, whether it would not be better first to let the bill be so modified by amendments as to give it the most acceptable form, before they proceeded to the general argument on the question of its adoption.

Mr. BARNEY, after explaining the reason why he had, under the rules of order, been obliged to make his motion in the form he had, in order to reach the other parts of the bill in debate, which were not included in the amendment of Mr. MALLARY withdrew his motion to strike out the first section; and the question now recurring on the amendment of Mr. MALLARY,

Mr. HUNT observed that, for many years past the public attention had been directed, with a deep interest, towards the establishment and progress of domestic manufactures. Their salutary effect on agriculture, said Mr. H., by furnishing a ready and profitable market for the productions of the earth—the enterprise of our citizens—the immense multiplication of the productive power of labor which they create by means of machinery, and their essential aid in rendering us independent of foreign nations, are among the reasons for requiring the fostering care and protection of Government.

When I arose yesterday to address the Chair, it was not my intention, neither is it now, to discuss the general merits of this bill, or the amendment as proposed by my honorable friend, the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, and which he supported with great ability and force of argument; but to submit my views upon one subject which has been incorporated into the bill, and which, according to my understanding, has no natural connection with the other great objects contained in it. The effect of its introduction, as I apprehended, will be to embarrass, rather than to promote the accomplishment of that system which so many gentlemen in this House, and so large a portion of this country, have in view. The subject in the bill, to which I allude, is the one which relates to the increase of the duty upon foreign molasses, and the repeal of the drawback upon the exportation of spirits distilled from that material.

Petitions and memorials from various parts of the Union and from all classes of citizens, have been crowded upon our tables during the whole of the present session, praying for the interposition of Congress to afford some aid and relief to the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of this country, by increasing the duty upon foreign wool, woollen goods, iron, and various other articles; but amidst this general expression of the public voice, not a whisper has been heard for augmenting the duty upon molasses. Even the manufacturers of this article have not desired it. They are satisfied with the profits and protection which they now enjoy, and well may they be so, for it is a fact well understood, that the sugar plantations of Louisiana, where the New Orleans molasses is manufactured, afford a greater amount of profit than any other branch of agricultural employment in this country. In that part of the State which is congenial to the growth of the sugar cane, almost the whole industry is directed to its culture; and such is the avidity with which capital is seeking for an investment in this business, that legislative enactment would hardly be able to accelerate its increase. Since the year 1824, it is estimated that the production of sugar and molasses in Louisiana has been doubled, and the produce of the last year swells to the prodigious amount of 80,000 hogsheads of sugar, being equal to 88,000,000 of pounds, and 5,000,000 gallons of molasses. This business, therefore, requires no additional aid or stimulus from Government; it does not, like many other kinds of employment, present the melancholy spectacle of languishment, ruin, and decay, for want of protection.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEVENSON) informed us that the present project of increasing the duty on molasses, is not the first one that has been offered to Congress, but that a report was made by a committee some few years ago to this House for the same purpose. If, however, we look into the history of the legislation upon this subject, we shall find that Congress has always guarded this article with a seeming anxiety, from high taxation.

By the first act under the present organization of this Government, passed July 20, 1789, laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the country, the impost upon molasses was two and a half cents per gallon. The experience, however, of one year, convinced the nation that the revenue was too inadequate for the support of Government and the discharge of the public debt; and on the tenth of August, 1790, a new act was passed, increasing the duties, adding about 50 per cent. on sugar, spirits, &c.; but only one-half a cent per gallon upon this article. By the several acts of 1792 and 1794, further additions were made to the duties upon most foreign goods, but no increase was made to the tax on molasses. But when a new era occurred, and extraordinary expenditures were required for enlarging the navy, and supporting a standing army, when in the course of four years succeeding '96 more than $17,000,000 of loans were authorized; when the direct taxes were imposed; when bohea tea was subjected to new duties; and eight cents per bushel were added to the previous tax upon salt; then it was in company with these taxes, that the further sum of one cent per gallon was added to molasses in the year '97, and one cent more in 1800, making the whole duty five cents per gallon, beyond which it has never been advanced in time of peace.

Soon after the commencement of the late war, an additional duty of one hundred per cent. was made to the permanent duties by the act of July 1, 1812, but limited, however, in its operation, to one year from the conclusion of peace. After the occurrence of that fortunate event, in 1816, the whole subject of the revenue underwent a full and thorough revision; and at that period, when we had just emerged from war, with a debt of $120,000,000 upon our hands, the duty was established at five cents per gallon; and now, when half that debt has been discharged, and must by the necessary operation of our present system of finance, be entirely extinguished in the course of six or eight years, we are called on to impose upon the people a double duty, a war tax, upon an article, too, which use has rendered one of the necessities of life.

The prime cost of molasses in the West Indies depends upon its quality, and varies from five to twelve and a half cents per gallon, making the average price eight cents and three-quarters; and while some parts of the country oppose with zeal and vehemence any addition to the present duties of 25 and 33 per cent. upon woollen cloths, we are urged to impose a double tax upon molasses, which is equivalent to an ad valorem charge of one hundred and twenty per cent.

From the year 1820 to 1826, inclusive, the average annual amount of molasses imported, was 12,806,948 gallons, producing a revenue of upwards of $640,000 per annum. The tax for this portion of the public revenue is manifestly unequal in its operation upon the different sections of the Union. The principal part of the foreign molasses is consumed in New England, New York, and a few of the States bordering upon the Atlantic; while amidst the great mass of population at the West, it is but seldom introduced, and its consumption is small and limited. In many sections of that country a great abundance is easily manufactured at home, and the balance of the supply, supposed to be about 2,000,000 gallons annually, passes from the plantations of Louisiana up the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Illinois, and the Missouri.

The tax is not only principally paid by the eastern States, but what renders its operation still more severe and unequal is, that in those States the poorer part of the population pays the greater portion of the tax, as they consume, in proportion to their numbers, larger quantities than the rich. They daily use it in their humble fare, upon their cakes and their puddings; and as a cheap substitute for sugar in tea, in all sorts of cookery, and for other domestic purposes. It enters copiously into the composition of beer, and various kinds of drink, as a wholesome and valuable substitute for ardent spirits; and it produces a moral influence upon society, by affording a protection from inebriety, and the ruinous habits of intemperance.

We possess no data for determining with accuracy the quantity of molasses that is consumed in any particular State or section of country. From the best information which I have been able to obtain, I estimate the annual consumption of molasses in the State of Vermont, at five hundred thousand gallons, being somewhat less than two gallons to an individual. Upon this amount, which I think will not be regarded as excessive, it follows that the national Treasury now draws from the inhabitants of that State, upon the present duties, $25,000 per annum—a tax that is sufficient to defray one-half of the expenditures of the State Government, and already heavy upon a people that enjoy none of the countervailing advantages of commerce—public works and expenditures, canals, national roads, or the gratuities of public lands.

The proposed augmentation of duty would materially diminish the amount of importation, and destroy some, and impair all, of the important interests that are now dependent upon the various branches of trade in this commodity. It is a trade far different from that with Great Britain, where there is no reciprocity of interchange; where, notwithstanding we receive millions of her cloths and manufactures every year, yet all the productions of this country, with two or three exceptions, are excluded from her ports with as much rigor and anxiety, as if they carried pestilence along with them. But our trade with the West Indies is carried on by barter—agriculture is concerned in its successful prosecution. Our beef, pork, butter, cheese, rice—all the fruits of the earth, live stock, household furniture, saddles, hats, shoes, and the products of the workshops, are readily received in the West Indies in exchange for this commodity.

The lumber business, which is of vital importance to many parts of the country, would, by the imposition of double duties, become annihilated, as the honorable gentleman from Maine has already evinced with great clearness and ability. During the last year, there were two hundred and three clearances from the single district of Portland, to the West Indies—28,000,000 feet of boards, scantling, &c., were exported, and the return cargoes brought home 3,890,321 gallons of molasses. This business, although large and extensive, in which a great portion of the population of Maine is engaged, is by no means lucrative, and it does no more than repay the ordinary wages of labor. And if you double the duty as proposed, you do in effect put a tax upon the lumber business of not less than 200,000 dollars per annum; and it must cease to exist. The burthen would be too heavy to be borne, and beneath the pressure of such a weight it must inevitably sink.

The fisheries, where are formed the bone and sinew of the navy, and which the vigilant policy of our Government has ever delighted to encourage and protect, would wither at the loss of any important branch of our trade with the West Indies. During the five years from 1822 to 1826, the dried and pickled fish, fish and whale oil, spermaceti candles, &c., which were sold in the West Indies, amounted, upon an average, to $989,776 per annum, being about twice the amount which was exported to all the other parts of the globe. These islands are the great foreign receptacles for our products of the sea. It is there the hardy fisherman, who spends his toilsome days and watchful nights upon the banks of Newfoundland, or who, with more adventure, doubles the far-these Capes, and pursues the whale through every sea, may find a market for the product of his toils.

There is another interest of long standing in this country, that of distilling molasses, which would necessarily be ruined by doubling the duties, and repealing the drawback which is now allowed upon the exportation of the spirits; and this appears to be the object of those who support and recommend the measure. It will be recollected that the prime cost of this article in the West Indies is but small, and that its chief value is imparted to it by the industry and labor of our own citizens. We furnish the casks which contain it, the vessels which transport it, and the hands who perform the voyage. To every gallon of molasses that is distilled, not less than twenty-five cents of its value is created by American industry and skill; and if, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania supposes, 8,000,000 of gallons are yearly converted into spirits, it follows that 2,000,000 dollars' worth of labor is required for such a production. If the sound policy of this country requires the entire suppression of this business, and this is the only object which the gentlemen have in view, let us accomplish it in the plain and simple manner, by putting a tax upon the distilleries, and not by imposing new and enormous duties upon the consumers of molasses.

The amount of foreign molasses that is annually distilled in the United States, cannot perhaps be ascertained with certainty. We are, however, in the possession of certain facts from which we derive an opinion, that the quantity is not large, and that the estimate formed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania is much too high.

From the year 1790 to 1800, both inclusive, the whole quantity of molasses imported into the United States was 53,823,607 gallons; and by a statement derived from a report of Mr. Gallatin, it appears that the spirits distilled from the same was 23,143,404 gallons, being 2,104,400 gallons per annum; and this was at a period when the exportation of these spirits was much greater, and the distillation from domestic materials much less, than at present. By the testimony taken before the Committee of Manufactures, it appears that the distilleries in the neighborhood of New York, at Hudson and Albany, manufacture only about 350,000 gallons per annum; and that the quantity distilled in all that part of the country, including Jersey City and Staten Island, is less by one-half than it was in 1812. In 1810, it appears in the returns made by the marshals, that the quantity of spirits distilled in the United States from molasses, was 2,827,625 gallons; and since that period, the presumption, I think, may be fairly deduced, that the whole quantity has been diminished rather than increased.

The repeal of the drawback, as proposed in the bill, would entirely prevent the further exportation of this kind of spirit. Such an operation, however, would seem manifestly repugnant to the true policy of the country; for so long as the distillation shall continue, the greater the exportation, the larger will be the space for the market of gin, whiskey, and other liquors, manufactured from domestic materials.

Mr. OLIVER said he was decidedly opposed to the principles of this bill, and more so to the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Vermont. His constituents would, he thought, be seriously injured by the passage of either. He would, by way of preface, state a few facts, which would show the truth of this declaration. The soil of the section of country he represented, was by no means ungrateful. The climate was favorable to the cultivation of most of the articles necessary to the comfort and accommodation of man. Nevertheless, from the earliest settlement of the country to this day, the people have devoted their time and labor to the culture of tobacco, almost exclusively. It was to the sale of that article they looked for the education of their children, the payment of their debts, and the purchase of many articles from the people of the west and northwest section of our country, and the purchase of various articles of merchandise of foreign and domestic character. When he mentioned those facts, it would at once be seen what a deep interest they take in this question. This circumstance urged him to participate in this debate. He feared he did not possess that elocution (call it by what name you please) which was calculated to fix and retain attention. But, said he, if I had but one pebble from a brook, I would nevertheless advance to the discussion of this interesting question. Some gentlemen suppose that we, who are opposed to this bill, are opposed to all "tariffs;" but it is not so. Who is there—what intelligent citizen is opposed to a moderate, judicious, and constitutional tariff? None; no, not one. The constitution gives to the General Government great powers. It has surrendered the purse of the nation to Congress. At the moment of the surrender, the framers of the constitution knew the magnitude of the grant. They knew that man was fond of power, seized it with avidity, and was prone to abuse it. They knew, too, that in bad times, bad men might convert the power of taxation into levers by which to raise the moral and political world from their proper places. Hence the framers of the constitution threw around the grant of power to impose taxes, wise and salutary restrictions, on the observance of which, every thing depended. Do you wish this Government to attain an enviable perpetuity? Do you wish it to stand like a rock in the ocean of time, superior to the storms of faction, and assaults of ambition? Regard those restrictions. Yes, the constitution authorizes you to levy direct taxes—on the lands, houses, and slaves of your citizens. But, sir, this is a power too delicate and dangerous for the Government to exercise in this country, except in difficult and trying times. It can only safely be exercised in war, or in preparing for war. In such a contingency, it would be acquiesced in; nay, supported by the people. The pride of valor, and the love of country, would then sustain its exercise. The framers of the constitution knew this, and hence they provided that the General Government, from time to time, might impose such duties on imported articles as would be sufficient to sustain the Government in the exercise of its delegated powers, pay the public debts, and defend the country. In the imposition of duties on imported articles, you may go to the utmost verge of those great constitutional limits; beyond, the ground is holy, and, for one, I will not occupy it. Demonstrate that additional duties on imported woollens, &c., &c., are necessary to support the Government, pay the national debt, and defend the country; and if other articles on which it is more prudent to lay them, cannot be found, then I shall consider myself bound to support the general system; but that is not pretended. The present revenue is not only sufficient to support the Government, fortify the seaports, and increase the navy, but to pay off the debt as fast as it becomes due. Sir, by the constitution, you can impose duties only for revenue. Examine the constitution, line by line, sentence by sentence, and show, if you can, a clause which authorizes duties on imported articles, for purposes other than revenue. In my opinion, such grant of power cannot be found. If it had been the intention of the framers of the constitution to have authorized the imposition of duties for any other purpose than revenue, would they have omitted science—that science which contributes more than any thing else to the preservation of our free institutions? The provision in the constitution which authorizes Congress to secure for a limited term of years to artists and authors the fruits of their labor, confirms me in the opinions I have expressed. Why then did they omit to give to Congress a grant to effect, if in their power, a wide spread of science? That science which paved the way to our independence, and secured our civil and religious liberties;—that diffusion of knowledge, that expansion of liberal opinion, which caused every man to estimate his own importance—to feel that he was something, and not a cipher on the muster roll of human beings—that science which has proclaimed, and now maintains the independence of South America; and, at this moment, is raising the descendants of Leonidas and Solon from the dust, to which they have been bound down for the last five hundred years by the iron hand of oppression, and is again exhibiting them on the classic fields of Greece, in all the port and attitude of freemen? I answer, and say it was not one of the purposes for which the federal constitution was formed. Like every thing else, the care whereof is not expressly delegated to the General Government, it is left to the States, in other words, is retained by them. I shall hereafter mention other things just as important as manufactures, which are not named in the constitution, and of course are beyond the control of the National Legislature.

When he saw great masses of the community quitting the cultivation of the earth to glean a living on the seas, or within the walls of a sickly manufacturing establishment, his mind was hurried into the opinion that the earth was burthened with a population beyond its ability to support, no matter how great the labor devoted to its cultivation. If this state of things in the occupations of men is brought about when the earth is able to maintain them, some writers have imagined it is produced by the mal-administration of the Government. The cultivation of the earth is the primitive and favorite pursuit of man.

If there be a chosen race of men, may we not say 'tis the farmers, planters, and agriculturists. Among them you rarely see the shivering pangs of want; to them ambition never yet turned in pursuit of fit materials for civil strife and political volcanoes. In them you behold the votaries of truth, and disciples of liberty, ever ready to show that devotion to the country, which is due to a just Government and wise system of laws. When the population has advanced to that point, that the soil will not maintain it, the eagle eyed sagacity of the citizen will open to him the road to such employments as will best maintain him. There will be no necessity for the Government to resort to a hot-bed system of legislation, to force into premature existence, a number of sickly manufacturing establishments, that will want constant aid from the Government. When the population advances to that point, Government has only to afford protection to all. Secure to every man, by an even-handed justice, the fruits of his labor, whether that labor is devoted to the cultivation of the earth, the navigation of the seas, or the labors of the loom, anvil, or hammer. Need I go further than our own country, for a happy illustration of the results flowing from a system of Government, founded on the mild and philosophical principle I here advocate? Under their influence, we have, from small beginnings, grown up into a great people—worthy the respect of the world. Sir, we must become a great agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing people. We must become, I say, a great agricultural people—we have a sufficiency of arable land, for the accommodation of the people of the present day. Nay, more, for the accommodation of our probable population, for five hundred years to come.

This incessant augmentation of duties on imported articles to favor manufactures, is a dangerous procedure. The politician advances to his subject with great circumspection, and by prudent and wise retreat, he is not only frequently enabled to regain his ground, but go beyond the triumph he at first meditated. If, then, we must be a manufacturing people, let it be by a slow process. Where do we get our examples to follow? not from Genoa and Venice. They sprung, as it were, from the sea; they were destitute of territory to cultivate; they could not say as we do, with reference to our soil, Locus est e pluribus umbris. Necessity made them merchants and manufacturers. How long did Great Britain exist as a nation, before she soared to unrivalled excellence in commerce and manufactures? I answer, until her population advanced to that point that the soil could not maintain it; then her manufactures and commerce flourished. The progress we have made is, indeed, wonderful. Be patient; an improvident step might be productive of inconceivable mischief. Do we expect to maintain, in a moment, that which in older countries has been more than equal to the labor of ages? Can you abolish the woollen, molasses, and iron trade at a blow, and turn some twenty thousand persons engaged therein to other pursuits, without serious mischief? Our Legislature has been reproached with stepping beyond the age we live in. A wise legislation looks to the present moment, as well as to futurity. As it lays the foundation for bettering the condition of the people of the present day, it paves the way to better the condition of posterity. If manufactures are necessary to our independence, they will grow under existing circumstances.

The history of the tariff in this country deserves some notice. There have been four revisions: in 1789, 1816, 1820, 1824. These have invariably been effected by compromise. To break in so frequently on the system, and extend the duties, produces jealousy, dissatisfaction, and strife. It keeps the price of labor and property constantly fluctuating. It unhinges the confidence of the people in your laws, and it disorders the circulating medium of the country. This incessant advance in duties entices people to embark in manufacturing establishments, with an impression that the Government will sustain them at all events, and make their labor productive. The course pursued by Congress in 1824 has led to this effort to increase the duties. It will be remembered that that enterprising State, now the most extensively engaged in the woollen manufactures, was then opposed to increased duties on foreign woollens. If I am rightly informed, but a small minority of their representatives here voted for the bill of 1824. That State, I am told, is now at the opposite point, and for greater increase. Sir, your legislation seduces your citizens to invest time and money in those establishments; and unless you take a firm stand, you must end in the Chinese system of exclusion. In 1824, the vote of the Massachusetts delegation encouraged a belief that the manufactures there, were then prosperous; the increased duties laid that year seduced very many to invest their capital in woollen manufactures. Many entered into the business, no doubt, with borrowed capital. What followed? That which was to be apprehended: competition was encountered at home, and from abroad. The profits, at first large, are reduced and now comes the application for further protection; and no doubt, in my mind, it will be continued until it works a total exclusion. I say total exclusion. Think you that you can constrain the nations of the earth to buy your produce exclusively with money? China has heretofore done so. It is said, by a Roman writer, that the East India trade was the gulf into which flowed the wealth of the world, from the first dawns of civilization to his time; and I say, it continues, in a measure, so to this day. But if their wealth in the precious metals has increased—in science, arts, and morals, they yet rank among the half-civilized nations of the earth, and we shall hardly take them for our models. This system of exclusion I can never agree to; a mutual exchange of commodities, or free commerce, makes the most distant people friends, and converts the universe into a community of brothers.

MONDAY, March 10.

The Tariff Bill—Wool and Woollens.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR in the chair, on the Tariff Bill.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was a member of the committee which reported the bill to the House. He was one of the majority of that committee who agreed to the bill in its present shape; and candor compelled him to admit the truth of the statement made by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, that he was made the organ of the majority of the committee in drafting the imperfect report which accompanied the bill. Therefore, sir, (said Mr. W.) I am justly chargeable, to a great extent, with the errors, if errors there are, in that report. This addition to my public duty as a member of this House, compels me to trouble the committee with the reasons which brought me, and which I believe brought a majority of the Committee on Manufactures, to agree to the bill now upon your table. I am not, however, prepared to debate this bill otherwise than in detail, and upon its several provisions; and therefore I have withheld my remarks until the amendment proposed by the honorable chairman should become the question before the committee. That I now understand to be the question, and to that it shall be my object to direct my remarks. Yet, sir, I fear if I should promise to be concise, I should not be able to perform that promise. It will be impossible for me to present my views within as short a time as I could wish; and I shall be compelled to make some references to the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, and to go into statistical calculations, which will be dry and uninteresting to the committee, and, I fear, scarcely intelligible to those who may have the patience to listen. I will endeavor, however, to make them as clear and plain as I am able, and to give the grounds upon which they are made, so that their accuracy may be tested. And here, sir, it is my duty to premise that it has been my object, and I believe it to have been the object of the majority of the committee, to frame a bill which should have in view the protection of the leading interests of the country. I have supposed that in all laws having a reference to the protection of the domestic industry of this country, agriculture should be considered the prominent and leading interest. This I have considered the basis upon which the other great interests rest, and to which they are to be considered as subservient. Still, this is not to be considered as entitled to protection, exclusive of the manufacturing interest. I do not believe that a law which would be injurious to manufactures would be beneficial to agriculture; but I do believe that protection to manufactures should be given with express reference to the effect upon agriculture, and that no protection can be wise, or consistent with the policy of this Government, which has not for its object, to add strength and vigor to this great and vital interest of the country. The same may be said of the commercial interest, as it also is only subservient to the great interests of agriculture.

But, sir, it will be found difficult, if not impossible, to draw a bill intended to furnish general protection to the domestic industry of this country, which will not, in some of its provisions, operate injuriously upon some one of the interests concerned, and in some sections of the country. One leading principle, however, which operated upon my mind in the formation of the present bill, is that it is not, and cannot be the policy of this Government, or of this Congress, to turn the manufacturing capital of this country to the manufacture of a raw material of a foreign country, while we do or can produce the same material in sufficient quantities ourselves.

This I consider to be a rule of universal application, and to extend itself, not only to the same raw material, but to any which shall be equally valuable, and may be substituted for the raw material imported; and I cannot suppose that, in legislating for the protection of the industry of the country, this rule should ever be lost sight of. If the time should arrive when there should be a surplus of labor in this country, and when the cultivation of our soil, and the manufacture of its productions, should not require the employment of all the labor of the country, then a different rule might be applicable; then it might be sound policy to encourage the importation of foreign materials, that their manufacture might employ any surplus of domestic labor. This principle it is my intention to apply to the subject of wool and woollens now before the committee. I am aware that the question involved in that part of the bill now under consideration, and the proposed amendment, is one of the most interesting and important embraced in the whole bill. It occupies much of the feeling, both of the manufacturer of wool and the wool grower. It touches the interest of both, and it would be very difficult even for experience to say what would be relatively just between the two interests. But, sir, if constant reference is had to the facts which appear in the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, and to the statistical information which they have been able to collect, something like an approach to certainty may be attained. This examination has been taken with this view, and it is or is not to answer any valuable purpose, as this bill shall or shall not be discussed with reference to the facts it discloses. With that reference it shall be my business to discuss the proposed amendment, and my observations shall be, as far as possible, directed to this testimony, as the foundation of the positions which I shall attempt to establish.

The first proposition in the order of the bill and amendment, is the proposed duty upon wool. This, by the bill reported by the committee, is fixed at a specific duty of seven cents upon every pound of wool, and an increase of the ad valorem duty, now imposed by law, of 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. with an extension of that ad valorem duty to all kinds of wool.

The amendment proposes that all wool, costing in a foreign country 8 cents per pound, or under, shall pay the present duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem only, and imposes a specific duty of 20 cents per pound upon all wool costing more than 8 cents per pound in a foreign country, without reference to its value. It will be readily seen that the proposed duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem upon the coarse wools costing 8 cents per pound, and under, is merely nominal, and cannot answer to check the importation of those qualities of wool. One of the reasons assigned by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures for proposing to encourage the importation of these qualities of wool under a nominal duty, is that the same qualities of wool are not produced in this country; that the manufacturers are bound to import them; and that if they are excluded, their place cannot be supplied by our own wools. To these positions I cannot yield my assent. I do not believe the fact to be so. I believe the United States now produce sufficient quantities of coarse wool for every demand of the present manufactories. But suppose this is not the case; suppose the qualities of coarse wools imported are not, and will not be produced in this country: What then? Is it sound policy to import them free of duty? I must first answer another question before I can yield my assent to this policy. Does this country now produce wool of any quality sufficient to give full employment to its manufacturing capital? If I can answer this question affirmatively, then I should certainly answer the other negatively; for I have already said, I consider the principle perfectly sound, that it is not, and cannot be, for the interest of this country, to import a foreign material for the use of her manufactories, when a full supply of the same material of domestic production may be obtained.

I will then, Mr. Chairman, endeavor to show that the United States do now produce, and will in all future time produce, as much wool as we have now, or shall have capital to devote to the manufacture of this article; and as one mean of arriving at this conclusion, I will refer to the evidence taken before the Committee on Manufactures, to determine the present state of the wool-growing business in this country, and to see what the qualities and now relative prices of domestic wools are.

[Here Mr. W. quoted from the evidence given before the Committee on Manufactures, the answers of Messrs. Garrow, Dexter, Tufts, Sheperd, Phillips, et al.]

This, Mr. Chairman, closes the information as to the wool-growing business, which is to be derived from the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures. It does not contain any certain data from which to determine the whole quantity grown in the United States, but it does show that the deficiency is found only where most of the manufactories are located. The witnesses who testify are from widely distant sections of the country, and each speaks of the surplus or deficiency of his own section. From examining this testimony, it will be found that the deficiencies mostly exist in Massachusetts, where far the greatest number of manufactories are established, and in Delaware, where little wool is grown; while in Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the upper parts of New Hampshire, a greater or less surplus is found to counterbalance these deficiencies. It will also be found, as appears by the testimony of Mr. Dickinson, that when the coarse wools of the country are sent to our markets, they are sent at a loss; they do not sell, while the foreign coarse wools do sell.

But, sir, I have endeavored to find data from which a calculation of wool grown in the country might be made, and I have adopted the most certain which I have been able to discover. I am free to confess that this is vague and uncertain, but I have searched for better in vain: it is not within my reach, and I do not believe it to be within that of any man. I have, however, made a partial calculation, which I will give to the committee, together with the data upon which it is founded. In 1825, a census of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, was taken, and by the law directing the taking of that census, certain statistical information of that State was also directed to be obtained, by the persons appointed to take that census. Among the facts thus obtained, and I cannot doubt, correctly obtained, an enumeration of the sheep then in the State of New York was taken, and it was found to be 3,496,589. Since that time, it is equally difficult, if not impossible, to tell with certainly the rates of increase, and of consequence, to determine the present number. I have, however, supposed what may, and what may not, be true, that the six New England States, and New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware, and Maryland, possessed an equal number of sheep, in proportion to their population, with New York, in the year 1825. These States then, would, in 1825, have possessed 10,818,189 sheep. I doubt whether the State of New York at that time exceeded in its number of sheep, the ratio of the other States named; but when, in the calculation, the remaining States, contrary to what is known to be true, are supposed to possess no sheep at all, this allowance must surely be sufficiently large to cover any excess, if any existed, in the ratio of New York; and the calculation must be safe against the danger of producing too large a result. The whole number of sheep, then, in 1825, in the United States, would be 13,809,678.

As the only rule upon which the increase, since that time, can be calculated with any safety, I have taken the testimony of Mr. Schenck, to which I have before referred. By the census of New York, to which I have just referred, it will be found that there were in the county of Dutchess, in that State, the county in which Mr. Schenck resides, in 1825, 174,010 sheep. Mr. Schenck now testifies that there are according to the best information he has been able to obtain, in that county, at this time, 300,000 sheep, making an increase, since 1825, of something more than 70 per cent. That county is a wealthy and extensively agricultural county, and it is surrounded with others equally so, in proportion to their population; and I know not why the rate of increase of sheep in this county since 1825, should not be good evidence of the rate of increase in the neighboring counties, and, indeed, in the whole State. I therefore assume that the increase of this kind of property in New York has been 70 per cent. since the taking of the enumeration of them in 1825. By the same census, the number of yards of cloth manufactured in the domestic way, and not including that manufactured in the manufacturing establishments, together with the various descriptions, so manufactured, was ascertained. Determining, then, as nearly as I can, from the testimony taken before the Committee on Manufactures, the quantity of wool which would be consumed to make the cloth manufactured in the domestic way in that State, I find that New York alone would, in 1825, have afforded two millions, and, perhaps, two and a half millions pounds of wool, for the use of the manufactories of the country, beyond what was required for the domestic or family consumption. But New York then possessed less than one-fourth of the whole number of sheep, according to the calculation I have made; and if the other States, named as wool-growing States, did, at that time, furnish as large a surplus, over and above the wool manufactured in the domestic way, in proportion to their respective populations, as did New York, how would this whole surplus, appropriated to the use of the manufactories, compare with the quantity they require?

The whole amount of woollen goods consumed in this country is variously estimated, at from fifty to sixty millions of dollars in value. One of the witnesses, and the only one, I think, who makes an estimate upon it, puts the value at fifty millions. The honorable chairman (Mr. MALLARY) says, he has seen an estimate at sixty-two millions. Suppose sixty millions to be the correct amount consumed. Of these, near ten millions, or between eight and ten millions, are imported; leaving not far from fifty millions to be, and which now are, manufactured in the country. What value of wool, then, is required to make this value of goods? By the testimony it will be seen that the value of the wool, as a general rule for this country, at present prices, is about one-half the value of the cloth it makes. The value of the wool, then, to make fifty millions of dollars worth of cloths, will be twenty-five millions of dollars. The wool produced in the country, according to the data and principles of calculation I have before assumed, will stand as follows:

In 1825, the number of sheep above-given,	13,809,678
Add 70 per cent. upon this number for the increase up to the present time, as obtained from the testimony as to Dutchess county, New York,	9,666,774
And the whole number of sheep will now be,	23,476,452

Multiply this whole number of sheep by two and one-half, the pounds of wool which each sheep, as appears by the testimony, will yield annually, and the whole quantity of wool grown in the United States, at the present time, will be 58,691,180 pounds.

I admit, sir, that all calculations of this kind are uncertain, and subject to considerable errors; but when it is remembered that this is made without any allowance for the sheep raised in the States south and west of those before named, of which there are known to be considerable numbers, and when it is proved by the testimony that many of the farmers have now on hand and unsold the shearings of from one to four years, I cannot doubt that this calculation is sufficiently small, and that the annual growth of wool in the United States, and the surplus now in the country unsold, must swell the value of the domestic wool at least to reach the present consumption.

As corroborating this estimate, I ask leave, sir, to refer to one of the memorials upon this subject, which has been printed and laid upon our tables since this bill was reported to the House. This memorial comes from a county of my own State, (Otsego,) second to few, and perhaps to none in it, in the extent and importance of its agricultural and manufacturing pursuits; and its language is as follows:

"The present number of sheep in the United States cannot be less than 20,000,000, and a steady market for wool would ensure their being double in number in three years. There is at this moment on hand, awaiting a favorable market, at least 20,000,000 lbs.; which, being added to the products of 20,000,000 sheep, we shall have, on the first of June next, 70,000,000 lbs.; which will be more than a supply of the raw material."

This, Mr. Chairman, strongly confirms me in the correctness of my own estimates; and if either be substantially correct in its results, the country does produce wool enough for the cloth she makes; and if enough for present demand is produced, no one can doubt the ability to extend the growing of wool even more rapidly than the manufactories can be increased by the present capital seeking that investment.

But, notwithstanding these evidences that the United States do produce a full supply of domestic wool, large quantities of foreign wool are annually imported; and one evidence that those importations do conflict with the domestic wool, is furnished in the fact, that very little or no coarse common domestic wool is purchased by the factories on the seaboard, where the coarse imported wools are readily obtained. The evidence of the importations is furnished in the Executive reports of the importations into the United States for the several years, by reference to which it will be seen that the value of these importations of wool, from 1822 to this time, have varied from about $350,000 to about $550,000 annually.

This wool must conflict with the wool of the country, if it be true that the country produces a supply; and it must affect the price far beyond its proportionable value, inasmuch as a surplus in the market, however small, sinks the price of the whole commodity. This wool also conflicts with the domestic, by supplying the very same market which the domestic wool ought to supply. This must be true, unless there are qualities imported answering a different purpose from that to which any domestic wool can be applied. But, sir, as I have before said, the manufactories upon the seaboard use none of the coarse domestic wools of the country; while those in the interior do use these coarse wools for the same purposes for which the others use the imported coarse wools. For proof of this, I refer to the testimony again.

[Here Mr. W. again made large quotations from the evidence taken before the Committee on Manufactures.]

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that this reference to the testimony is tedious and irksome to the committee; but, sir, I cannot discharge what I believe to be my duty, without making it. I wish to examine the bill reported by the committee, and the amendment offered by the honorable chairman, (Mr. MALLARY,) with express reference to it, and to the facts elicited by it. And taking the references I have just made,

MARCH, 1828.]

Tariff Bill—Wool and Woollens.

I ask where is the evidence of the want of foreign coarse wool? How many of the factories spoken of by these witnesses purchase any of the coarse domestic wools? Mr. Dexter and Mr. Dickinson are in the interior, and they use entirely domestic wools of all qualities. Nearly all the witnesses are employed in making fine cloths, either broadcloths or cassimeres, and of the same descriptions. Nearly all use the fine domestic wools, but most of them use the foreign coarse wools for listings, headings, and the like; a use for which the domestic coarse wools will answer an equally valuable purpose, as is shown by the fact, that the factories in the interior do make that use of it. But some of the witnesses, differently situated, swear expressly that they do not purchase it, and others, that they do not know its market price, which is equally evidence that it is not used in their factories. Others testify expressly to the use of the foreign coarse wools instead of the domestic.

It has been said, that for the manufacture of carpets, domestic wool cannot be used; that the price will be so high as to render it impossible to make the fabric at a reasonable value. From an examination of the testimony, does it appear that the foreign imported coarse wools are materially lower in price than the domestic? Will it not be found that domestic wools will be obtained in the course of manufacture as cheap as the foreign wools here mentioned? I believe, sir, I shall be able to show that they may be so obtained, that they must be fit for carpeting, and that their prices will not be higher than the average prices of the foreign wools.

Another and principal reason which induced me, and which I think influenced the majority of the committee to believe it necessary to change and increase the duty upon the coarse imported wools, is the confirmed opinion that many of these importations are made in evasion of the spirit of the existing laws, and that, by this means, qualities of wool are actually imported, invoiced at ten cents per pound, which conflict with wools of an entirely superior quality.

[For the evidence upon which this opinion is founded, Mr. W. again referred to the printed testimony.]

Here we have the evidence of the witness, that the largest quantities of the wool imported are of these coarse qualities, and invoiced at and below ten cents per pound. Of the samples of wool here spoken of, and which were frankly and generously prepared for the purpose, and exhibited to the committee by the Hon. Mr. Tuffe, I confess, Mr. Chairman, no judgment can be formed except from actual inspection and examination. I have examined them. They have been and I believe now are in the room of the Committee on Manufactures, where I hope many others have, or will examine them. I may be entirely mistaken in the judgment I have formed, and I certainly am not acquainted, to any considerable extent, with the different qualities of wools; but I am perfectly satisfied for myself, that at least two of these samples of wool are fully equal for all purposes of use, to much of the native wool of the country. Some of them have evidently not been cleansed at all; but, upon being cleansed and assorted, I cannot doubt that a large share of one of these samples of wool would be found fit to go into the manufacture of middling quality cloths. This, then, compels me to conclude that wools of these qualities, at least, must conflict with the coarse wools grown in this country. I may have misjudged as to the quality of these samples of wool; but, under my present impressions, the conclusion is irresistible.

But, sir, the difference in quality of the foreign wool introduced into the country by this change, in the course of importation, is worthy of notice. The quantity of wool imported into this country in 1822 and 1823, I have before given, and I will repeat them and compare those qualities with the number of pounds imported in 1825, 1826, and 1827, supposing that costing more than 10 cents per pound to average 60 cents per pound, and that costing 10 cents and under per pound, to average 7 cents per pound. These averages will at least be proportionably correct, for the years to which they apply, and cannot, I presume, be considered far from correct in the comparison with former years, when it shall be seen that some of the coarse wool sells in our markets, after paying duty and charges, as low as 6 cents, and that very little of the fine sells at a less price than 60 cents per pound.

But the honorable chairman (Mr. MALLARY) alleges that most of the domestic wool is of finer quality than the native wool of the country; that the present flocks of sheep are mostly of mixed or full bloods, and that little of the coarse wool is raised. He, sir, is a practical wool grower, and should be better acquainted with these facts than myself; and I am free to admit that it must be the interest of the wool-grower to make his flock as good as he can; to improve the quality of his wool until it reaches the finest point. But is this the state of the flocks at present in this country? So far as my knowledge extends, it is not. The flocks are not now Merino or Saxony. At least, sir, they are not in the district which I represent. Sir, the great body of the farmers of my district are men of small estates. The capital required to purchase flocks of these sheep, they do not—they cannot possess. The only means they have to attain them is by ingrafting them upon their present common stock; by crossing them with the breeds of common sheep, and improving the quality of their wool in that manner. These are the reasons which have operated upon my mind to induce me to wish to extend strong encouragement to the common flocks and common wool. But, sir, destroy the flocks of common sheep, and what will be the consequence? One of the witnesses has an-answered the question: "those who have small flocks will not keep them;" the business of wool-growing must go into the hands of the capitalist. Protect only the Merino, and other fine wools, and the moderate farmer will be excluded from the benefit. Extend your protection to the ordinary farmers of the country; let them be thoroughly protected, and your flocks will become again flourishing and numerous; they will be improved in kind and quality as well as in numbers.

But it has been said the demand for these coarse wools cannot be supplied by the native wools of the country. Is this so? To answer this question I only ask a general reference again to the testimony. The foreign coarse wools now sell in our markets at from 10 to 16 cents per pound, generally, though some of it sells as low as 6 cents per pound. This is established by the testimony of Mr. Tufts, to which I have before referred, presenting samples of imported wool, now selling in the Boston market at from 6 to 14 cents per pound, and again saying, "the largest quantity imported sells from 10 to 16 cents per pound in Boston;" by the testimony of Mr. Schenck, saying, "the average cost of the Buenos Ayres wool was from 8 to 12 cents per pound, according to my best recollection;" and by the testimony of Mr. Brown, saying, "coarse and fine wools are imported principally. The coarse wools are worth from 10 to 15 cents."

I have already examined the testimony with reference to the demand for this native wool; and the result has been found to be, that very few of the factories spoken of by the witnesses use it at all, and the others use but a very small share of it. Little demand, therefore, exists for it in our markets, although the foreign coarse wools sell readily. The only reason assigned for this is, that the coarse domestic wools bear so high a price as not to warrant their purchase by the manufacturer. If this objection has not been already obviated by showing the relative prices of these coarse wools, and the different conditions, as to cleanliness, in which they are found in the market, there is still another consideration, which, to my mind, fully answers the difficulty. These domestic wools are to be assorted for manufacture; and what then will be the relative quantity and value of the several parcels or qualities thus produced?

What remedy, then, does the amendment, proposed by the honorable chairman, provide against the importation of these coarse wools? It proposes to alter the valuation at which they shall be admitted from 10 to 8 cents. Beyond that it proposes no remedy. At and under 8 cents per pound they are still to be admitted at the nominal duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, if this proposition of the honorable chairman does not fall under the condemnation of his own argument in relation to another branch of this subject? We have been told by him, and we have been told by all the witnesses, that the present manner of levying the duty upon woollen goods is defective; that an ad valorem duty upon these goods can never furnish adequate protection; that the difficulty of correctly distinguishing the true quality, and consequently the true value of cloths, is insurmountable; that false invoices are and will be made; that the qualities of goods will be disguised, and, that, under such a law, they will not pay their just rates of duty. This reasoning, sir, had a convincing effect upon my mind. It had upon the minds of the committee, as the bill they have reported will show. But if the doctrine is true as to woollens, is it not equally true as to wool? May not the quality of the one be as easily ascertained as that of the other? Will the honorable chairman pretend that the appraiser can distinguish the difference in quality between a pound of wool, the true cost of which, in a foreign market, has been or should be, 8 or 10 cents, so as to determine whether it should or should not be admitted under the nominal duty? Will he pretend that two cents in the foreign value of a pound of wool, furnish a more obvious distinction in the quality of the wool, than usually exists between pieces of cloth of different qualities? He will probably answer me that any frauds which may be practised under this provision are too trifling to be the subjects of serious apprehension. In this opinion I would readily agree with him, if they related to the importation of an article which the country does not produce. But I believe the fact to be otherwise; and if it be so, I am bound to suppose this difference of valuation will be of no utility. If the reasoning in relation to the frauds be sound as to the cloths, it must also be sound as to the wool, and the alteration requisite to guard against them is not produced by the change of valuation from 10 to 8 cents. No remedy can be effected but a specific duty upon each pound of this wool. Any reasonable increase of the ad valorem duty upon an article of so small a value cannot operate as a sufficient guard, without being entirely disproportionate upon the finer wools: and, even laying aside that difficulty, the impossibility of distinguishing accurately the qualities of these wools, in the state they now are and will be imported, is not obviated by any ad valorem increase, and such a provision in relation to them would be left subject to all the objections made against it when applied to cloths. I have endeavored to show that these frauds do, to some extent, now exist. Indeed, the honorable chairman admit their existence in some degree.

But, sir, I have done with the subject of the bill and amendment, so far as they relate to the raw wool, and now pass to the woollen cloths, and to a comparison of the bill reported by the committee with the present law, and also with the proposed amendment, as they relate to the duty upon the manufactured fabrics. And here, Mr. Chairman, it becomes my duty to remark, that, at an early period of the labors of the Committee on Manufactures, I found I could not act with certainty upon this subject, with the information then possessed. I could not obtain the means of determining what protection the manufactures required, and therefore it was that I wished for an examination of witnesses before the committee. The power was granted by the House, and the committee have examined the manufacturers themselves. It shall now be my object to ascertain what facts have been established, by the testimony so taken, which will enable us to arrive, with some degree of certainty, at the just measure of this protection. And here, sir, I can only promise the committee that my reference to the evidence shall not be as tedious as those I have formerly made. The testimony upon the points to which I shall now ask the attention of the committee, is much more precise and satisfactory, than upon many other positions before taken.

Tariff Bill—Wool and Woollens.

I then assume, as a fact well settled by the evidence, that the cost of the wool, and the cost of manufacturing into cloth ready for the market, as a general rule in this country, at the present prices of wool, are about equal; or, in other words, that the cost of the raw wool in the United States, is about one-half the cost of the cloth it makes.

[Here Mr. W. again made extracts from the printed testimony taken before the committee.]

This, Mr. Chairman, closes the testimony as to this proposition, and upon which point every witness, whose knowledge of practical manufacturing has enabled him to answer the question, has given the same answer very nearly. I therefore consider the proposition as fully and incontrovertibly established by the proof. It will be found, however, that while this position is true as a general rule, there will be variations in it according to the different qualities of the cloth made. The cost of manufacturing the finer qualities, will be less than the cost of the wool, and the cost of the manufacturing the coarse qualities, will be greater than the cost of the wool, while at some of the intermediate qualities, an almost exact equality will exist.

In lots of wool costing not more than 75 cents per pound, these variations will balance each other and form an average equality between the cost of the wool and the cost of manufacturing, in any given quantity of wool.

That the next principle which I consider as established by the testimony is, that any given parcel of wool can be manufactured into cloth as cheap in the United States as it can in England, or, in other words, that the difference between the cost of woollen cloths in the United States and in England, is the difference in the cost of wool, the expense of manufacturing being the same in both countries.

For the proof of this position, Mr. W. referred to the testimony of the following witnesses:—Messrs. Shepherd, Marland, Young, Wolcott, Olapp, Dupont, and Peirce.

Here, again, Mr. Chairman, there is an entire agreement among all the witnesses, who are able to answer the interrogatory of the committee, in relation to the position I have taken, and their answers all go to establish its correctness.

I next assume it to be proved by the evidence taken, that the cost of wool in this country is greater than the cost of the same wool in England by from 50 to 80 per cent. upon the English cost; or, in other words, wool of the same quality costs from one-third to four-fifths more in the United States than it does in England.

Here, again, sir, I must tax the committee with a reference to the swearing of the witnesses, and I can only cheer them with the assurance that it is the last which I propose to make.

The following question, in substance, was put to most, if not all of the witnesses examined before the committee upon the subject of wool and woollens, and I will give the answers of such of them as were able to give definite answers to it.

Question.—Do you know the difference in the price of wool of the same quality in the British and in the American markets?

[Answered by eight witnesses.]

These answers give as the extremes of difference in the price of wool in the two countries, 50 and 80 per cent. upon the English price; and one witness says, "this (50 per cent.) is the lowest price at which it can be sold to cover all expenses; thus plainly giving us to understand, that this will cover all expenses, and leaving the equally plain inference that any further advance is the importer's profit, whatever that advance may be. In corroboration of this idea, also, the witness, Mr. Poor, is asked—"Is importing wool a profitable business, and do the importers find ready sales for it?" And his answer is: "It has been a profitable business for some time past, say at least for 1827; but it is attended with uncertainty, like other mercantile pursuits. During the past year the sales have been very ready: we have sold, as auctioneers, about 360,000 lbs. of foreign wool, and about 108,000 lbs. of domestic wool." Yet, sir, as the witnesses do not exactly agree as to this difference in the prices of wool between England and this country, and as I wish to put this subject upon at least a safe footing, for the American manufacturer, I have assumed the medium between these two extremes of 50 and 80 per cent. to be the correct difference between the price of wool in the two countries, and shall make my estimates upon a supposed difference in the cost of wool in favor of England, of 65 per cent., which is that medium.

What, then, are the present and the proposed duties? The present duties upon these goods, as will be seen by the amount of importations just given, is 25 and 33½ per cent. ad valorem. The bill reported proposes a change in the manner of levying the duties from an ad valorem to a specific form, by adopting the mini-minimum principle, as it is called, and thus recommends an increase of the present rates of duty in two ways: 1st, by a direct increase of the ad valorem duty; and 2d, by the regulation of the minimums; so that by the provisions of the bill a square yard of cloth, costing in a foreign market 20 cents, and one costing 50 cents, will pay the same duty; a square yard of cloth costing 51 cents, and one costing 100 cents, will pay the same duty; a square yard of cloth costing 101 cents, and one costing 250 cents, will pay the same duty; and a square yard of cloth costing 251 cents, and one costing 400 cents, will pay the same duty; and all intermediate values in each case will pay the same duty with the highest extreme of the minimum. All values above 4 dollars the square yard, are, by the bill, to pay an ad valorem duty of 45 per cent. The amendment of the honorable Chairman, (Mr. MALLARY,) proposes to make a square yard of cloth, costing in a foreign market 20 cents, and one costing 50 cents, pay the same duty; a square yard of cloth costing 51 cents, and one costing 250 cents, pay the same duty; a square yard of cloth costing 250 cents, and one costing 400 cents, pay the same duty, and a square yard of cloth costing 401 cents, and one costing 600 cents, pay the same duty; and fixes upon the lower priced cloths a somewhat higher rate of duty than that proposed by the bill, but a rate of duty not so high upon the fine cloths, it proposing 40, and the bill reported by the committee 45 per cent.

Another tabular calculation will show the rates per cent. of the duties proposed by the bill, and also by the amendment of the honorable Chairman, by which the direct increase of the rates proposed, and also the increase produced by the adoption of the minimum principle, may be seen and compared. That this comparison may be as perfect as practicable, I have made the calculation at the extremes, and at the mean of each minimum, and have also given the medium increase of the present rates of duty upon each minimum, both of the bill and of the amendment. They are as follows:

Thus it will be found that the rates of duty proposed by the committee, range from 82 to 99 per cent., omitting fractions entirely, which are omitted in the table, and that the rates proposed by the amendment vary from 44 to 215 per cent. In one single instance the duty proposed by the committee diminishes the present duty. That instance is at the very highest extreme of the first, or 50 cent minimum. The now rate of duty upon a square yard of cloth costing 50 cents in a foreign market, as will be seen by the table, is 88½ per cent., while the rate proposed by the bill at that point, is but 82 per cent.; or, to be better understood, as I intend to argue this question with perfect candor, the duty proposed by the committee upon a yard of cloth invoiced at fifty cents, or at any price under that sum, is 16 cents; while the present duty upon a yard of cloth invoiced exactly at 50 cents, would be 18½ cents, making a difference in favor of the present duty, confined strictly to this point, as to cost, of 2½ cents. This, upon its face and unexplained, would seem to be wrong, and contrary to the principles which have governed the committee. I will, therefore, ask the patience of the committee for one moment, while I examine this minimum. It is conceded on all hands that the cloths falling within this minimum, must be either very coarse fulled cloths, or the lighter fabrics, as baizes, flannels, &c. Now the first difficulty presenting itself in the formation of this bill, was to graduate a duty which should afford protection to the manufacturer upon these coarse fulled cloths, and at the same time should not be entirely unreasonable upon the light fabrics just mentioned. The present law had made a distinction in the duty below this point, of 50 cents, and had imposed a duty of only 25 per cent. upon all cloths costing 38½ cents the square yard, while upon all costing over that sum, a duty of 88½ per cent. was imposed. To this distinction flannels and baizes were made an exception, and the distinction was declaredly introduced to favor a description of the coarse fulled cloths, extensively used, and forming the heaviest item of woollens consumed in one section of this Union. I refer to the cloths commonly called negro cloths. These were supposed mostly to come under the distinction of cloths costing less than 38½ cents the square yard, and therefore to pay a duty of 25 per cent. If this was a correct supposition of the former law, I ask, Mr. Chairman, what duty will these cloths pay by the proposed bill? A square yard of cloth costing 38½ cents, by the present law pays a duty of 9 16-100 cents, say 9 2-10 cents. By the bill reported by the committee, the same yard of cloth will pay a duty of 16 cents, making an increase of the duty beyond what is now imposed, of 6 8-10 upon every square yard. Now, sir, suppose no single yard of these cloths comes invoiced at a less price than 38½ cents, I ask, is not this a sufficient increase of the duty? It is 48 instead of 25 per cent. But we have seen by the calculation and table I have just given, that the average increase of duty upon this minimum, even supposing 20 cents to be its lowest extreme, by the effect of the minimum principle, is 12 per cent. beyond the duty now imposed; and this is true, while at the extreme point of 50 cents, the present duty is very triflingly reduced. This is the only minimum proposed in the bill where the present rate of duty is not increased even at the highest extreme of the graduated value. Thus, all cloths costing more than fifty cents, and not more than one dollar, are to pay the same duty, a duty of 40 cents upon every square yard. The present duty upon a yard of cloth costing 1 dollar, is 86 2-3 cents; thus leaving an increase at the very extreme of this minimum, of the difference between 86 2-3 and 40 cents, or 8½ on the yard of cloth, while at the lowest extreme of this minimum, the difference between the present and the proposed duty is, a fraction more than 21 cents upon each yard of cloth, in favor of the latter. The average increase upon cloths falling within this minimum, is, as we have just seen, 20 per cent. beyond the present rate of duty.

Tariff Bill—Wool and Woollens.

I will not trouble the committee with a further recapitulation of this table, than to remark, that an examination of the calculation will show that the medium increase of duty upon cloths falling within the third minimum, is 23 per cent. beyond the present duty, and within the fourth, a fraction more than 20 per cent. increase; while the extremes will be found equally to increase the present rates of duty upon the same cloths. After this point, I presume the bill will not be objected against by the friends of the amendment, as its proposed rates of duty are even higher than those proposed by the amendment. The medium increase beyond the present rate of duty, by the respective minimums, in the proposed amendment, will be found by this table to be, upon the first, 29 per cent.; upon the second, 40 per cent.; upon the third, 20 per cent.; and upon the fourth, 19 per cent., rejecting fractions, and the extremes of increase are from 10 to 182 per cent.

Thus, having seen what the present duty is, what the duties proposed by the bill and amendment are, and what increase beyond the present rate and amount, is proposed by each, it remains for me to examine whether the duties proposed by the bill, as reported by the committee, are sufficient to give to the manufacturer of woollen cloths that protection which he actually requires. And here let me ask, Mr. Chairman, what protection does the manufacturer really need? Have we the means of answering this inquiry? I think, sir, we have, and that, too, with considerable certainty. I have already shown, or attempted to show, that the cost of wool, and the cost of manufacturing it into cloth, at the present prices of wool in this country, are equal; that any given parcel of wool can be manufactured into cloth as cheap in the United States as it can in England; or, in other words, that the difference in the cost of woollen cloths in the two countries, is the difference in the cost of the wool of which they are made, the expense of manufacturing being the same in both; and that the cost of wool in the United States is greater than the cost of the same wool in England, by from 50 to 80 per cent. upon the English cost. These propositions I consider to be fully proved by the testimony to which I have referred; and taking them to be true, I think we arrive necessarily at the conclusion, that the protection which the manufacturer of woollen goods in this country requires, is equal to the difference between the cost of the wool he uses in England and in this country. The cost of his fabric is the cost of the wool and the cost of the manufacturing it into the fabric; and, as it is established that the English and the American manufacturer can do the manufacturing at the same expense, the difference at which each can furnish the fabric at cost, must be the difference which each has to pay for the wool of which it is made. But it is also established that, as a general rule, the cost of the wool is one-half of the cost of the fabric when prepared for the market, and that the cost of wool in this country is greater than the cost of the same, or an equal quality of wool in England, by from 50 to 80, the medium 65 per cent. upon the English cost. Therefore, the protection required by our manufacturers, is equal to 65 per cent. upon the cost in England of the wool they use.

If, then, the cost of the wool, and the cost of manufacturing it in this country, are equal; if the cost of manufacturing is as cheap here as it is in England; if the cost of wool in this country is greater than it is in England by 65 per cent., as an average, upon the English cost; and if I have shown that the bill, as reported by the Committee on Manufactures, covers this difference in the price of wool, and even goes beyond it, I have shown enough for my purpose.

The American manufacturer has, by the bill as reported, all the protection which he swears that he needs.

Here I should remark, that these tables are cast upon the assumption that 65 per cent. is the true difference between the cost of wool in England and in the United States, although I have before noticed that there are strong reasons to believe that this per centage is greater than the difference which, in fact, exists, or that a less advance (say 50 per cent.) would pay the present duty, costs, and charges, and enable the importer to bring in foreign wool. My calculations have also been made upon the present prices of wool in this country, and the only possible manner of shaking them, or disproving their correctness, is by the assumption that the duty proposed by the bill, upon raw wool, is to enhance the price of that article, to the extent of the duty. The soundness of this argument, as well as the propriety of its use, by the friends of the protecting system, I shall, by and by, have occasion to notice. But as a partial answer to it, supposing that the proposed duty upon wool may have some effect to enhance the price of it, I present the excess of duty over the protection required at the present prices of wool in this country. At all points of each minimum, that excess is considerable, but at the highest extreme of the first minimum, 50 cents, the only point in the whole bill where the present duty upon cloths is not increased, that excess amounts to more than 7 per cent. upon the value of the cloth, or 14 per cent. upon the value of the wool. At the highest extreme of the next minimum, $1 00, the excess is 15 per cent. upon the cloth, or 80 per cent. upon the wool, and this again is the least excess to be found in the bill, with the exception of that at 50 cents. Will it then be contended, by the friends of protection, that wool is to rise in price, by the operation of protecting laws, beyond either of these rates of increase? If not, then the duties proposed by the bill will still be a sufficient protection to the manufacturer. It now then remains for me to answer a very few of the arguments used by the honorable chairman, (Mr. MALLARY,) and as I suppose, intended to apply to the amendment he has offered, although he did not offer the amendment until after he closed his remarks.

As to the frauds alleged to be committed in the importation of those coarse wools, the honorable chairman has given all the answer which he could have given; that, if these wools are imported in a foul state to disguise their quality, they will necessarily lose in cleansing, and that loss must operate to increase the duty upon the cleansed wool. This is true, practically, to a certain extent, but not to the extent which the gentleman seems to suppose. But, sir, suppose it to have been true up to this time, what effect has it upon the subject now before the committee? We are now to reason, not upon the existing law, but upon the effect of the law which we are about to pass. Let us then see what will be the inducements to these frauds, if the amendment proposed by the honorable chairman (Mr. MALLARY) is adopted. One pound of wool, worth in a foreign market 16 cents, will, by that amendment, pay 20 cents duty. Mix with that pound of wool 1 pound of dirt, making two pounds in weight, and worth 8 cents per pound, and what duty will it then pay? The two pounds will still be worth only 16 cents, and will by that same amendment only be charged with a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem, equal upon the 2 pounds of wool and dirt, to 2 64-100 cents. Here, then, you will have the same pound of wool imported, and consequently conflicting with a pound of equal quality of our own wool, while, by this simple fraud, 17 86-100 cents are saved upon the duty it should pay—an amount greater than the cost of the pound of wool itself in the foreign market, and the same wool would pay a duty of 2 64-100, instead of 20 cents. Does, then, the bill as reported by the committee, furnish an effectual check to these frauds? That bill proposes a duty of 7 cents, specifically, upon every pound of wool imported, and a further duty upon all wool of 40 per cent. ad valorem. The duty at that rate, upon one pound of wool worth 16 cents in the foreign market, would be about 14 cents; and any attempt to disguise its quality, by means which should add to its weight, would only increase the duty by 7 cents upon every pound weight added. This view of the case must certainly convince even the honorable chairman himself, that this provision of the bill is to be preferred, and that his amendment only proclaims a bounty upon frauds in the importation of coarse wools.

MONDAY, March 24.

Case of R. W. Meade.

The House proceeded to the orders of the day, which was the unfinished business of Saturday, consisting of the bill and amendment for the relief of R. W. Meade.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to its third reading,

Mr. WALES withdrew his call for the previous question.

Mr. POLK then took the floor in opposition to the bill, and was replied to, at considerable length, by Mr. EVERETT in its favor.

Mr. RANDOLPH then made a series of remarks on the unfitness of the House to be a tribunal for the decision of private claims, on the advanced stage of the session, the necessity of coming to some conclusion as to the tariff, and concluded by moving to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was negatived—ayes 61, noes 90.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I voted against the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) to lay this bill upon the table; because I believed, that in a few minutes its fate would have been finally decided, by a direct vote of the House, upon its engrossment.

I shall not suffer myself to be drawn into the debate, upon the general questions involved in this bill, neither shall I express any opinion in regard to the validity of Mr. Meade's claim. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ACHER) has no application to me; because I have read and carefully examined all the documents, connected with this claim, which have been published; and still I am not informed as to its nature. I ought not therefore to have formed any opinion upon the subject.

It has been admitted by the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, (Mr. EVERETT,) that the royal certificate ought to have no effect upon our decision; and that it must be sustained by other documents, before this claim can be allowed. It is certain, that upon this certificate alone, the United States ought not to be made answerable to Mr. Meade. Why then are not the documents necessary to sustain this claim, now produced? Where are they? In the possession of Mr. Meade? I believe not. We are then about to provide a tribunal for the examination of documents which may be in Spain, or may be, the Lord knows where. We are asked to call into existence a Board of Commissioners, but whether they shall ever act or not, will depend upon the contingency, whether Mr. Meade will ever be able to procure his vouchers. Let these vouchers be first procured; let Mr. Meade present them to the House, and let them be submitted to one of our committees, ; and if they should be too voluminous for its examination, then, and not till then, shall I vote to establish a Board. It is the first time I have ever heard of a claim sent by Congress to be audited, whilst the vouchers upon which it rested were not in the possession, and for any thing we know, might never be in the power of the claimant. Against this claimant I entertain no prejudice ; on the contrary, my feelings are all of an opposite character ; but I am not willing to establish a special commission to investigate his claim, before he has submitted to us any vouchers upon which it can be sustained.

Case of R. W. Meade.

[Mr. EVERETT here explained. He said he was informed that Mr. Meade had a large mass of documents in his possession ready to submit.]

Mr. B. proceeded. Sir, said he, this makes the case stronger against him, than I had ever supposed. If he had the documents upon which his claim is founded, or any part of them in his possession, why did he not submit them to the committee? And why did that committee rest their report upon the royal certificate alone, which is now admitted to be insufficient to establish the claim?

It has been said, that the passage of this bill, in its present form, will not commit the House upon this claim. I am far from being of that opinion. The bill proposes to appoint three commissioners, to examine and liquidate this claim, and report such items of it as they think ought to be allowed, together with the evidence. And am I to be told, that if we shall establish a tribunal to examine and to decide this question, that after they shall have reported their decision to this House, we shall be as free to act, as if there had been no such proceedings under our authority? Will this be the case, after we shall have asked and obtained the opinions of the Attorney-General and two of the Auditors of the Treasury? It is true, we may reverse their decision if we think proper ; but it is equally certain, that the judgment of a judicial tribunal established by our own authority, must necessarily have an influence upon our decision. It will be prima facie evidence of the justice of the claim, and will relieve the claimant from the burthen of proof, and cast it upon the United States.

But, sir, I do not like to send a claim of this magnitude to be decided by persons whom I do not know. The President may, in his discretion, appoint any two of the five Auditors of the Treasury. These Auditors are all equal in the eye of the law ; but yet, there are some of them upon whose decision I should rely with much more confidence than upon that of others. I do not suppose that the Attorney-General would leave the duties of his station to audit this claim. The business will, therefore, be chiefly transacted by the two Auditors who may be appointed.

I cannot perceive what the friends of the claim expect from the establishment of this tribunal, unless they suppose that its decision will have an influence upon our judgment. In what manner can it expedite the final determination of the claim? The bill does not propose that it shall be paid, until after Congress, at their next session, shall have acted upon the report of the Board. Why then should we not wait until the next session, when the vouchers, if they exist, can be produced to us ; and, if then, the Committee on Foreign Relations shall not be able to examine and decide upon them, we can refer them to a Board of Commissioners. It is not even pretended that the vouchers are all here yet. We have seen none of them, and in the course of this long debate, I have never heard until this day, that any of them were in the possession of Mr. Meade.

Mr. S. WOOD next rose, and said, that he wished briefly to assign the reasons of the vote he should give without entering at large into the subject.

Sir, said he, every Government is bound by the principles of the social contract, to protect its citizens in the lawful exercise of their rights, and those whose property has been taken from them by violence on the ocean or in the ports and harbors of neutral and friendly powers, are entitled to call on Government to aid them in seeking redress.

Yet, even in case Government should be unable to obtain redress by peaceable means, it is not bound to go to war to avenge or redress individual injuries, if inconsistent with the general welfare.

The case is very different with regard to debts, or demands arising from contracts with foreign Governments, by citizens resident there.

A citizen who takes up his residence in a foreign country, and entrusts his property with the citizens or subjects of that country, does it at his own risk ; and whatever difficulties he may encounter in recovering his debts, he has no reason to complain, while the tribunals of justice are open to him in common with others. If he becomes a creditor of the Government, he relies upon the ability and good faith of the Government to discharge its engagements, and must share the fate of other public creditors. Nothing less than an open and flagrant denial of right can entitle him to claim the interposition of his own Government in the prosecution of his demand. A different doctrine would make the Government the insurer of every mercantile adventurer, who should choose to become a public creditor, would subject the Government to unpleasant altercation with other Governments in relation to their private contracts with individuals, and would lead to consequences that would be intolerable.

There is no pretence that this was the case with regard to the petitioner. The embarrassed state of the Spanish finances rendered the debts of that Government in a great measure desperate, and, at his pressing solicitation, the claims of the common creditors of Spain were included in the treaty, with the claims of those for whom the Government was bound to provide.

The insertion of these claims in the treaty, was, therefore, purely gratuitous; and it was a favor to the applicant to be placed on an equality with those whose property had been taken from them by force, and had a right to call on the Government for redress. His claim was admitted, subject to the same restrictions, as to the mode of adjustment and liquidation, as those claims were; and, if Government has extended the same justice to him as to others, it has discharged its obligations to him.

The stipulations in the treaty constituted the measure of its obligation. The United States, in consideration of the cession made by Spain, agreed to appropriate five millions of dollars towards the payment of such claims against Spain as should be allowed under the treaty; to institute a Board of Commissioners, to continue in commission three years, to ascertain the amount and validity of all the claims that should be brought before them, and to demand of Spain all such documents as were in her possession, which should be intimated by the commissioners to be necessary to the investigation of any claims submitted to them.

Have not the United States, in good faith, discharged all the obligations imposed on them by the treaty? Did not the Government institute the Board of Commissioners, and make the demand on Spain when required? Did not the Board continue in commission three years? Did they not adjust all the claims which were sustained before them? And, have not the five millions been distributed among those whose claims were allowed, in conformity with the stipulations of the treaty? It cannot be questioned.

It has been said, that the petitioner had not time to procure his documents to sustain his claim before the commissioners, after he had obtained the order for their production. Why was not the order produced in season?

The commission was organized in June, 1821, and continued until June, 1824. The petitioner presented his claim in January, 1822, but did not apply for an order on Spain, for his documents, until April, 1823, when the time proved insufficient for the purpose. Why were nearly two years suffered to elapse, before the course provided by the treaty for procuring his documents was adopted? Are the United States in fault for the omission? The petitioner had the control of his own claim, and had ample time to procure his documents; and it would be unjust to charge the Government with the consequences of his own neglect. It was not in the power of the Government to act until he furnished them with a schedule of the papers required, and an order of the commissioners for their production; and there is no complaint of the want of promptness in acting the moment these were exhibited.

It is a sufficient vindication of the good faith with which the Government has fulfilled the stipulations of the treaty with Spain, that all the claimants had it in their power to obtain their proportion of the fund which was provided for their indemnity, if they had exercised the requisite diligence to substantiate their claims before the commissioners, according to the stipulations of the treaty by which it was pledged for that purpose. Those whose claims were adjusted, were entitled to the whole fund. It has been distributed among them, and there is nothing left for further distribution. The treaty made as ample provision for debts as well as claims against Spain, as the creditors or claimants had any right to ask, and neither justice nor policy requires that any further provision should be made. Sir, the passage of any bill on the subject would involve a recognition of some sort of liability to the petitioner, and cannot be sustained on any valid principles.

Besides, if you make provision for one, you must extend the gratuity to the whole, who are in the same situation. We are told that there are claims resting on the same grounds with that of the petitioner, to the amount of $90,000 dollars. If you allow this claim the present session, what answer will you give those claimants when they apply to you at the next? Their claims will be warranted by this, and consistency will require that they should be treated in the same manner, and with more reason may the claimants for spoliation urge the full satisfaction of their claims.

If you open your Treasury to the petitioner, you cannot close it against demands of the same order, much less against those of a much higher character; and a determination to abide by the results of the treaty, or to provide full satisfaction for every claimant, ought to govern the vote on this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, called for the previous question.

The call was sustained by the House, and the question then recurring, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The main question was then put as follows: "Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" which question was decided by—yeas 66, nays 105.

So the House refused to order the bill to be read the third time, thereby rejecting the bill.

Disbursing and Accounting Officers.

The debate on the resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, was resumed.

Mr. BARBOUR said: Prior to Mr. Jefferson's Administration, the language of our appropriation acts was loose and general. He saw the omens of mischief that crowded around this practice, and in his first message advised this change. Specific appropriations to definite objects followed, and his model of economy and simplicity in administration, is happily illustrated, in this respect, by its strict coherence to the plain principles of the constitution. In process of time, these views gave way to a misguiding exigency, and the spirit of the constitution was subdued in the act of March 3d, 1809. The right to transfer appropriations defeats that guard over the public money which the constitution designed for its security, and gives into the hands of the President the key that unlocks, at his will, the national treasures. This was, no doubt, a temporary convenience, but it was fraught with serious error in its inception, and still more serious danger in the precedent. The present Vice President of the United States moved upon this floor in 1816, the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of an act entitled an act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, passed 3d March, 1809, as authorizes the President of the United States to transfer appropriations.”

Although powerfully resisted in debate, he succeeded in this effort to bring back the executive action to its constitutional limits. Had he no other claims to public gratitude but this single act of replacing the constitution upon its true and original basis, it would be of itself sufficient to give him a high and just rank among the benefactors of his country. The act of March 3d, 1817, was the fruit of his exertions. That of May, 1820, next followed. By this last act, the power of transfer, which is equivalent to the grant of absolute power over disbursement, was vested in the President, for the following specified objects:—“For the subsistence of the army; for forage; for the medical and hospital Department;” also in the Navy Department; “for provisions, for medicines and hospitable stores, for repairs of vessels, for clothing.” And this act concludes by prohibiting all other transfer of appropriation. As the gentleman has called in question the accuracy of my first estimate of the sums subject to the will of the President, I have revised it upon his own admitted basis of calculation. If I am in error, that error is incurable, for I have spared no diligence in the scrutiny by which I tested the correctness of the original estimate. Sir, I must repeat that the contingent expenses of the first year of Mr. Jefferson’s Administration, though open to some cavil, should be fairly set down at $58,213 57 cents; but embracing both enumerated and unenumerated contingencies, will not exceed $120,000—for the second year the amount was $20,350—and for the third year was $15,001 2 cents. Contrasted with these, the appropriations for the last year, that are under the dominion of the Executive, may be set down at two millions and fifty-six thousand one hundred and fifty-three dollars and forty-eight cents. We may, with propriety, add to this sum, the appropriations for internal as well as external commerce—comprising the sums allotted for light-houses, buoys, piers, &c., &c., which touch the latter subject; and roads, canals, and surveys, as connected with the former. For in these disbursements, the power conferred is so general, and the application of money in the legislative act, so loose and undefined, as necessarily to confide the expenditure to the Executive judgment, as a supplement to the expressed will of the Legislature.

For these purposes there was last year expended eight hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and four dollars and fifty-two cents; and which added to the above amount of two millions fifty-six thousand one hundred and fifty-three dollars and forty-eight cents, make a total of two millions, eight hundred and seventy thousand three hundred and fifty-eight dollars. I am thoroughly persuaded that it will in the aggregate, exceed, rather than fall short of this computation. I have brought with me to my seat the Treasury reports, and extracts carefully taken from the acts of Congress making appropriation.* It will be to me a source of gratification, if the gentleman from New Hampshire, or any other member, will take these papers, (or copies of them,) and detect, by the severest scrutiny, any error of estimate or calculation. Mr. Speaker, is it not a theme for curious and anxious speculation, that whenever any allusion is here made to the expenses of Government, the friends of the Chief Magistrate rise up with their correlative estimates of the present and past Administrations? And yet, sir, this tremulous sensitiveness is by no means inexplicable. It is a fact, susceptible of the plainest demonstration, that the disbursements of public money, under like circumstances, and for the same objects of expenditure, by the present Administration, have exceeded all former example. And it is not upon untenable ground that I make up this opinion. Arithmetical calculations, resting upon responsible reports from the Treasury Department, carry my mind to this confident conclusion. Whatever causes may arise for diversity of opinion upon other topics of inquiry, none can here exist; for the estimate of dollars and cents, by the plain use of figures, cannot conduct us into error, without the certainty of immediate and palpable detection. In the view that I took of this subject, my attention was fixed to the comparative estimate of appropriation and expenditure for the three years of this Administration, compared with that of the three years immediately preceding it; and it presents the following results:

* Such tables as these present proper points for the pause and contemplation of statesmen: they show the progress of the federal expenditure, and furnish the data for instructive and useful comparison. They are the test of economy; and give to the word a practical, and a tangible meaning. The democracy of 1823 made it a charge of extravagance against Mr. Adams’ administration because the expenditures of the Government (independent of those fixed objects which have no relation to the expenses of the Government) amounted to about eleven millions per annum; and seemed to have some reason for the reproach, as the same expenditure under the preceding administration was only about eight millions per annum.

I have omitted any notice of the charges upon the Treasury, for the public debt and the military pensions, because the payments to these objects, cannot by any dialectic ingenuity, be made the theme of eulogy to any Administration. The extinguishing action of the sinking fund upon the public debt, cannot be set down to the credit of the Executive; it results from pre-existing law. The excess of accumulation in the surplus fund, by operation of the same law, disgorge itself into the sinking fund, and becomes in like manner sacred to the public engagement. The appropriations for military pensions I have also excluded, because this is a disbursement likewise resting upon definite and uncontrollable causes, and is in no instance to be effected by administrative prodigality or economy. This channel of expenditure has been gradually contracting, by the inflexible operation of the great law of nature, upon the aged survivors of the Revolutionary Army. I choose here to mention, that a slight difference may be made to appear in these calculations, if resort be had to the late report on the public debt. But this will present a stronger case, by five or six thousand dollars, against the present Administration. I have made my deductions from the table accompanying the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and sent to that committee from the Treasury Department. I have taken that basis for calculation which presents the smallest discrepant amount of expenditure in the two periods embraced in the comparison. And here, too, Mr. Speaker, I entreat the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BARTLETT,) to take these estimates, with the materials from which they have been made up, and give them his closest examination.

They challenge and defy his scrutiny. The vaunted care and economy of this Administration, is opposed with the stubborn and melancholy fact, that eight millions six hundred and eighty-five thousand three hundred and seven dollars and forty-four cents have already been thriftlessly expended, instead of having been applied to the extinction of the public debt, since the present Chief Magistrate came into office. Sir, the evil does not stop here. It is said that we are enjoined by the constitutional duties which the distribution of power among the co-ordinate branches of Government impose on us, to grant supplies. And the fact is unquestionable, that the Executive estimates for the service of the current year, are at least equal, and in the main probably greater, than for that which has closed. Pushing ahead for further results, in the supposititious economy of this care-taking Administration, and judging of what is to be done by that which has been done, I am warranted in saying that this excess of expenditure, beyond its comparative proportion, will be increased to eleven millions five hundred and eighty thousand four hundred and ten dollars and twenty-five cents. Is this to be borne with in a temper of patient forbearance? Can it be successfully controverted by any varying computation? Can it be palliated by any further disclosures of a justifying and imperative necessity? I am firmly convinced that it cannot.

The Treasury report from which I have taken these expenditures, details for each and every year, the same items of disbursement, identically and successively extended. In the present condition of things, with a commerce suffering under exaction, and agriculture languishing into decay, have not our constituents (already burdened with excessive though indirect taxes) a right to hold to us the chiding language of Divine inspiration, and say,—“We have labored, and other men have entered into the fruits of our labors?”

FRIDAY, March 28.

Tariff Bill.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Tariff Bill.

The amendment offered to the bill by Mr. MALLARY, Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, yesterday, was read.

The amendment to the above, offered by Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, was then also read.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I presume there will be no difficulty in understanding the effect of the amendment which I have offered. It proposes merely to strike out the minimums from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY.) Should my motion prevail, then the amendment of that gentleman will contain a progressive increase of the present ad valorem duty of 33½ per cent. upon the importation of woollen goods, until it shall reach 50 per cent. During the first year it will be 40 per cent., the second 45 per cent., and the third year it will attain the limit of 50 per cent. The increase of ad valorem duty will then amount to 16½ per cent. The addition to the present duty upon coarse woollen cloths, costing in a foreign country not exceeding 33½ cents per square yard, will be much greater than what I have stated. It may be proper, should my amendment prevail, to make a discrimination in their favor, similar to that which exists under the present law. Should my motion prevail, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont will still be open for other amendments. I have made this explanation so that my purpose may be clearly understood.

I shall now, as briefly as possible, state the reasons which have induced me to move to strike out the minimums from the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY.) I shall not, at this time, discuss either the constitutionality or the policy of protecting domestic industry by legislation. I consider that these questions have long since been settled. This policy has been established, not under any particular excitement, not in high party times, but by all parties, and at all times. I admit that in our legislation we ought not to be bound by precedents; but yet it is equally clear that a uniform current of precedents, during a long period of years, furnish the highest evidence of the correctness of those principles upon which they are founded.

The system of minimums proposed by the gentleman from Vermont is an entire departure from the settled policy of the country. This policy has ever been to afford that degree of protection to domestic manufactures which would enable them to sustain a fair and successful competition with the manufactures imported from abroad. Our legislation has ever been at war with direct and immediate prohibition. In times past, it has been our policy gradually, not suddenly, to banish foreign manufactures from our markets. In this manner, the commerce employed by any particular branch of foreign manufactures is gradually diverted into new channels. No interest in the country sustains a shock. Even the price of articles, under such a protection, is but little enhanced in the beginning, and at the end of a few years, it sinks below the old standard. We have acted upon these principles since the origin of the Federal Government. Since 1789, when the duty upon woollen goods was fixed at 5 per cent. ad valorem, the increase has been gradual, until it has now reached 33½ per cent.

Let me ask this committee what would be the effect of the minimums recommended by the Harrisburg Convention, and proposed by the gentleman from Vermont? (Mr. MALLARY.) No man can doubt but that it would be the absolute, immediate prohibition of a very large proportion of the woollen goods which we now import. Much as gentlemen may have differed concerning what would be the practical effect of minimums generally, no one has denied that these minimums would immediately, to a great extent, prohibit the importation of foreign woollens. Under the system proposed by the Harrisburg Convention a square yard of cloth, costing fifty cents, or below that price, would pay a duty of 28 cents. If, however, it should cost fifty-one it would pay a duty of $1 40. Thus one cent of increase in the price would make a difference of $1 12, or more than 150 per cent. in the duty. In order to reach the second minimum, we must suddenly rise, from cloth costing 50 cents the square yard, to that which costs $2 50. Each square yard of cloth, then, which has cost any price above fifty cents, and not exceeding $2 50, without regard to its quality, must pay the same duty of $1 40. If, however, it should cost $2 51, then it will fall within the operation of the third minimum, of $4, and pay a duty of $2 25. Thus at this point it will be perceived that a difference of one cent in the price will make a difference of 85 cents in the duty. There is a fourth minimum, which embraces all cloths costing above $4, and not exceeding $6, the square yard, which will operate in a similar manner. Cloth costing more than $6 the square yard will pay only an ad valorem duty. Thus it will be perceived that the system of minimums is not only complicated and arbitrary in its nature, but it is calculated to deceive the people of the United States. And why? The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont proposes to increase the ad valorem duty 16½ per cent.; and to this point the public attention will be directed. But what will be the effect of the minimums which are covered under the veil of obscurity? I shall not make my calculations at the extreme points, because that might not be considered fair; but I shall take the intermediate prices between the minimums. They will be cloths costing $1 50, $3 25, and $5 per square yard. Upon the first class the duty would be increased by the proposed amendment, from 33½, the present rate, to 84 per cent. ad valorem. I need not pursue this calculation further. Every gentleman can do it for himself; and he will discover that it will lead to similar results.

In my opinion no combination of wool growers and wool manufacturers, should ever attempt to dictate a tariff to the people of the United States. They would be more than men, if self-interest did not prejudice their judgment, and call forth propositions for their own benefit, at the expense of the community. The argument, therefore, that we should sustain this proposition, because it emanated from the Harrisburg Convention, is not entitled to much consideration; and more especially, as they have recommended a departure from the long-settled and long-approved policy of the country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BATES) has asserted, if I understood him correctly, that the Legislature of Pennsylvania have sanctioned and recommended the proposition of the Harrisburg Convention respecting woollens. In this he is entirely mistaken. The Legislature of that State, with the practical wisdom which marks its character, have drawn a line between protection and prohibition; and whilst they have recommended the one, they have denounced the other. They have also recommended such a tariff as will operate equally both upon the rich and upon the poor. This can never be the case under a system the principle of which is the higher the price between any two minimums, the lower the rate of duty. I shall read a few lines from the preamble to their resolutions. It declares, that "the best interests of our country demand, that every possible exertion should be made to procure the passage of an act of Congress imposing such duties as will enable our manufacturers to enter into fair competition with foreign manufacturers." And again: "the people of Pennsylvania do not ask for such a tariff as would secure to any one class, or to any section of the country, a monopoly." They want a system of protection, which will extend its blessings as well as its burdens, as equally as possible, over every part of the Union—to be uniform in its operation upon the rich as well as the poor."

The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, should it prevail, will be an absolute and immediate prohibition of nearly all the foreign woollens which are worn by the middle and poorer classes of the people. The cloth which they chiefly use, costs from 50 cents to $1 75 per square yard in England. All this class of foreign woollens will be immediately excluded. As soon as the law shall begin to operate, they will be subjected to a duty of $1 12 per square yard. This prohibition will annually become more extensive, because the second year the duty will be increased to $1 26, and the third year to $1 40 the square yard. When it shall attain its maximum, no cloth can be imported which will cost abroad between 50 cents and $2 25 the square yard. I will not turn to the testimony for the purpose of proving; because it is within the recollection of all, that these are the cloths which are worn by the mass of our fellow-citizens; they are the cloths exclusively worn by the poor. Are the committee prepared, at once, to prohibit all this class of woollens? Although I am willing to go to a reasonable extent in protection, yet I never shall consent, at one deadly blow, to impose such an immense tax upon my constituents, for the benefit of the woollen manufacturers, as this amendment contemplates. It is true, our country is capable of producing wool in abundance, and we may soon erect factories in a sufficient number to supply the domestic demand, and thus reduce the price; but, in the mean time, the people would be compelled to pay extravagant prices for articles of the first necessity.

I have another remark to make on the amendment now before us. The gentleman from Vermont has dissolved the friendly union which the Harrisburg Convention had established between the wool grower and the woollen manufacturer. Whilst he has now proposed to give the wool grower an additional protection of only 20 per cent. ad valorem, upon the importation of foreign wool, he has been urging the committee to sustain the recommendation of that Convention in regard to woollens. He is willing to adopt their opinion in its utmost extent, in favor of the manufacturer, whilst he has abandoned it in regard to the wool grower. Some of the wool growers have shown so much good nature throughout this transaction, that I should not be astonished to hear from them that an additional ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. will afford them more protection than the duty proposed by that convention. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I think the additional protection now proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, sufficient for the wool grower; although it bears no proportion to his proposition in favor of the manufacturer. It is the purpose of my amendment to reduce the protection which he wishes to extend to the manufacturer, so as to make it bear a just proportion to that which he has proposed in favor of the wool grower.

I shall now undertake to prove, that the minimums, which the amendment proposes, will be premiums for the perpetration of fraud and of perjury. Let us take a single example for the purpose of illustration. The importer of a square yard of cloth costing fifty cents, will pay a duty upon it of 28 cents; but should it cost fifty-one cents instead of fifty, the duty would be $1 40. The same absurdity will be presented at and near each of the minimum points. What an inducement, then, does this amendment present for the commission of fraud? If the importer can, by any means, introduce foreign woollens into this country—which cost more than fifty cents abroad—at that price, or under it, he will save $1 12 per yard in the duty. This will be a direct premium of $1 12 on each yard for the commission of fraud and of perjury. It presents the strongest temptation to the importer and the foreign manufacturer to enter into a collusion for the purpose of deceiving the custom-house officers with false invoices. If successful, upon a single heavy importation, they would divide an immense spoil. We complain at present of fraudulent invoices, below the real price of the article, for the purpose of escaping a portion of the ad valorem duty. If such practices now prevail, of which, however, I have heard no satisfactory evidence, who can foresee the frauds and the perjuries which the system of minimums recommended by the Harrisburg Convention will call into existence?

It has been said that they (minimums on woollens) are sanctioned by the example of the cotton minimum of 80 cents per square yard. This I deny. There is a striking difference between a single minimum, such as exists, in relation to cotton goods, and a graduated scale of minimums rising the one above the other, such as is now proposed in regard to woollens. Where there is but one minimum there can be no temptation to commit fraud. If the costs be below that minimum, you pay the minimum duty; if above it, you pay a duty ad valorem. Under the operation of the proposed system we have seen that, if you get one cent above the first minimum, it makes a difference of $1 12 in the duty. But if the cost rises above the single cotton minimum, the article pays only an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. There is another strong objection to this system. We are the representatives of the people; and in passing laws for their Government, we should make them so plain that the wayfaring man in the wilderness could understand their provisions. We have no right to render them unintelligible. I ask, then, how can it be expected that our constituents will understand the effect of these minimums, when we have differed so much among ourselves as to their operation?

Mounted Volunteers.

If the measure proposed by the Harrisburg Convention should be adopted, there is great danger that it may give birth to a system of smuggling which would deprive the manufacturer of all the encouragement which we intended to give. Under that proposition the one-half of all the woollen goods imported into the country would pay a duty of more than 100 per cent. What a temptation would this present! Considering the vast extent of our coast, the people of the United States would be more than men, if some of them should not attempt to reap the golden harvest which smuggling would present. It would be a miracle if all should be so pure, that none would yield to the temptation. If you once corrupt the morals of the people in this respect, it will be like the letting out of waters. It will at last overwhelm all the protection which your laws intended to afford to domestic manufactures.

If you wish to adopt a prohibitory system you have not selected the proper course. You should follow the example of Napoleon. You should pass a direct prohibition, and confiscate and burn all foreign woollens which you can find in the country. This is the only mode by which you can carry prohibitory laws into effect. As long as you permit goods to enter the country at all, the higher your duties, the greater the temptation to evade them. Let us, then, tread in the plain path of our predecessors. The duty is now 83½ per cent. ad valorem. Let us raise it so much as to afford a fair protection to the woollen manufacturers. The people will then understand what we are doing. This has ever been my opinion. I was prepared to say much more, but shall refrain. I have performed a duty which I owed both to my constituents and myself in moving to strike out these minimums. I will not say that I shall vote in favor of no bill which shall contain minimums; but if I should, I shall do it with reluctance. I have examined the bill reported by the committee with the utmost care; I have taken the half-way points between the minimums, and have considered the effect of the bill, both below and above them; and I have arrived at the conclusion, that the bill, if it could be fairly executed, would afford more protection than an additional duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem; although at the minimum points the increase of ad valorem duty is but small. I shall not trespass further upon the patience of the committee.

After a short answer from Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, and rejected without a count.

Mr. MILLER then moved the following amendment:

Strike out the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs, of the amendment, and insert—

"First. On wool manufactured, forty per cent. ad valorem. And all wool imported on the skin shall be estimated as to weight and value, and shall pay the same rate of duty as other wool.

"Second. On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, (except worsted stuff goods, blankets, bombazines, hosiery, mitts, gloves, caps, and bindings,) forty per cent. ad valorem."

The question was taken without argument, and the amendment was rejected by a large majority.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. MALLABY, and that, also, was decided in the negative—ayes 97, noes 98.

TUESDAY, April 1.

Mounted Volunteers for the Indians.

Mr. DUNOAN submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of attaching to the army of the United States, eight companies of mounted volunteer gun-men, to be stationed on the western frontier of the United States, and of disbanding, from the present peace establishment, one regiment of infantry.

The resolution was negatived; but, afterwards, on motion of Mr. GILMER, the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. DUNOAN said he considered the change in the army which was contemplated by the resolution he had submitted, was one of very great importance, and especially so to the settlers on the western frontier of the United States, who had so often suffered for want of a more efficient protection from the armies of the United States. He said it was a fact well known, that the Indians do not dread an army of foot soldiers, or any number of troops stationed in the forts on the line: that small parties of Indians were frequently known to pass by those forts with impunity, and commit the most shocking outrages upon the defenceless citizens, and make their escape unhurt.

He said he was aware that the House would receive, with reluctance, any proposition to make a material change in an important branch of the Government, without the most conclusive proof of the necessity or propriety of such a change, in consequence of which, he had written to General Gaines and Governor Cass upon the subject, knowing them both to be intimately acquainted with every thing which relates to the defence of our western frontier. He said he had received their answers; and moved that the correspondence with them be printed; which was agreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

The late General Brown.

Mr. VANCE moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown. The motion prevailed—yeas 75, noes 60.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, two letters were read at the Clerk's table, one giving a statement of General Brown's pecuniary affairs; the other on the nature of his disease, and its connection with the exposure he had endured in his last campaign.

Mr. VANCE then made a few observations in support of the bill. He stated that the main question for the consideration of the committee, was, "Is the family of the late Major Gen. Brown in want of the ordinary means of support? and if so, is it innovating too much on the practice of the House to grant those means of support?" Would such an appropriation be sustained by the previous legislation of Congress?

He had entered into an examination of the laws of Congress, and had found that such had been the practice from the very commencement of the Government. Even the very next year after the adoption of the constitution, laws, not indeed precisely similar to this, but more favorable to the widow, had been enacted. He referred the committee to page 184 of the 2d volume of the Laws of the United States, for the act, approved in August, 1790, by which Lady Stirling, the widow of a Major General, received seven years half pay. By the same act, the daughter of Lieut. Colonel Laurens received the same grant of seven years half pay of a Lieutenant Colonel. There had also been passed another act, which he would read. It was "an Act authorizing the payment of $4,000 for the use of the daughters of the late Count De Grasse." This was an appropriation of $1,000 to each of the daughters of the Count. This act was continued, in 1798, giving an addition. It was clear, therefore, that this bill established no new principle.

He hoped that, without going into any discussion, the committee would rise and report the bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he rose to perform an important task, in expressing his opinion that the House could not, consistently with its practice, pass this bill. It was not sustained by any former precedent. General Brown was a distinguished soldier, and his death was truly lamented. He had been reduced in his circumstances by a depreciation of his property, in consequence of the fluctuations of commerce, and had died indebted, and in a state of poverty. But this bill is not for a pension. It is a bill for a gratuity; and if it be granted, it would be impossible for the House to refuse the same to every soldier who might die under similar circumstances. If any soldier should hereafter die in similar distress and with similar claims, how could Congress say they would not grant it?

Mr. VANCE wished to state an additional fact. It had been the custom to pay gratuities and pensions to the widows and orphans of soldiers; and there was not a member on the floor who would say that any officer or soldier having performed the services of General Brown, who should apply for a gratuity, should not obtain it. If he was poor and destitute, he, for one, would say that he should obtain it; and there was no law which was more approved throughout the country, than that which gave five years pay to the widows of the soldiers who fell in the war. He would refer to a particular case—that of Col. Harding, who was, he believed, a relative of the gentleman from Kentucky, who was killed in 1797, on the banks of the Miami; and whose widows and children received a pension of 450 dollars for seven years. This was not all. The Congress of the United States, in 1798, when a non-contractor, while pushing on supplies to Major General Wayne, was killed, provided for his widow. The practice, therefore, was shown in almost every page of the statute book. He reminded the committee that this was a mere gratuity, and of that kind which the country would sustain in reference to a man who had sacrificed his life for the public defence. He would not take it upon himself to say that General Brown was superior to any other officer in the country; but he would say this, that he had performed services equal to any other. It was not only at Chippewa, Bridgewater, and Fort Erie, that he had distinguished himself: but in sustaining his perishing army at French Mills, where hundreds were frozen to death, when he kept down the rising mutiny, as much among the officers as the men, and when subalterns rose at once to the rank of majors, that he had laid his strongest claim to the gratitude of his country.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he found himself obliged to say a few words, as a peculiar reference had been made to him, and to the gratuity granted to the family of Col. Harding. That officer did not die in a time of peace, while in the possession of a handsome salary; but was sacrificed, in a savage country, while carrying into execution what was rumored to be the mad orders of his commander.

Being thus destroyed while in the execution of the orders of the Government, the Government did grant a gratuity to his orphans until they should be able to take care of themselves. This was a very different case. If the present application were for a pension, in consequence of wounds received in service, it would stand on a different principle. But it was not so. The principle on which the other cases had been granted, arose out of the pension law. Wherever a gratuity had been made, it was either because of services which had not been compensated, or sacrifices of life while on public duty.

[SEN., 1828.]

Mr. McDUFFIE said it was true, and he was glad it was so, that this unfortunate lady had not presented any memorial. It was a case in which he hoped to have seen a voluntary manifestation of the liberality belonging to the nation. He was sorry that the gentleman from Maryland should even have supposed that a memorial was presented. Who would have been the memorialist? A lady, a female, with all the delicate feelings belonging to her sex; one who would rather perish than come here to ask your charity. Shall we be told, when millions are about to be voted into the pockets of wealthy capitalists, because they have approached us with memorials, that this female is to have her claim rejected, because she has sent no memorial? He would tell the gentleman that he would never sustain a claim supported by a memorial, which he could not vote for, if it came here without a memorial. The argument is in favor of the claim. On what is this claim founded? General Brown contracted a disease in the public service which terminated in his death. The document which had been read shows that his disease was a paralysis which destroyed his faculties, and which was caused by the wounds he received in war. It also appears that he was in affluent circumstances, previous to his entering the service, but that he had subsequently become involved, and had now left his family destitute. The fact now is, and it was derived from the best authority, that Mrs. Brown is left with a family of small children, destitute of the means of education, or even of present support. Had General Brown been laid on the bed of sickness for twelve months, we should have paid him his salary and allowances. As he died, his salary ought to be given to his family. The usual practice in the departments, is to give to the family a quarter's salary. This bill only extends the principle a little further. As to precedent, he would only say, if the claim could not be supported on its own merits, without the aid of precedent, he would not vote for it merely because precedents could be quoted to support it; but, resting on a sufficient basis of merit, he would vote for it if a thousand precedents could be produced against it.

Mr. CULPEPER said he coincided with the gentleman who had last spoken in the propriety of the claim, and on that ground he should vote for it. He had always been independent enough to disregard precedents in his course, and he should continue to do so.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he should vote for the bill as a matter of duty. It had given him great pleasure to perceive that the principle on which the bill was founded was not contested, and that it was thus admitted to be proper to recompense not only those who serve, but those who depend upon them; that Congress may smooth the pillow of the dying patriot, as well as the glorious bed of the expiring soldier. This had not been contested. The gentleman from Kentucky had said it was proper to reward the families of those who died in service. Does the circumstance of dying in service render a man more deserving? We reward him because of the services he renders, and not because he dies; it is not his death, but his services that we recompense. The same gentleman had warned the committee to look at all the consequences of the measure. If you give in this case, he had asked if we could refuse to others? Yes, we may properly, justly refuse, if the merits of the case are not sufficient. We are never bound by precedent to do wrong. The principle is to reward the faithful services of an officer whose family is destitute. This can be no precedent for other cases, unless they are precisely similar. When any such shall come before us, he would say, with all his heart, that we ought to be bound to act in a similar manner. Show him a man whose services are equal to those of General Brown, the wants of whose family are as great, and he should not consider it a profuse act to put his hand in the treasury to save his family from the miseries of want. This was the reason which would govern his vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. GILMER stated that an important principle was involved in this bill. He contended that the House had no power to do acts of partial legislation. If it was right that this reward should be given at all, it ought to be done by the passage of a general law providing that all the widows of those who die in similar situations should be entitled to the same privileges. In this country we know no distinctions. If Mrs. Brown be entitled to this provision, the widow of every patriotic officer who dies poor is entitled. Mrs. Brown is not known to the law. Before this claim came here, was there any gentleman disposed to present a proposition to give a similar gratuity to all the widows of officers who should be left in want? If the principle had been a correct one, this would have been done. It is not correct, because it is brought up only in an individual case. We have no special privileges here. The gentleman from Louisiana says the true principle is to reward patriotism. If an officer goes into the service, he receives rank and compensation in money. But the reward of patriotism is not money. Its reward is honor, rank, and the glory of the country. Has not General Brown been rewarded? If he had rendered distinguished services, he had received distinguished rewards. He had been placed at the head of the army; he had received as liberal a compensation as the country had the power to give him.

The late General Brown.

It was said that he died in consequence of a paralysis. What reward had he received since he was attacked by that disease? Did the country deprive him of his command in consequence? He did not mean to say that the country would have been justified in doing so; but it was a liberal extension of reward. There was no patriotism in remaining in the army. No one would have been considered unpatriotic in leaving it. We have no testimony that he sacrificed a dollar in the public service. If it could be shown that he had done so, a liberal and grateful country would always give a recompense.

Let the gentlemen who advocate this bill draft a law, having a retrospect and prospective effect; and see if Congress will pass it. He did not doubt that the family of General Brown deserved our sympathy. But he was averse to making money the reward of patriotism. Mrs. Brown felt the dignity of her own situation. She would not now exchange it for any other; and in that feeling she finds her best reward. He contended that we have no right to legislate for individuals. To grant this appropriation would not add to the strength of our military power; if it would, the principle should be made general, and passed in that form.

Mr. LITTLE said that if he viewed this measure in the same light as the gentleman from Georgia did, he should vote against the bill. But he found a precedent for the principle in the law giving five years' pension to the widows of those who fell in the war. They have received that pension. The disease of which General Brown died, was contracted in the army, while in the line of duty. If gentlemen would take the trouble to examine, they would find many provided for, whose husbands died in consequence of disease contracted in service. It is true they have memorialized Congress. Liberality has been meted out to them in many instances. The loss of General Brown has placed his widow in a situation of great distress. He did not say it to excite sympathy, but to state the fact, that Mrs. Brown had been left in such indigent circumstances, that, to use a military term, her children are billeted out among her friends.

Mr. LIVINGSTON wished to make a remark or two in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, who had put the question—"Is patriotism to be rewarded by gold?" He would say, no. He knew of a higher reward, as well as the gentleman from Georgia did. Those who devote their lives to their country, are not actuated by such paltry motives. But that consideration ought not to prevent us from doing our duty. When our patriotic citizens have yielded their lives, are we to say we have given them a sufficient reward in the glory which they have achieved? Is this to be the reward?—the only reward? Yes, said the gentleman from Georgia—that is their reward. If the power of giving rewards of a different kind be the only badge of tyranny, it is so bright a badge that it may almost reconcile republics to it. Does it oppress any? Certainly not the objects which it relieves. Where is the citizen who has ever cast censure on Congress for acts of beneficence like this, or who ever blames such acts? The gentleman from Georgia said the principle was only correct as a general one, if it was right at all; but that it was not right as regards individuals. Why this distinction? If we have the power to make a law for all, have we not the smaller power to make a law to recompense an individual? If we have the general right, we have surely the smaller right of selection. Our whole course of legislation has been selecting individuals. We have now a hundred bills on our table for the relief of individuals, and we are daily adding to them. Yet according to the gentleman from Georgia, we should only give general relief. He concluded with suggesting that we should act upon the cases which came before us, seize the present moment, and not leave the poor widow to starve on the glory which her husband had acquired.

Mr. S. WRIGHT wished to state one or two facts. Not only was General Brown a native of his State, but of the very district which he represented: and he could not sit silently on this occasion. When the last war commenced, General Brown was a peaceful farmer, living on his farm, independent of creditor, of poverty and of distress, with his family about him. As the war advanced, the country in which he resided became a military post, and his neighborhood was attacked by the enemy. He was then under the State authority, a brigadier general of militia. He called his brigade to the point of attack. Of his actions there he would say no more than that the enemy disappeared, and the post was saved. If that was patriotism it was not for him to say. He left it for those of greater experience to determine. This act drew upon him the attention of the Government. He disregarded his own comfort and the welfare of his family, and accepted the post offered to him. The facts which afterwards occurred are too deep in the recollection of the country to require to be repeated. What followed? In the reduction of the army, General Brown was appointed commander. His duty required him to remove with his family to this city. He knew him well when he removed. He sickened and died, whether in consequence of his wounds he considered immaterial. If he had done ill, he had gone to render his account; if he had done well, he seeks not of this committee his reward. It is his needy, impoverished family who come to us. Are they asking affluence of us? No, only the remainder of the salary of the husband and father for a single year. The simple question is, shall this family, stepping from the highest circle of military rank, go begging through the country to the spot were they have friends! It was not a question which he would consent to debate—it was one for feeling only.

The late General Brown.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose to offer a few words in reply to the gentleman from Georgia. That gentleman seemed to suppose that we have no power to legislate for particular cases, although we have the power to legislate generally. He would like to know on what principle the gentleman could make up his mind to vote for a hundred cases, and not for one? He presumed the gentleman from Georgia meant that Congress had no power to give a gratuity—but only to recompense services. The pension law in 1818 gave away 40 millions: and by it every poor soldier who stands in the situation of this lady receives eight dollars a month. What power had Congress to grant this? Did we stipulate by contract, to do this—to give this gratuity? There is no principle which will sustain the pension law, that will not also sustain this. Why has Congress given a pension of five years' pay to the widows of those who fell in service? There is no law binding on Congress to do this; there is none required, but the law of the human heart, to which when we are here insensible, we shall be unworthy of public trust. If General Brown had died in war, his widow would have been entitled to the pension of five years' pay. The gentleman from Maryland was mistaken in supposing that any distinctions exist which are injurious to the soldier. Dying in time of peace cannot affect the justice of the claim. In reference to some other remarks which had been made, that gentlemen would give their own, but not the public money, he considered this idea founded on a mistake as to the relation in which the representative stood to the constituent. He asked how it would read in history. Gen. Brown, the immortal hero of Chippewa, one of the most glorious battles ever fought in the open field, contracted a disease, he became embarrassed, sickened, and died. He left a family in want. A proposition was made in this republican Congress, to grant them the residue of the year's salary for their relief. This republican Congress, illustrating the sneers of tyrants, that republics are always ungrateful, refused the boon, and the widow of this officer went begging through the country to her friends. He asked what his constituents would say to him, if he went home with an excuse that he could not give away their money? We are asked for what is less than one-tenth of a cent for every citizen. As long as he was here he would endeavor to perform his duty according to his views of correct principles. He believed he was right in voting for this bill, and that he had not a constituent who would not deem himself disgraced, did he vote against it.

Mr. GILMER made a reply—the commencement of which our reporter did not hear. He stated that the pension law was not analogous in its principle. The soldiers provided for by that law had not been paid for their services.

They were militia. The militia who fought under Marion, in South Carolina, were not paid. The principle therefore in which this law was founded, was not the same as was laid down by the gentleman from South Carolina. The Government was under an obligation to place the militia on the footing of the regular army.

If this bill was to pass, those who die in civil offices, in a state of poverty, will be entitled to the same consideration for their families. He denied the power of the Government to reward the motive of action. A different reward awaits it. He stated that the trite axiom relative to the ingratitude of republics, had driven us into the most wanton extravagance. If any of the officers of the Government were not sufficiently paid, he was willing to increase their salaries; but he would not make particular exceptions, nor squander money on peculiar cases. According to his view of the constitution, no money could be appropriated but within the specific meaning of that instrument. He repeated the arguments he had before used; denying the power of the Government to adopt a principle of this kind, unless it could be shown to strengthen the military power of the country, and if it could, that the principle ought to be embodied in a general law.

Mr. FLOYD said he was in hopes that the vote would have been taken on this bill without debate. But, as a different course had been pursued, he felt himself called upon to make a few observations in justification of the vote he was about to give. He then proceeded to make some remarks on what had fallen from gentlemen who had preceded him, in the course of which he was corrected by the gentleman from Louisiana, whose observations he had misunderstood. He said, if gentlemen who intend to vote for the bill could reconcile it to their constructions of constitutional law, it lay between them and their constituents. The gentleman from South Carolina had estimated the tax on his constituents at one-tenth of a cent; but if it were less than that, he would give what he had no right to give under the constitutional law. It was made an argument in favor of the bill, that we should not give tyrants an occasion to taunt republics with ingratitude. What would history say of us, if for fear of tyrants, we consent to tear out this leaf of our constitution?

When you come to vote money for those who are disabled in war, it is a part of our contract with them. Is this a parallel case? When swords and medals, and votes of thanks are given, are these no reward? What higher reward can be given to human beings than the thanks of a nation? Would the paltry pension given to an English nobleman compare with it? Are not the laurels of the Duke of Wellington tarnished by his becoming a pensioner?

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, said, that his friend from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) had remarked, that General Brown had reaped a golden harvest of honor by the vote of thanks from Congress, and a vote of a sword and medal, as a reward for the services he had rendered his country. Sir, said Mr. C., they are immortal honors, and such as I would give my life to be worthy of. But those votes show that the services of General Brown merit reward, and call upon that country, in whose service his life was sacrificed, to render some relief to his widow and his little children. Sir, they are penniless; the evidence is before us of that fact. And are we to be told, that a vote of thanks from this House is all the reward that is due to the merits of General Brown? Can his children, sir, be raised and educated upon a vote of thanks from this House? Can they eat the sword and medal awarded by this Government to their father, for the services rendered, and for the sacrifices which he made in its defence? Or shall we, by refusing this relief, compel his widow to sell that sword and that medal which the gallant conduct of her husband won in the field of battle? Shall we compel her to part with those precious relics, endeared by every recollection of her husband, for the support of his children, whom he had left to the protection of his God and of his country? Sir, (said Mr. C. resuming his seat,) my feelings will not permit me to express more.

On the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, the ayes and noes were ordered, and were—yeas 88, nays 77.

WEDNESDAY, April 2.

Family of General Brown.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Mrs. Brown, was read a third time.

MESSRS. CHILTON and OROCKETT (who had been absent from the House during the discussion yesterday) delivered their sentiments in opposition to the principle of the bill. The latter offering to subscribe his quota, in his private character, to make up the sum proposed, and the former demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, then rose and said that, having been absent from the House yesterday, when the discussion was held, and the vote taken on this bill, he felt grateful to the gentleman for his call for the ayes and noes, as it gave him the power and pleasure too, of recording his name in the affirmative. What, sir, (asked Mr. C.) are we called upon to do? To award a small pittance to the disconsolate widow of one of the gallant defenders of your country, one who perilled health and life in that service, and who in that service, contracted a disease which has hurried him to the tomb, and deprived that widow and his children of their kind and natural protector.

The first inquiry is, have we the power to pass the bill? The constitution gives us every necessary power to raise and support armies, and to provide for the common defence. Under this grant, and for the purpose of effectually attaining its objects, you hold out to your citizens pecuniary and other bounties, to influence them to enlist into your military service. For the purpose of enforcing discipline, you make your soldiers the subject of penal infliction, and for the purpose of exciting their ambition and stimulating their ardor, you hold out to them the prospect of pecuniary bounty. Your whole pension system, by which you provide for your officers and soldiers, has for its object a remuneration for the toils and privations of a military life; it holds out a powerful stimulus to the achievement of deeds of daring and of glory. Laws have been enacted, not only allowing pensions to officers and soldiers for wounds and disabilities received in the service, but these humane provisions have been extended to the widows and children of such officers and soldiers. By the act of 16th March, 1802, the widows and children of our officers dying by reason of any wound received in the service, are entitled to half pay for five years. The like provision was made by the act of 1812, for the widows of officers and soldiers who fell in the Wabash campaign. The act of January, 1818, made the same allowance to the widows and children of officers of the navy and marines. By subsequent acts, the "widows and orphans of officers, seamen, and marines, who have died by casualty or disease, in the line of their duty, have been provided for, and half pay allowed them for fifteen years." The act of the 4th of March, 1814, made a like provision for the widows of officers in the private armed service. By the act of April, 1818, these provisions were extended to the widows of those who have died by "casualty or accidents." On what principle have these provisions been made? Was it on the ground of contract? Was it a part of the bond? No, sir. It was the result of a wise, humane, and enlightened policy, a policy which, in the hour of peril, calls around your standard the chivalrous and the brave. Had General Brown sealed his devotion to his country's service, by an immediate sacrifice of his life on the "battlefield," his widow, on the principles of former legislation, would have been entitled to half pay for 5 years. Then what matters it whether he thus died, or lingered for years, from wounds and disease incurred in your service. From such wounds and disease he has endured years of suffering and pain. He has fallen a victim to the pressure. The fact is established, that the primary cause of his death was to be found in the sickness of the camp. But for this he would have been at this time at the head of your army. But for this he would now have been in the enjoyment of life and health, with the prospect of future usefulness to his family and country. And shall we now say, by our votes, that this family has no claim on the gratitude or the justice of the republic? Shall we close our doors against the widow of this gallant veteran, who had so often bared his bosom to the foe? Sir, I had indulged the hope that this bill would have passed in silence—a silence suited to the occasion—a silence indicative of a nation's gratitude, and a nation's tears. I had hoped that this vote would have been characterized by a unanimity which would have whispered joy and consolation to the widowed heart; which would have administered the "oil and wine" to her wounded spirit; which would have been not only the messenger of mercy, but the expression of a nation's homage to the exalted services and merits of the deceased. Sir, the passing of this bill will be hailed by the American people with acclamation. A brave and generous nation will stamp upon it the seal of its approbation, and feel a high and noble pride, that their representatives have executed a sacred trust.

Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, it is said, that "glory is the soldier's pay." I trust that glory is the chief object which the American soldier has in view, and which spurs him on to the performance of heroic actions. For this, sir, he seeks reputation in the "cannon's mouth;" for this he courts death in the "imminent deadly breach." But add to this, the assurance that a grateful country will adopt his wife and children, as the objects of its care, and you give to his ardor a double force. What can more effectually nerve the arm of the soldier, than a belief that in the event of his fall, he leaves those who are dear to his heart, the wife and children of his bosom, to the protecting guardianship of his country? With this conviction he rushes to the combat, mingles in the deadly strife, and expiring amidst the shouts of victory, he bequeathes all he has to bequeath, his honor, his glory, to immortality—his wife and children to his country. And will that country decline the bequest? No. She will press them to her bosom, as the cherished objects of her kindest regard, and cheer the desolation of widowhood and orphanage, with her smiles and her protection. Sir, some gentlemen have a fastidiousness on this subject, which I cannot appreciate. They were not sent here to vote away the people's money in this way. They are willing to be generous and charitable as individuals, but as legislators they can indulge in no such feelings. I was sent here to vote away the people's money, when that vote shall be sanctioned by a sense of duty, and warranted by the constitution; and whatever may be my sentiments in regard to private charity—I will not deprive my constituents of the proud satisfaction which I know they feel, in sharing the honor of the appropriation. I have no fear that my vote will not be hailed by their approving voice. Indeed, sir, I should be ashamed to look them in the face, with my name in the negative. Rather might my arm fall "palsied from its sockets," than be raised in opposition to this bill.

The war of 1812 found Gen. Brown happy in the bosom of his family, surrounded by competence, and in the enjoyments of the ease and comforts of domestic life. At the call of his country, he left the plough, and relinquished all the pleasures of peaceful retirement, for the hardships and perils of the "tented field." His private concerns were then necessarily neglected, and the peace found him extremely embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances, with feeble health, with a constitution naturally robust, shattered in the service. With ruined fortune, he dragged out a tiresome existence, till death relieved him. He has been removed from us, and he has left to his family nothing but the recollection of his virtues and his fame. That fame has become the common property of his country. His deeds constitute a brilliant portion of its history, and as long as the cataract of Niagara shall roll its torrent near the scenes of his glory, so long shall his deeds live fresh in the recollections of his countrymen. Now, sir, can we hesitate a moment to pass this bill? Shall we disappoint the just expectations of our constituents, in refusing to do an act sanctioned by justice, gratitude, and magnanimity? Will you spurn from your door the widow and orphans of one of your bravest Generals, and cast them on the charities of an unfeeling world? Will you send her back poor and penniless to a desolate mansion? Sir, no hospitable mansion opens its doors to receive her. She returns to the scenes of her past happiness, dependent on the kindness of friends. Let us cheer her on the way; let us restore her to her home, with a heart fraught with emotions of gratitude and joy. Then will she pass the remainder of her days in quiet, and employ your bounty in rearing to manhood the future Browns of the country.

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and decided by yeas 97, nays 74.

So the bill was passed and returned to the Senate.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. BRYAN said: The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has said that hemp and molasses is a miserable theme for eloquence. Sir, I readily admit that it does not appear to be a theme for rhetorical flourishes, and beautiful imagery, nor am I ambitious of investing the subject with artificial dignity or splendid decorations. My object, sir, will be more satisfactorily attained, if I can impress upon the committee "plain matters of fact," and such inferences from them as common sense must make. The honorable gentleman, according to my apprehension of his remarks, has treated the additional tax proposed on molasses as a small business, and seems to wonder that it should produce excitement. Sir, if it be such a small affair, I am sorry indeed that the Committee on Manufactures should have stooped to notice it. I can assure the gentleman that it is a matter of serious importance to my constituents, as well as to the citizens of the Eastern States.

The honorable gentleman from Maine seems to suppose that the State which he represents in part, so ably, is more interested than any other in the Union. I am glad that he thought so, as it inflamed his ardor, and animated his zeal, in a good cause; but I can assure that gentleman that the State of North Carolina has also a most important interest at stake, and I am happy to have his able assistance, or rather to co-operate with him, in defending the interests dependent upon the West India trade, however humble they may seem.

The only foreign trade of North Carolina is, and long has been, with the West India islands, while the shallowness of our waters forbid our participation in the European trade. The nature of our productions—our contiguity to those islands—their wants and their produce, early invited an intercourse with them, which has been maintained and persevered in under great discouragements.

Indeed, this intercourse being founded upon the only true basis of all commerce, mutual wants and mutual demands, has been sustained as it were by the efforts of nature herself. North Carolina produces, in great abundance, the materials for such an assorted cargo as is most desired in those islands. We can export, in almost any quantity, lumber of all kinds, staves, shingles, pork, bacon, corn, peas, beans, naval stores, fish and live stock. The principal trade, however, sir, is I believe, in the various kinds of pitch pine, lumber, staves, and shingles. We receive in return, from various islands, molasses, sugar, coffee, rum, salt, and to a much greater amount than is required for the consumption of our own citizens. Many of our merchants make extensive shipments of lumber, &c., and order the return cargoes to New York, or other northern ports, to pay for goods bought of the merchants of those cities; and this is found to be a mutually advantageous mode of making remittances, or, in other words, of paying their debts.

This trade, sir, is also very convenient to Northern ship owners. Numbers of their vessels frequent our ports in the fall of the year, and find employment till the spring in freighting our lumber, &c., to the West Indies, while others carry out cargoes of their own products to the islands, and there barter them for West India produce, which they bring to North Carolina and exchange for lumber, &c., or corn, and thus procure successive cargoes, continually increasing in value, and furnishing alimant to an enterprising traffic.

This trade from North Carolina is, I believe, principally with the French islands. It is essentially a barter trade. We are not allowed to export sugar, coffee, or specie from a French island; molasses is therefore received of necessity as a return cargo. The condition of this trade at present certainly cannot bear an additional burthen; and, Mr. Chairman, I cannot believe that this House would consent to impose the additional burthen contemplated by this bill, with a full understanding of the subject in all its bearings and operations. As the trade is now conducted, it barely sustains itself; its great value consists in the employment which it yields to a numerous class of our citizens—many, especially of the poorer classes, are employed in the various operations of getting lumber and the different kinds of timber for the West India market. The winter season is most advantageously devoted by the farmer to these occupations, and he is thus enabled to procure the groceries for his family which are now deemed the ordinary, if not necessary, comforts of life.

I think I may say, sir, that about seven-eighths of the tonnage of North Carolina is employed in this trade, and about forty vessels from the port of Newbern alone. I suppose, upon an average, about four or five West India voyages may be made in the year.

The House will readily perceive sir, that if this vent for our products is closed, great and general distress must ensue. I have said, sir, that the trade cannot bear this additional burthen. This assertion, sir, I think may be incontrovertibly sustained.

The average sales of lumber, at the French islands, for the last twelve months, may be estimated, I understand, at $82 per thousand, payable in molasses at an average price of 21 cents per gallon. Adding to this the price of the hogshead, $850, and 5 per cent. for difference or loss on gauge, and the present impost of 5 cents per gallon, the cost of the importer is enhanced to 31 or 32 cents per gallon, without any allowance for freight or insurance. The average cargo sales of molasses in the United States for the last twelve months, have not exceeded 27½ cents per gallon, thus showing a loss of 2½ or 3½ cents per gallon.

In the trade with Hayti, the price of lumber does not vary much from the price obtained at the French islands; payments in that island are uniformly made in coffee, on which a loss is sustained of 10 or 12 per cent. In the Dutch, Swedish, and Danish islands, the sales of lumber average about 25 dollars per thousand, but this decrease of price is compensated by lower port charges, and better payments than in the French islands, sales being usually made for cash, or for colonial produce, at much lower prices than are exacted at the other islands. As gentlemen, in the course of debate upon other sections of this bill, have offered numerous statements and calculations, made by respectable manufacturers, I trust it will be in order for me to offer to the consideration of the committee a statement, exhibiting an invoice of a cargo of lumber, for a vessel of 100 tons, with an account of sales of the same, in a French island, and in a Danish, Dutch, and Swedish island, which has been furnished me by a ship owner, for whose integrity and intelligence I can vouch to the committee.

[Here follows the invoice, the results of which are stated in the speech.]

The result of the voyage yields a freight of seven or eight hundred dollars on sixty-one thousand feet of lumber, that is 12 or 18 dollars per thousand, or if reduced to barrels, of 75 or 80 cents per barrel; which will but little more than defray the expenses of the voyage, and must convince any one acquainted with shipping business, that the additional burthen proposed must crush this trade. Sir, in estimating the profits of commercial operations conducted from the ports of North Carolina, the heavy burdens which nature has already imposed upon us by the shallowness of our waters, especially the consuming expenses of lighterage and detention at the shoal called the Swash in Pamlico Sound, to which all the navigation of the State which seeks the ocean by Ocracock Inlet (comprehending about three-fourths of the whole) is subjected, should never for a moment be out of view.

As a clear and forcible illustration of this deplorable state of our commerce, I beg leave to read an extract from the memorial of a convention of highly respectable and well-informed delegates from the ports dependent on Ocracock Inlet, assembled to devise some means of removing these evils, or mitigating their almost intolerable severity:

"Your memorialists believe that the annual exports of the products of our country through Ocracock are not overrated when estimated at five millions of dollars, requiring for their transportation, and actually employing two hundred thousand tons of shipping.

"They find, from calculations carefully made and compared, that the charge on these vessels for lighterage and detention at the Swash, averages one dollar per ton, and amounts, annually, to two hundred thousand dollars; that the additional rate of insurance, because of the risk and detention at the Swash, averages three-quarters of one per cent., and amounts, on the exports and imports, to seventy-five thousand dollars, and on the vessels, to sixty thousand dollars per annum. This annual tax of three hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars upon the navigation of our section of the country, independently of the minor evils, the vexations and difficulties which will be readily perceived, cannot but enhance the freight or cost of conveyance to market. The price of freight from Norfolk, and Wilmington, (North Carolina,) the latter but 120 miles distant from Ocracock to the West Indies, is from 20 to 25 per cent. less than from the ports dependent on Ocracock Point; which difference on bulky articles, such as lumber, staves, and shingles, amounts to between 30 and 40 per cent. of their original value. The freight and charges on articles shipped coastwise for reshipment to their places of consumption, amounts, on naval stores, to 25 per cent., on cotton, to between 10 and 15 per cent., and on staves, to 50 per cent. of their original value." These charges are all borne by the industry of the country—they are discerned "in the low price of the products of North Carolina industry, in the ports dependent upon Ocracock Inlet, compared with those where the costs of detention and perils of lighterage are not to be encountered. While at Suffolk, in Virginia, pipe staves command forty dollars per thousand, at Murfreesboro, and Winton, (about thirty miles distant,) they are sold at twenty-five dollars. Red-oak staves, which at Washington, North Carolina, Newbern, and Edenton, scarcely command ten dollars per thousand, usually sell at Wilmington for eighteen and twenty dollars."

This shoal was examined by a Board of the United States Engineers, under an act of Congress passed about two years ago. They state in their report, that "the present state of the navigation at Ocracock is deplorable in the extreme." It must be obvious to the committee from these facts, that the imposition of this additional duty will operate as a complete interdict to our West India trade; and that will be in effect to our whole foreign trade. The constitution prohibits a tax upon exports; here will be such a tax upon their substitutes or representatives, that is, the commodities for which they are exchanged, as effectually to prohibit their exportation. We might, with great justice, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, before this additional burthen is imposed upon us, call upon Congress to place us upon an equal footing with the other States engaged in this trade, by removing the obstructions to our commerce, that we might be equally qualified to bear it, otherwise the greatest injury must result to us from the peculiarly oppressive operation of the tax upon us. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the brief review which I have made of the navigation and commerce of North Carolina will acquit me of being a trespasser upon the time and patience of the House. As I have the floor, sir, I will invite the attention of the House, for a few moments, to the commerce of the United States, generally, with these islands.

From the official statements which have been made to this House from the Treasury Department, it appears that our exports to the West Indies for several years have averaged about sixteen millions of dollars, and that our imports have been about the same in amount. Our exports to the island of Cuba alone, for the year 1826, exceeded six millions of dollars, and our imports amounted to nearly eight millions. The closing of the ports of the British islands against us, does not seem to have materially affected the amount of our exports and imports. The enormous port charges in the English islands, and their rigid inspection, frequently rendered a voyage ruinous to the adventurer. I have been credibly informed, that at Jamaica, upon a vessel of 125 tons, carrying about 90,000 staves, the port charges, duties, commissions, inspections, &c., amounted to considerably more than the first cost of the cargo, (upwards of $1,000.) There being no market to the leeward of this island, and it being impossible to get to one to windward, the shipper was obliged to sell for whatever price the British merchant chose to offer; and, too frequently, this price was rather adapted to the necessity of the shipper, than the value of his cargo; there was but one party to this bargain. Now the British merchant is compelled to meet the American shipper on neutral ground with his colonial produce, and it requires both parties to make a bargain. I question, sir, whether the colonists are not convinced by this time, that the mother country has sacrificed their interests to State policy, and is desirous of building up the Canadas, and her other American provinces, at their expense. The value of the imports into the United States during the year 1826, from the Danish West India islands, was nearly equal to that from the British West Indies, as the Treasury document referred to will show. The import of molasses for 1826, from the West Indies, amounted to 18,651,155 gallons, of which only 1,783,988 gallons were from British islands. This importation, estimated at the cargo price of 27½ cents per gallon, amounts to nearly four millions of dollars. From this brief general view of the West India trade, it certainly, Mr. Chairman, is sufficiently important to demand the deliberate consideration of the House, before they adopt a measure which must so seriously affect it—which must destroy it in some sections of the Union. And why, Mr. Chairman, shall this flourishing trade—a trade, sir, which, I repeat, is so natural, so convenient, and conducted upon such fair terms of reciprocity, (I exclude the English islands, of course,) why, sir, shall it be so grievously oppressed? it paid into your Treasury, in 1826, more than six and a half millions of dollars in duties; it rears for the defence of our country, a hardy race of seamen; it supports an industrious population on land; it employs many thousand tons of shipping which must otherwise rot at the wharf, to the ruin of the ship-owner. The united exertions of these classes of our citizens convert our dreary forests into articles of comfort and subsistence, and make substantial additions to the wealth of the nation.

The Committee on Manufactures, who recommend this additional duty, state that a large quantity of the molasses imported into the Eastern States is distilled, and that the spirits thus distilled interferes with the domestic spirits distilled from grain. The committee state that "they hazard nothing in the assertion that the coarse grains are now grown in these States in sufficient quantities to furnish them a full supply of ardent spirits, if the demand was in no other manner supplied;" and that the testimony before them, among other things, shows "that the quantity of these grains can be increased, &c., to answer any demand, if demand could be created." They, therefore, recommend an additional duty of five cents on molasses, and of ten cents on all foreign spirits, without regard to quality or proof. They further inform us in another part of the report, that "the whiskey of this country has become very palatable and very fashionable," &c.

It seems then, sir, that we are in the first place to create, by legislation, a demand for whiskey, and by excluding foreign spirits and molasses, to compel its use. I would here pause, and ask this House to reflect upon the character of such a proposition. It seems to me, sir, monstrous both in a political and moral view. The materials and industry of numerous classes of our citizens by the operation of the West India trade, are exchanged for many millions of gallons of molasses, which is largely used as an article of diet, by all classes, and especially by the poor, and is undoubtedly very wholesome and nutritious; besides, it yields a large and increasing revenue to the Government. I would respectfully ask, sir, why the fruits of their industry and capital is less worthy of protection because it appears in the shape of molasses, than if it appeared in the more "fashionable" garb of whiskey; it is also a strong recommendation to molasses, that it can be taxed by an impost duty; whiskey can only be taxed by an excise, and that, it seems, is a hazardous experiment, and not to be resorted to in time of peace. So far, sir, from this Government attempting to create a demand for whiskey, I had hoped that the proposition from the Committee on Commerce to reduce the duties on wines, would have met a favorable reception from the House; it is strongly recommended by its tendency to substitute the use of pure and wholesome liquors for that of noxious ardent spirits, thus promoting eminently the moral and physical health of the nation.

Sir, I do not intend to enter into a formal contestation of the assertion of the committee, that whiskey is very palatable and fashionable, because I know, sir, there is no disputing about tastes; but, on behalf of my constituents, I must protest against such a doctrine going abroad to the world as the sense of this House—my constituents have not yet become so fashionable as to discard Madeira (when they can get it) for whiskey. "Madeira was good enough for them," as was said by one of our worthiest citizens and most respectable merchants.

But, Mr. Chairman, to return to the sober consideration of this matter. The bill is intended, we are told, as a compromise between the two great contending parties—the manufacturers and the growers of wool and grain in the Middle and Northern States—the interests which cannot arrange themselves under the banner of either one or the other, are to be trodden down in their march to what they deem their mutual advantage. I hope, sir, that they may not arrive at a Moscow, where, when they have seized the prize, they will find nought but ruin and desolation. Sir, what possible benefit can the State which I have the honor in part so inadequately to represent, derive from the bill? What compensation for the annihilation of her West India trade? None, sir; burthen is added to burthen. The Northern and Eastern States may derive some compensating benefit from protection and building up of their manufactures, into which their capital must be speedily transferred—they have also left open to them the trade with the British North American provinces, which is now

Tariff Bill.

very considerable. In neither of these can we participate—they operate as additional burthens upon us, because they make us tributary to our Northern and Eastern brethren.

I know, sir, that it has been customary to consider the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as but little interested in commerce; and it is true that we have but little European trade. Yet, sir, upon examination of the Treasury records, it will be found that our aggregate tonnage of every kind is very little inferior to that of Virginia, and is actually greater than that of any State south of us. We have many little ports where vessels are owned, which are employed in the coasting and West India trade; and the amount of our exports appears, from the memorial to which I have referred, to be very considerable.

Is this interest, sir, and the great agricultural interests connected with and dependent upon it, to be sacrificed, to try the experiment of making the American people consume whiskey? I repeat, sir, what has been before urged, that it is with our agricultural products, and the products of the forest, that we buy West India products. This is the natural and most effectual way of encouraging agriculture—commerce here acts as the handmaid and servant of agriculture. The Treasury documents laid upon our tables show that, of the exports to the West Indies in 1826, amounting to $16,766,262, about four-fifths ($13,829,848) were of American produce. Here is a market, then, which receives a greater amount of our grains than all the world besides; and this market is to be destroyed to promote the manufacture of whiskey from rye and other grains. Molasses alone, although deemed a small business, yields a revenue of about $700,000. However great an aversion gentlemen may have to the article, yet the money derived from it, I hope, does not partake of their dislike. I have read, somewhere, that the Emperor Vespasian, on being reproached for deriving revenue from a source really contemptible, commanded some of the money thus derived to be brought to him, and applying it to his nose, told his courtiers that it really did not smell of the article—so I hope, that as the revenue from molasses does not taste of that article, gentlemen will be reconciled, and permit the trade to exist. If the proposition, advocated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, should succeed, and this trade should be destroyed by it, as we believe it will be, will that gentleman promise this House that the whiskey substituted shall pay an equal tax to the nation? Will he promise for his constituents? I presume not, sir. Whiskey does not submit to taxation so meekly as molasses. The gentleman has said that the citizens of Pennsylvania not being so fond of molasses as our Eastern brethren, use brown sugar in its place, and that a gallon of molasses contains as much saccharine or sweetening matter as eight pounds of brown sugar, which pays a duty of 8 cents per pound, amounting to twenty-four cents, and therefore, it would not be unfair that molasses should pay 24 cents, as those who use it derive as much benefit from it as his constituents do from eight pounds of sugar. Sir, this is a strange argument. I always thought that molasses was used as a sweetening not so much from choice as from necessity—not because it was preferred to sugar, but because it was cheaper. If the gentleman's constituents are all so well off as to use sugar, where my constituents, and those of the gentleman from Maine, are compelled to use molasses, it surely is a strong argument against our constituents being taxed for the benefit of those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, there is a view of this case, derived from the history of the Madeira trade,* which gives us the benefit of experience, which, in questions of this kind, is certainly entitled to great consideration. This trade has been operated upon by the tariff system for the benefit of the grain-growing States, and let us attentively examine the results. They are such, sir, as to make the agricultural class deprecate the notion of creating an artificial market for their produce, by destroying a natural one.

By a report of the Committee on Commerce, it appears that with the island of Madeira we once had also a valuable barter trade. We exported flour, Indian corn, peas, beans, pork, lumber, staves, fish, &c.; and, as we are informed by the report of the committee, we have always been permitted to carry these articles there free from duty. The average annual value of our exports to that island, from 1801 to 1807, was about $600,000. The duty on Madeira wine was then from 50 to 58 cts. per gallon. From 1819 to 1825, the duty has averaged 100 cts. per gallon, and our exports have averaged little more than $200,000; at present, I believe, they but little exceed $100,000. If experience of this kind does not convince us of the impolicy and futility of the tariff, or forcing system, in "creating a demand" for agricultural products, I would respectfully ask what can? I would respectfully suggest to the committee, sir, that there seems to me to be great inconsistency as well as impolicy in permitting Great Britain, by closing her West India ports against us and keeping open those of her provinces adjoining us, to become the carriers of our products.

The New Brunswick and Nova Scotia merchants are enabled, under the operation of the present system, to assort their cargoes for the West Indies with our produce, which is a great advantage in that trade, and is precisely the state of things beneficial to them, and detrimental to us. It is for what they have been petitioning the mother country for the last fifteen years. They have now the long voyage to the West Indies, and the Eastern States a miserable little coasting trade with their ports. Their fisheries, I understand, sir, have received a new impulse from this extension of their trade, as they are enabled to ship their fish to the West India islands, advantageously, with an assorted cargo; whereas an entire cargo of fish would rarely be a profitable shipment. By reference to the Treasury documents, it will be perceived that, in 1826, our exports to the British American colonies were in value $2,623,225; and this, sir, I presume, does not include a vast amount that finds its way into the Canadas by interior routes by land and water. The imports upon which alone duties can be levied, amounted only to $677,759; while the whole of our exports to the West Indies are exchanged for articles paying a heavy duty.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to take a summary view of our West India trade; all must agree that it is highly valuable to the nation. I have endeavored to show this House, by a simple statement of facts, the nature of the North Carolina commerce with the West Indies, its operations, and the onerous incumbrances under which it now labors. I felt under a high obligation, sir, to make this endeavor to discharge my duty, not only to my constituents, but to the nation. I will not longer, sir, consume the time of the committee. I know, sir, that the subject has not received such an examination from me as it merited; but I feel a satisfaction in having attempted to perform what I conceived to be my duty to my constituents.

Mr. CARSON rose and said, that he deeply regretted that his honorable colleague and friend (Mr. BRYAN) should have made it necessary for him to trouble the committee with a few remarks in explanation of the vote he should give on the proposed amendment.

His colleague had said by way of argument in favor of the proposed amendment, "that North Carolina would be more injured by an increased duty upon the items now proposed to be stricken out, than by any other items in the bill." If this were true, sir, it would be the imperative duty of every member from that State to vote for the amendment. But my colleague should have confined his remarks to the district which he represents, and permitted those representing other parts of the State, to think and act with respect to the interests of their constituents, as to them might seem most advisable. Sir, I shall decidedly vote against striking out the proposed items, and for reasons which, with me, are equally forcible with those which operate upon my colleague; but I give this vote with a perfect understanding, that upon the final question, I vote against the whole bill, it being immaterial what shape it may be presented in.

But, sir, if we are compelled to swallow this bitter dose, I wish to make it as palatable as possible, and by way of sweetening will vote to retain molasses. And further, sir, in the general dispensation of benefits which is proposed, and held out, by the friends of this bill on the "American System," as it is called, the interests of all parts of the Union, and every class of the community, ought to be looked to, and equal justice done to all. Now, sir, I ask my colleague what other items are there in the bill from which North Carolina can expect any benefits, except those proposed to be stricken out, and perhaps one other, that of iron? My colleague is no doubt correct as regards the seaboard of North Carolina, and the particular section which he represents; but with the western end of North Carolina it is very different; we have none of the advantages of commerce, and consequently none of the benefits resulting from this lumber and molasses trade; but we have in many parts of North Carolina, a climate and soil well adapted to the culture of hemp, and if other articles and branches of industry are to be protected, an adequate protection on hemp would certainly benefit those who might think proper to turn their attention to the growing of that article. [Here Mr. BRYAN explained, and said, his colleague was mistaken as regards hemp; he had not intended making any argument upon that subject: he had intended confining his remarks to the single item of molasses. He begged leave to assure his colleague, that he was opposed in toto to the tariff on principle.]

Mr. C. resumed, and said, he had understood his colleague as having spoken generally in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, which was to strike from the bill both hemp and molasses, and he had thought that hemp was necessarily included. He was gratified, however, to learn, that the argument was intended to be confined to molasses. But my argument, Mr. Chairman, is equally applicable to that article, and equally strong. It is of more importance to the grain growers of North Carolina, (and they form a large majority of the population of the State,) that this item should be retained in the bill, than perhaps any other, and the reasons are briefly these: molasses are imported in vast quantities from the West Indies, and is the material from which is distilled a noxious spirit commonly called in North Carolina "Yankee rum." No one knows better than my colleague, that the whole seaboard of our State is inundated with this poisonous stuff, nor is it confined to the seaboard only, for it is thrown in vast quantities all over the southern country, and has found its way into as many parts as has their wooden clocks, and wooden nutmegs. Now, sir, if this duty is imposed upon molasses, it will have the effect to stop in a degree the distillation of Yankee rum, and in the same ratio that the quantity of rum is diminished, so will the demand for domestic spirits (whiskey, &c.) be increased; and, in this are the only advantages to be calculated

Retrenchment.

on by the farming community of North Carolina. It appears, sir, from calculation, or rather estimates which have been made, that there are about eight millions of gallons of rum annually distilled from imported molasses. Now, sir, if this distillation of foreign material was stopped, there would be an increased demand for the spirits distilled from domestic materials, to a corresponding amount of gallons; and if any benefits are to result from this "American System," (as it has been christened,) I can see none to the grain grower, except those which may result from such an increased duty upon molasses as will prevent the distillation of Yankee rum, thereby affording a most extensive market for whiskey.

My colleague has asked, sir, but asked it rather in a vein of humor, for really I cannot think him serious, "Whether we should sit here legislating for the protection of a noxious liquor, which tends to degradation?" meaning whiskey. Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the candid decision of my colleague, which is the most noxious, poisonous, and degrading in its nature, good rye whiskey or mean Yankee rum? I will not do my colleague the injustice to say, sir, that he is in favor of the protecting or American system; but if he should be, what is there that demands, in a more eminent degree, his protecting care, than the health of his constituents? Nothing, sir. And to that end I call upon him in sober seriousness to banish Yankee rum, and substitute good whiskey.

FRIDAY, April 4.

Retrenchment.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Select Committee on Retrenchment in the expenses of the Government, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the subject of retrenchment be empowered to send for persons and papers, for the purpose of continuing and completing the examination.

Mr. STORRS said, that he was opposed to the resolution just offered by the Chairman of the Select Committee, (Mr. HAMILTON.) He had never been one of those who had denied the constitutional power of the House to authorize a Standing Committee to send for persons and papers. He did not object to it on that ground. It might be not only proper, but sometimes indispensably necessary, to delegate this high power to a committee of this House. Nor was his objection to any want of confidence in the members of the committee. He supposed, as he was bound to do, that our Select, as well as Standing Committees, would always execute the trust reposed in them honestly and fairly. But his objection was to the general, unlimited grant of this power, either to this or to any other committee, or, indeed, to any select body of men. It is a high trust—a great power. It is confided to this House; and as it acts, when exercised, and can act only, upon the personal liberty and private confidence of the citizens, and upon every citizen, from one extreme of the country to the other, he was decidedly against giving it to any body of men, to be exercised at their will, and upon whom they please. He said, his opinion had been, and still was, that this power to send for persons and papers should never be granted, unless the objects of it were specified. The witnesses and documents wanted ought to be named. This can always be done with sufficient certainty. The exercise of this enormous power will thus be limited and safe. It will then be always under the control of the House. If the honorable mover of the resolution will name the witnesses and papers, and state that they are necessary to the proper investigation of the matter in hand, he shall have my support.

Mr. STORRS said, that, generally, he had no objection to vesting the power of sending for persons and papers in a committee of the House, when they asked it, if any good reasons could be offered by them for such a course. But it was a high power, and to be exercised under a sound discretion—not on every trifling occasion, and by no means as a matter of course. He could not consent to vote for it, unless some reasons were offered in favor of it. None had been given, and he asked the chairman of the committee to inform the House for what purpose the committee asked this power—to what subjects it was to be applied—and to show that it was necessary to the discharge of their duties. If the House was satisfied on these points, he thought no one would refuse to grant them the power; but he trusted that they would not vote for it merely because it was asked.

Mr. HAMILTON said, in reply, that the committee had been particularly charged to examine into the number of clerks in the several Departments, and the necessity of retaining them. In the discharge of this duty, the committee were of opinion, that it would be, on all accounts, most proper to go into an oral examination, which could only be done, by requiring the attendance of the clerks. Another object, to which their inquiries were to be directed, was the contingent expenses of the Departments. On this, also, the committee thought it material to require a verbal explanation of the various items, and that the examination should be conducted under oath. If the power requested should be refused by the House, all the time of the committee would be consumed in running backwards and forwards to and from the Departments. They considered it much more expedient to devote such time as could be given to the duties of their appointment, to stated sittings, at which the presence of the clerks, and other persons to be examined, should, from time to time, be required.

The resolution was carried without a count.

TUESDAY, April 8.

Tariff Bill.

The House resumed the consideration of the Tariff Bill.

Mr. MALLARY moved the amendment he had before offered, in Committee of the Whole, with the alteration of inserting the words "carpets, and carpeting," after the word "blankets." Mr. MALLARY supported the amendment at some length.

Mr. KREMER delivered a short speech in opposition to the amendment, but in favor of a moderate system of protection.

Cries for the question were now loud in all parts of the House, when

The amendment of Mr. MALLARY was rejected, by—yeas 80, nays 115.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, now moved to amend the bill; but before any decision was had on his motion,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 15.

The Tariff Bill.

The question recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. GORHAM, to except ravens duck from the operation of the proposed duty on sail duck, it was negatived by—yeas 80, nays 123.

Mr. SPRAGUE moved to strike out the proposed duty of ten cents on molasses, and observed, that he should not enter into any discussion of the subject, especially after the remarks which he had heard yesterday; for, as several gentlemen had said that they would retain this, and other items of the bill, which they considered as noxious in themselves, for the express purpose of destroying the bill, any argument that he might use, for the purpose of showing that the item was a bad one, would only operate with them to prevent its rejection.

Mr. RAMSEY suggested a doubt, whether this clause should be stricken out, the existing duty would not thereby be abolished, also; and so molasses become free of all duty whatever.

Mr. MEROSE should vote to strike out the present duty from the bill. He believed the country was abundantly capable of supplying its own sugar and molasses, but was opposed to interfering, by legislation, to hasten that supply.

Mr. BURGESS warmly supported the motion of Mr. SPRAGUE. He thought the duty calculated to operate as much against the Middle as the Eastern States, and believed that it would injure the sugar-growing parts of the country, by giving a premature excitement to the production of our own molasses. He thought it was a policy of indirection, going to ruin the trade of the Eastern States to fulfil a paltry promise to the manufacturers of whiskey.

Mr. SUTHERLAND replied to Mr. BURGESS, and opposed the motion to strike out. He was in favor of carrying the American System fully out, and let it operate alike on all parts of the country. The Harrisburg Convention themselves had recommended that the distillation of spirits from foreign materials should be discouraged. The southern country could furnish molasses enough for the supply of the whole Union.

Mr. S. read a quotation from the minutes of the Harrisburg Convention.

Mr. MALLARY remarked, that he should have been very happy if the gentleman had shown an equal anxiety to comply with other recommendations of that convention.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to amend the bill in relation to the duty on molasses, by striking out "ten," and inserting "seven and a half cents;" which he did by way of making the clause as perfect as possible, before the motion to strike it out should be entertained.

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed his remarks, referred to the speech of Mr. Clay, in 1824, on the molasses duty, and explained how the item came to be thrown out from the tariff bill of that year. He then adverted to the operation of the present law, and contended that, by mixing four gallons of whiskey with one gallon of molasses, and thus producing five gallons of New England rum, the exporter of that article, paying five cents duty on his molasses, and receiving twenty cents drawback on his rum, made a clear gain of fifteen cents on the five gallons.

Mr. WRIGHT, of N. Y., said he particularly addressed himself to gentlemen situated as he was in relation to this bill. Since the bill had been before the House, the duty upon foreign spirits had been increased from 10 cents per gallon, the increase proposed by the Committee on Manufactures, to 15 cents per gallon, in addition to the present duty. He asked whether any member of the House lived in a district of country where foreign spirits are not used? So far as his knowledge extended, such could not be the fact. Will gentlemen then consent to add 15 cents per gallon to the duty upon foreign spirits, and but 2 cents to a gallon of New England rum? The effect of such a step could only be to give a bounty upon the manufacture of rum from molasses. For what is this bounty to be given? The molasses are imported. Put them in the shape of ardent spirits, and the spirits thus obtained interfere directly with the market for the whiskey made from the grain of the country. All the whiskey the country can make, and market, furnishes a market for just so much of the grain of our farmers, which now will not sell, and must remain upon their hands. This is the only view of the subject I will present.

I voted against the duty of 15 cents upon the foreign spirits. I did think it too high in proportion to the duty of 5 cents proposed upon molasses of which the rum is made. I now appeal to those gentlemen who voted for the 15 cents increase upon foreign spirits; to the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE,) who made the motion to strike out the whole duty upon molasses, while he, at the same time, voted to increase the duty 15 cents upon the foreign spirits made of the same material, will they, instead of prohibiting, give a bounty upon the making of rum from foreign molasses? Have they no feelings, no regard for those who use the foreign spirits? Will they compel them to use the New England, instead of the West India rum? That shall not be my course. If our own spirits cannot have the market, if the foreign molasses or the foreign rum must be imported to conflict with the sale of our whiskey, I am willing the consumer should take his election which he will bring into the country. I will not consent to prohibit the one by an extravagant duty, and leave the other without any, or with a nominal increase.

Mr. CONDIOT observed in reply, that he was one of those who had voted to increase the duty on imported rum; he had done so on principle, and was always ready to vote to increase such a duty. He would vote for an excise on domestic spirits, and did not consider that this was at all inconsistent with reducing the duty on molasses, eight millions of gallons of which was used for food, to three millions which was distilled.

Mr. MARTINDALE replied to his colleague,

(Mr. WRIGHT,) and wished to know how this duty would reach the western farmers, but through the western distillers. No possible protection could bring the whiskey of the Western States to compete in New England with the rum distilled there, because New England had nothing to give to the West for whiskey, but could exchange all her products for molasses in the West Indies.

Mr. MITCHELL, of S. Carolina, said: he should vote for retaining the duty on molasses, because he believed that keeping it in the bill would get votes against the final passage of the bill; and if the bill must pass, he wished the poor to be made to feel its oppressive operation, that a stronger interest might be created in the country against the Tariff System.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said: Sir, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. CONDIOT;) it is similar nearly to one I had prepared, and was about to offer. I would not strike molasses from the bill; it is an article that I think will bear an increased duty, and so far as it is brought into the country for distillation, a duty equal to that proposed in the bill, or even higher. The article is one of great bulk for its value, inconvenient to handle, and hazardous to keep; one chargeable with high freight on its transportation. These things operate of themselves to protect the production of it in this country to a considerable extent. Beyond this, the duty imposed on its importation by the existing law is equal to 50 or 75 per cent. of its value, at the place whence imported. If I am correct, the duty of 10 cents the gallon proposed by the bill, would be from 100 to 125 per cent. This is a duty altogether disproportioned to the other propositions in the bill. Much the greatest moiety of this article enters into the consumption of the middling classes and poor families, for food and common culinary purposes—it is wholesome, and nutritious—its consumption in that way should be encouraged. Why then is it proposed to levy a duty on this article higher than any other article in the bill? I will not impute improper motives to any one, but I may advert to what has passed here before our eyes. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) who has been a consistent and warm opponent of all tariffs, says that the tariff law of 1824 would never have passed if molasses had not been stricken out. I recollect well the time alluded to, and then believed as I do now, that but for the reason given by the gentleman, the act of 1824 never would have passed. I voted then to strike out molasses, because I was then as now friendly to affording protection to American industry and then as now opposed to the gentleman from New York; and because I was not willing to sacrifice a great measure merely to gratify a desire to retain an article in the bill for experiment's sake, however much the project might be the favorite of a friend, whose opinion I respected. The vote that struck this article from the bill of 1824, I have never heard censured in any part of the country. I am now, as I was in 1824, friendly to the system of protection—I feel anxious to pass an efficient act, one that will revive the desponding and depressed interests of the country. It is notorious that the item imposing a high duty on molasses, bearing as it does almost exclusively on one section of the country, jeopardizes the passage of the bill now as it did in 1824—the tax on this article has not been prayed for by any portion of the country. I will not say it was introduced into the bill, at the rate of duty affixed to it, with the design to defeat the bill, but I do think its tendency is to defeat it: and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) whose hostility to the system no one will question, says he will vote to retain this burthensome duty, as a means of defeating the bill; or, if it fail to produce that effect, in the hope that by its severe operation upon the poor, it will be so sensibly felt, and be so generally deprecated, as to produce discontent and alarm, and make converts to his anti-tariff doctrines. The same sentiments have been avowed by the gentlemen, from South Carolina, (Mr. MITCHELL,) from Georgia, (Mr. GILMER,) from Maryland, (Mr. WEEKS,) and others. These gentlemen are all known to be bitter enemies late of the tariff. They openly and frankly avow their determination to vote for this duty, and for the highest rate of duty on articles of common use, to raise the price, oppress the consumer, to make the system odious, and eventually to destroy all protection. Now, sir, can I, who have always been a friend to the system, with the declarations made in open day, thinking now as I did in 1824, that the retention of this high and onerous duty endangers the system, can I, desirous as I am that some bill, if it afford but slight increase of protection to the great, suffering, and crying interests of the country, should pass to save them from total prostration of ruin, fall in with our adversaries, unite with our open and avowed enemies, aid to advance their plan of operations, to retain in the bill an item they think and intend shall defeat and destroy the measure altogether?

Mr. Woodcock replied to Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, and explained the reason why he had voted for an increased duty on foreign spirits, referred to the testimony on the subject of whiskey, and remonstrated against taxing an article of such general and important use as molasses, to encourage Western distillation.

Mr. BUCHANAN professed to be a decided friend to the policy of protecting domestic industry, but his attachment to the bill would be greatly diminished if the duty on molasses should be stricken out. He contended that every three gallons of molasses, imported into this country, to be manufactured into New England rum, took the place of one bushel of corn or rye; and that, for each cent per gallon, which was added to the price of whiskey, the distillers in his district could, and did give an additional price, of between two and three cents per bushel for grain. He had voted to strike out the duty on molasses in 1824, to save the tariff bill, but should not do so again.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that the debate had hitherto been conducted, as if only two interests in the country were concerned in this duty on molasses—the navigating and the grain growing interest. They both seemed to forget that there was a third party, which consisted of those who produced domestic molasses. This duty, if laid, would operate to protect not only the growers of grain, but the growers of sugar. There was, in the State of Louisiana, land capable of producing enough sugar and molasses to supply the whole consumption of the United States. There were upwards of a million of acres, each of which would produce sixty gallons of molasses. The eastern traders could as well take their molasses from New Orleans, as from the West Indies, and might give the same articles in exchange for it. He was opposed to the principle of the bill, but believing that it would pass, he wished his constituents to have some share in the benefit, if any was to grow out of it.

Mr. SPRAGUE spoke in reply to Mr. WICKLIFFE, and denied that there was any proof, either that four gallons of whiskey were mixed with one gallon of molasses, or that rum, thus produced, was, by fraud and perjury, exported for the benefit of drawback. Such charges should not be made without evidence.

Mr. WOODS, of Ohio, said, he should not controvert the statement of Mr. WICKLIFFE, but, if it was a fact, that every gallon of molasses was a sponge to drink up four gallons of whiskey, the people of his district would be very glad to hear of it, and the importation of molasses ought certainly to be encouraged. With such a premium, the people of New England could well afford to buy up and re-distil the whiskey of the West, or, if not, the people of the West could afford to do it for themselves.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, after recommending to Mr. WOODS to sue out a patent for his mode of calculation, replied to Mr. SPRAGUE, denied his own knowledge as to the proportion in which whiskey was mixed with molasses, or as to its exportation for benefit of drawback, but quoted a passage from the minutes of the Harrisburg Convention, respecting certain exports from Baltimore. He repelled the insinuations which had been thrown out as to the motives of those who refused to go the whole length to which some friends of the tariff system were disposed to carry it.

Mr. SPRAGUE replied, repeated his demand for proof as to fraud and perjury, explained the quotation which Mr. WICKLIFFE had made, that gentleman having supposed that whiskey, New England rum, apple brandy, and peach brandy, were all mixed in one cask, because they were all mentioned in one sentence.

After some explanation between Messrs. For-WARD and SPRAGUE, as to the mixture of whiskey and molasses, and another explanation by Mr. LONE, as to the motives of his vote in 1824, the question was put on Mr. CONDUCT's amendment, (to strike out ten and insert seven,) and decided in the negative, by—yeas 98, noes 104.

The question was then put on Mr. SPRAGUE's amendment, (to strike out the duty,) which was also decided in the negative, by—yeas 82, noes 114.

Mr. WARD demanded the previous question, and the demand was sustained by the House—yeas 107.

The Speaker, then, by request, stated the effect of the previous question; which would be not to set aside any of the amendments which had been adopted, but to preclude all further amendment and farther debate.

He then put the previous question, in the following words: "Shall the main question now be put?" and it was decided in the affirmative, by—yeas 110, noes 91.

The Speaker then put the main question, in the following words: "Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time?"

Mr. REED then demanded that the main question be taken by yeas and noes, and they were ordered; they stood as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, in the following form:

A BILL in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on Imports.

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, in lieu of the duties now imposed by law on the importation of the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, the following duties; that is to say:

1st. On iron, in bars or bolts, not manufactured, in whole, or in part, by rolling, one cent per pound.

2d. On bar and bolt iron, made wholly, or in part, by rolling, thirty-seven dollars per ton.

3d. On iron, in pigs, sixty-two and one-half cents per one hundred and twelve pounds.

4th. On iron or steel wire, not exceeding number fourteen, six cents per pound, and over number fourteen, ten cents per pound.

5th. On round iron, or brazier's rods, of three-sixteenths to eight-sixteenths of an inch diameter, inclusive; and on iron in nail or spike rods, slit or rolled; and on iron in sheets, and hoop iron; and on iron slit or rolled for band iron, scroll iron, or casement rods, three and one-half cents per pound.

6th. On axes, adzes, drawing knives, cutting knives, sickles, or reaping hooks, scythes, spades, shovels, squares of iron or steel, bridle bits of all descriptions, steel-yards and scale beams, socket chisels, vices, and screws of iron, for wood, called wood screws, ten per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the present rate of duty.

7th. On steel, one dollar and fifty cents per one hundred and twelve pounds.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on the importation of the articles hereinafter mentioned, the following duties in lieu of those now imposed by law:

1st. On wool unmanufactured, 4 cents per pound; and also in addition thereto, 40 per cent. ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1829, from which time, an additional ad valorem duty of five per cent. shall be imposed annually, until the whole of said ad valorem duty shall amount to fifty per cent. And all wool, imported on the skin, shall be estimated as to weight and value, and shall pay the same rate of duties as other imported wool.

2d. On manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, (except carpetings, blankets, worsted stuff goods, bombazines, hosiery, mita, gloves, caps, and bindings,) the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed fifty cents the square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, 20 cents on every square yard: Provided, That on all manufactures of wool, except flannels and baizes, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed 83 1-3 cents per square yard, shall pay fourteen cents per square yard.

3d. On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part (except as aforesaid) the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall exceed fifty cents the square yard, and shall not exceed one dollar the square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of 40 cents on every square yard.

4th. On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, except as aforesaid, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall exceed one dollar the square yard, and shall not exceed two dollars and fifty cents the square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of one dollar on every square yard.

5th. All manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, except as aforesaid, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall exceed two dollars and fifty cents the square yard, and shall not exceed four dollars the square yard, shall be deemed to have cost at the place whence imported, four dollars the square yard, and a duty of forty per cent. ad valorem shall be levied, collected, and paid, on such valuation.

6th. On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, except as aforesaid, the actual value of which at the place whence imported, shall exceed four dollars the square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

7th. On woollen blankets, hosiery, mits, gloves, and bindings, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

8th. On Brussels, Turkey, and Wilton carpets and carpeting, seventy cents per square yard. On all Venetian and ingrain carpets and carpetings, forty cents per square yard. On all other kinds of carpets and carpetings, of wool, flax, hemp, or cotton, or parts of either, thirty-two cents per square yard. On all patent floor-cloths, fifty cents per square yard. On oil cloth, other than that usually denominated patent floor-cloth, twenty-five cents per square yard. On furniture oil cloth, fifteen cents per square yard. On floor matting, made of flags or other materials, fifteen cents per square yard.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, there be levied, collected, and paid, on the importation of the following articles, in lieu of the duty now imposed by law:

1st. On unmanufactured hemp, forty-five dollars per ton, until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine; from which time, five dollars per ton in addition per annum, until the duty shall amount to sixty dollars per ton. On cotton bagging four and a half cents per square yard, until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty nine, and afterwards a duty of five cents per square yard.

2d. On unmanufactured flax, thirty-five dollars per ton, until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, from which time an additional duty of five dollars per ton, per annum, until the duty shall amount to sixty dollars per ton.

3d. On sail duck, nine cents the square yard.

4th. On molasses, ten cents per gallon.

5th. On all imported distilled spirits, fifteen cents per gallon, in addition to the duty now imposed by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, no drawback of duty shall be allowed on the exportation of any spirit, distilled in the United States, from molasses; no drawback shall be allowed on any quantity of sail-duck, less than fifty bolts, exported in one ship or vessel, at any one time. And in all cases of drawback of duties claimed on cordage manufactured from foreign hemp, the amount of drawback shall be computed by the quantity of hemp used, and excluding the weight of tar, and all other materials used in manufacturing the cordage.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the duties now imposed by law, on window glass, of the sizes above ten inches by fifteen inches, five dollars for one hundred square feet: Provided, that all window glass imported in plates, or sheets uncut, shall be chargeable with the same rate of duty. On vials and bottles, not exceeding the capacity of six ounces each, one dollar and seventy-five cents per gross.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the duties now imposed by law, on all imported roofing slates not exceeding twelve inches in length, by six inches in width, four dollars per ton; on all such slates, exceeding twelve, and not exceeding fourteen inches in length, five dollars per ton; on all slates exceeding fourteen inches, and not exceeding sixteen inches in length, six dollars per ton; on all slates exceeding sixteen inches, and not exceeding eighteen inches, seven dollars per ton; on all slates exceeding eighteen and not exceeding twenty inches in length, eight dollars per ton; on slates exceeding twenty, and not exceeding twenty-four inches, nine dollars per ton; and on all slates exceeding twenty-four inches, ten dollars per ton. And that, in lieu of the present duties, there be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of thirty-three and a third per centum, ad valorem, on all imported cyphering slates.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all cotton cloths whatsoever, or cloths of which cotton shall be a component material, excepting nankeens imported direct from China, the original cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of twenty per cent. if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond it, and of ten per cent. if imported from any other place, shall be less than thirty-five cents the square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost thirty-five cents the square yard, and charged with duty accordingly.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where the duty which now is, or hereafter may be imposed, on any goods, wares, or merchandises, imported into the United States, shall, by law, be regulated by, or be directed to be estimated or levied upon the value of the square yard, or of any other quantity or parcel thereof; and in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty on any goods, wares, or merchandises, imported into the United States, it shall be the duty of the Collector within whose district the same shall be imported or entered, to cause the actual value thereof, at the time and place from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained, and the number of yards, parcels, or quantities, and such actual value of every of them, as the case may require: and it shall, in every such case, be the duty of the appraisers of the United States, and of every of them, and of every other person who shall act as such appraiser, by all the reasonable ways and means in his or their power, to ascertain, estimate, and appraise the true and actual value, any invoice, or affidavit thereto, to the contrary notwithstanding, of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time and place from whence the same shall have been imported into the United States, and the number of such yards, parcels, or quantities, and such actual value of every of them, as the case may require; and all such goods, wares, or merchandises, being manufactures of wool, or whereof wool shall be a component part, which shall be imported into the United States in an unfinished condition, shall, in every such appraisal, be taken, deemed, and estimated, by the said appraisers, and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, to have been, at the time and place from whence the same were imported into the United States, of as great value, as if the same had been entirely finished. And to the value of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, so ascertained, there shall, in all cases where the same are or shall be charged with an ad valorem duty, be added all charges except insurance, and also twenty per centum on the said actual value and charges, if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or any place beyond the same, or from beyond Cape Horn; or ten per centum if from any other place or country; and the said ad valorem rates of duty shall be estimated on such aggregate amount; any thing in any act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That, in all cases where any goods, wares, or merchandise, subject to ad valorem duty, or whereon the duty is or shall be by law regulated by, or be directed to be estimated or levied upon, the value of the square yard, or any other quantity or parcel thereof, shall have been imported into the United States from a country other than that in which the same were manufactured or produced, the appraisers shall value the same at the current value thereof, at the time of such last exportation to the United States, in the country where the same may have been originally manufactured or produced.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases where the actual value to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained, as hereinbefore stated, of any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States, and subject to any ad valorem duty, or whereon the duty is regulated by, or directed to be imposed or levied on, the value of the square yard, or other parcel or quantity thereof, shall, by ten per centum, exceed the invoice value thereof, in addition to the duty imposed by law on the same, if they had been invoiced at their real value, as aforesaid, there shall be levied and collected on the same goods, wares, and merchandise, fifty per centum of the duty so imposed on the same goods, wares, and merchandise, when fairly invoiced: Provided, always, That nothing in this section contained, shall be construed to impose the said last-mentioned duty of fifty per centum, for a variance between the bona fide invoice of goods produced in the manner specified in the proviso to the seventh section of this act, and the current value of the said merchandise in the country where the same may have been originally manufactured or produced: And, further, That the penalty of fifty per centum, imposed by the thirteenth section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend, the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and for other purposes,'" approved March first, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, shall not be deemed to apply or attach to any goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall be subject to the additional duty of fifty per centum, as aforesaid, imposed by this section of this act.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, from time to time, to establish such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as the President of the United States shall think proper, to secure a just, faithful, and impartial appraisal of all goods, wares, and merchandise, as aforesaid, imported into the United States, and just and proper entries of such actual value thereof, and of the square yards, parcels, or other quantities thereof, as the case may require, and of such actual value of every of them: and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report all such rules and regulations, with the reasons therefor, to the then next session of Congress.

WEDNESDAY, April 16.

The Tariff Bill

Was then read a third time; and the question being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and addressed the House at length in opposition to the bill, and concluded his speech by a motion that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, on the same side, concluded a speech of considerable length, by saying, that he should vote in support of the present motion, and, if it did not succeed, should vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said he would take this occasion briefly to offer some of the reasons which would govern his vote upon the present question. He did not pretend to be well versed in the nice calculations and diversified interests involved in this complicated subject; but, from the inception of the bill to the present moment, when it is almost consummated, he had endeavored to conform his votes to what he believed to be the interests and wishes of his constituents. And when he doubted, he had governed himself by the better judgment of those who are well informed of the present state of the agricultural and manufacturing interests of this country, and of the means best adapted to cherish and extend them.

This bill, as reported by the Committee on Manufactures, was met at the very threshold by those who are the ostensible objects of its encouragement and protection. The manufacturers and wool-growers cried aloud against it; and those on this floor who have heretofore been considered the real champions of the protective system, endeavored to rouse it into something like a healthy existence, and to change its nature and operation, by amendments essentially variant from the plan of the committee. Many of those amendments have been rejected, and the bill is still encumbered with most of its original defects, and other su-peraded evils, introduced by a majority composed of the friends of the original project and the avowed enemies of the whole system of protection.

I confess (said Mr. B.) that I have felt some doubt as to the course I ought to take upon this bill. But the time has now come for definite action upon it. All amendment is precluded. I must take it with all its faults or reject it altogether. I shall do the latter. The intrinsic demerits of the bill do, in my judgment, require its rejection; but I have another, and perhaps a stronger reason, arising out of what I consider the harsh and illiberal manner in which this crisis has been forced upon the House. When the bill was reported, no voice of Missouri had reached this hall in the language of petition. There was nothing to indicate the wishes of my constituents, in regard to the general system of protection, or in favor of any particular article, the encouragement of which might advance their interests. But, after the bill was reported, I received and presented petitions numerously signed, praying a modification of the impost on lead, a staple of great and growing importance to Missouri, and the contiguous country. I did not doubt that the bill would receive, in Committee of the whole House, that calm, and deliberate, and courteous consideration which would enable every member to present and obtain a fair hearing for every proposition which he might believe conducive to the good of his constituents. Under this impression, I prepared an amendment to the bill, embracing the objects contemplated by the petitioners, and sought an opportunity for some time to present it; but such was the engrossing interest of other articles, that I was unable to offer it, until the members, weary of the long debate upon wool and woollens, seemed determined that the Committee of the Whole should rise and report the bill to the House, right or wrong, finished or unfinished. Then, for the first time, I found an opportunity to offer my proposition; and you will remember, sir, that mine, and some fifteen or twenty others, were promptly voted down, without inquiry or consideration; with the avowed understanding that they were then received, only that it might be in order for the movers to renew their propositions in the House. And with this view the House ordered all the amendments thus offered, and rejected, to be printed along with the bill. But this is not all: on offering my amendment in Committee of the Whole, I rose for the purpose of making an explanation, which I have no doubt would have insured its adoption. I wished to show that there were important omissions in the act of 1824, which ought to be supplied. I was appealed to by members near me, who urgently solicited me to forego the argument at that time, and suffer the committee to rise and report the bill; assuring me that, in the House, I would have ample opportunity to revive my proposition when there would be more time for fair inquiry and deliberate investigation. Sir, I am young in this hall, and inexperienced in the routine of business—I yielded to their solicitations; and what is the reward of my courtesy? When I sought an opportunity to renew my proposition in the House, I was muzzled and put down by the tyranny of the previous question. Sir, the previous question was prematurely and inconsiderately called. I undertake to affirm that the bill was not ripe for the final action of the House. A part of it, indeed, had been under discussion for some five or six weeks, but, as a whole, it had not occupied one moment of the attention of the House. The whole time had been consumed upon the single subject of wool and woollen fabrics, with the exception of some few hours devoted to molasses and hemp; the vast variety of other articles comprehended in the bill had been passed over in silence and oblivion. Mr. Speaker, I must be permitted to say, that a very small measure of courtesy was extended to me, as a member of this House, and very little respect was paid to the interests and wishes of my constituents, when I was denied the privilege of offering to your consideration the only subject in favor of which the people of Missouri had prayed the protecting aid of Congress.

But the fifteen or twenty amendments offered in Committee of the Whole, and afterwards stifled in the House by the previous question, do not constitute the only evidence of the immaturity of this bill. There is another irrefragable proof—a matter of fact demonstration, that admits of neither doubt nor cavil. The last hurried act of the Committee of the Whole, in the confusion of a protracted night session, and amidst the irritable impatience produced by the exhaustion of eight hours of continual attention, was the correction of a newly discovered blunder of the Committee on Manufactures. I allude to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WHEAT,) to diminish the duty proposed in the bill upon imported flax. That gentleman was an active member of the Committee on Manufactures, and one of the most zealous supporters of the bill in its original form. He stated in his place that the only design of the amendment was to correct a mistake of the committee in laying a much higher impost upon the article than they intended, notwithstanding the long and elaborate investigation which eventuated in their report of the bill, and the no less long and elaborate arguments by which several members of the committee have sustained it on this floor. When the question was about to be taken, another member of that committee, (Mr. COWDRIE, of New Jersey,) and one of the most intelligent and respectable members of this House, stated that the gentleman from New York was not aware of the full extent of the mistake into which the committee had fallen, and offered an amendment to cover the whole ground of error. But he, too, was silenced by the previous question. No attention was paid to what he said, and he was voted down with the amendment in his hand.

When the question on engrossing the bill was taken yesterday, though I was in my place, I did not vote upon it, partly because I was surprised and mortified at what I conceive to be the reckless precipitation with which the subject was pressed to its conclusion, and partly because a number of amendments had been adopted in rapid succession, of the precise import and bearing of which I was not then sufficiently informed. I am now prepared to vote against the bill, unless it can be made to assume a better form than it wears at present. The only protection asked for by any portion of my people, you have excluded, without even deigning to give them a hearing. A duty on lead would redound to our advantage, but the impost upon every other article is a tax upon us. Nevertheless, for them and for myself I would be willing to make many present sacrifices with the hope of ulterior and contingent advantages arising out of an improved and protected system of manufactures. But the bill, in its present form, pleases nobody. It awakens the jealousy and arouses the passions of a large portion of this country, while it affords no corresponding benefits to those at whose prayer it has been introduced here. The South complain that it will oppress and grind them down, and make them hewers of wood and drawers of water for the spinners and weavers of the North; and the North affirm that it will pull down their factories, desolate their pastures, and, to borrow the emphatic language of my friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. I. C. BATES,) that "it will put the knife to the jugular of every sheep in the country." Sir, I do believe that, aside from the political excitement of the times, aside from the sinister influences and indirect bearings of the subject, this bill, presented in its nakedness, to the cool, unbiassed judgment of the House, to be accepted or rejected as it might advance or retard the real interests of the agricultural and manufacturing classes of this country, would not find in this hall fifty men who would vote for it, on its own intrinsic merits. I may be mistaken in this, but if it is my honest conviction, and I shall act upon it.

A principle has been introduced into the woollen branch of this bill to which I have very serious objections; a principle by which one amount of duty in name, and another and much more exorbitant one in reality, is imposed upon the article. I mean the minimum principle, by which a variation of one cent in the price of a square yard of cloth may vary the impost duty upon it one hundred per cent. I object to this, because in such cases, the duty is unreasonable and oppressive; and I object to it for a still stronger reason, because honesty is always the best policy, and so is truth. It can never be good policy to deceive the people by our legislation, or suffer the statute book to hold out false appearances. I and my constit-nents are not deeply versed in mercantile calculations; and, with these minimums in the bill, it is next to impossible that the great mass of us should find out what duty we really pay upon the articles we consume.

I have no constitutional scruples upon this subject: for, if there be any one question, which, above all others, presents to us a consideration purely of interest and policy, it is this very question of the tariff. I am willing to vote a safe and adequate protection, in the form of a direct ad valorem duty; a duty which every one can understand, and the amount of which may be ascertained by the simplest process of calculation. If the object be to exclude the foreign article from our market, why say so in plain English, and if it can be produced at home in sufficient abundance, and of equal quality, I will go with you. If the object be really a good one, I see no reason for concealing it from the people, and wrapping it up in the mystery of minimums: and if it be a bad one, we ought not to impose it upon our constituents merely because we have found out how to envelope the evil in clouds and darkness. I will not say I would vote against the bill for this cause alone; for, although it be a serious objection, the bill might be so amended in other particulars, as to make me feel it a duty to yield it my support.

FRIDAY, April 18.

The Tariff Bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Tariff bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE said: Mr. Speaker, after the protracted debate which has already taken place on this bill, I sincerely regret the existence of circumstances which impose upon me something like a moral necessity of trespassing still further upon a stock of patience which, I am aware, must be nearly exhausted. During a skirmishing warfare of conflicting pretensions, of six or seven weeks' duration, between the advocates of the prohibitory policy—a warfare which furnishes a most instructive commentary upon this whole system—the representatives of that portion of the Union which is to be the peculiar and destined victim of its oppressive injustice have maintained, almost without exception, a profound but expressive silence. And I am not sure, sir, that we should not go through this great national sacrifice with a more impressive and dignified solemnity, if we were to maintain the same silence throughout the ceremony. But although experience admonishes us of the impotence of argument against measures of this description, it is a duty we owe, as well to our constituents as to the nation at large, to protest against the passage of a bill pregnant with so many evils, and to demonstrate its injurious and destructive bearing upon those great interests which we are under the most sacred obligations to protect. And I feel assured that when we ask the attention of the House for as many days only—I might almost say as many hours—to demonstrate the injustice and impolicy of this measure, as its friends have taken weeks to mature its strength and adjust its proportions, we will not ask more than will be cheerfully accorded to us.

We were told by a member from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURGESS,) (and it brings us to the very essence of this contested question) that the invariable effect of giving adequate protection to domestic manufactures—that is to say, prohibiting foreign manufactures—has been, and will be, to ensure the production of the domestic article cheaper than the rival fabric could be imported from abroad. I admit, sir, that this proposition—stated by the member from Rhode Island as if it were a revelation of his own, but which has been reiterated more than a hundred times by Mathew Carey and Hezekiah Niles—is the very hinge upon which the whole argument must turn. And I now pledge myself to demonstrate—and I put the issue of the whole contest upon the demonstration—that there are causes, growing out of laws as well ascertained and as immutable as the law of gravitation, which render it absolutely impossible that any of the manufactures embraced in this bill can be made as cheap in this country as they can be made in the countries from which we import them. And I pledge myself, more particularly, to prove that woollen manufactures cannot be made in this country any thing near as cheap as they can be made in England, even after our manufactories shall have been protected for ten years by prohibitory duties, and after the utmost attainable skill shall have been acquired in the process of manufacture.

What are the elements into which the price of the manufactured articles, not only of wool, but of every other material, is naturally resolved by the simplest analysis of political economy? It will not surely be required of me to demonstrate the axioms—I will not say of political economy, but of common sense. I will, therefore, assume, what must be known to every member of this House, that the cost of a manufactured article, so far as regards the process of fabrication, can only be resolved, push the analysis as far as you may, into two elements: the wages of labor and the profits of capital. The raw material is a matter that requires a separate consideration, and may therefore be regarded as a third element; though, strictly speaking, it is embraced in the former two.

What, then, is the comparative price of labor in Great Britain and in the United States? Sir, there is nothing in the history of this contest, on the subject of protecting manufactures, that I have witnessed with more astonishment and regret, than the utter recklessness with which the advocates of the protecting system, out of this House, make their statistical statements. The propriety of this remark will be readily admitted, when I state, that it is gravely asserted in a document, emanating from the celebrated Harrisburg Convention—that great Catholic council of practical wisdom, whose instructions we are required to obey implicitly, at the peril of excommunication—that labor is actually cheaper in the United States than it is in Great Britain!! Yes, sir, this authoritative assembly, after boastfully stating as a proof of the prosperity produced by the establishment of manufactories in the United States, that, “in well-regulated factories, the wages of men range from five to twelve dollars per week;” say, almost on the very next page, in attempting to prove that domestic manufactures can be made cheaper than the foreign can be imported, “we assert, without the fear of contradiction, that the price of manual labor, is really cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain!” In order to show that this latter assertion is entirely destitute of foundation, I will briefly collate the statements of one of our own manufacturers, made before the Committee on Manufactures, with authentic statements of the price of labor in Great Britain. Mr. Dexter, a manufacturer of woollens in New York, stated the wages of all the men employed in his establishment, as follows: “One machinist at $1 50 per working day; one superintending weaver at $1 37½ per working day; one principal fuller, one presser, two hands in the finishing room, and one dyer, each at $1 25 per working day; ten hands in the spinning and carding rooms, two assistant carders, and one assistant in and about the dyeing house, each $1 per working day.”

I will now exhibit a statement of the wages of manufacturing labor in Great Britain, derived from witnesses examined before the Emigration Committee, and contained in their third report. I quote from the Monthly Magazine for December, 1827:

“Joseph Foster and James Little, working ‘hand-loom weavers’ of Glasgow, persons who give their evidence with the most laudable temperance and good sense, state, that a hand-loom weaver at Glasgow gets now, upon an average, from 4s. 6d. to 7s. a week, wages; this is at piece work, and to earn so much he must be employed eighteen or nineteen hours.”

“Mr. Home Drummond, member for Renfrew, concurs in the opinion of Mr. Campbell.”

“Mr. Thomas Hunter, a master manufacturer at Carlisle, says: ‘I have taken out fifteen of my men—five of them are employed at the best work, and pretty constantly employed—and I find their average net earnings to be 5s. 6d. per week, deducting all necessary expenses of loom rent, candles, tackling, &c.’ In conclusion, this witness puts in a table of wages and expenses, from which it appears, that the best hand-loom weavers in his employment are only able to earn 5s. 6d. a week.”

“The Rev. Matthias Turner states that ‘the admitted calculation is, that a family cannot exist upon less than a half crown a week, per head, and when that amount is not earned, the parish makes up the difference.’”

Tariff Bill.

[H. of R.]

These comparative statements conclusively disprove the absurd allegation, so confidently made in the report of the Harrisburg Convention. They clearly show, that a laborer of a given description receives in this country nearly as much, for the labor of a day, as such a workman would receive in many parts of Great Britain, for the labor of a week. Even, sir, if we assume 12s. a week, which is the highest rate of wages obtained by the first-rate weavers in the most prosperous establishments in England, as the basis of the comparison, it will yet follow that an American weaver, taking the lowest average, receives between two and three times as much, for working eleven hours a day, as a British weaver receives for working sixteen. And if we have regard to the efficiency and productiveness of labor, the difference will be still greater. It would not be extravagant to say, that a given quantity of work can be done in Great Britain for one-third of the price it would cost in the United States. And yet we are informed, by manufacturers, testifying on oath, that they can manufacture woollen cloth as cheaply as it can be manufactured in England; and by the Harrisburg Convention, that "manual labor is really cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain!" But, sir, when pressed with the decisive and unanswerable evidence I have stated, the advocates of the prohibitory system resort to a subterfuge worthy of a cause which rests on delusion. We were told, for example, by the member from Rhode Island—and the argument would have been very ingenious if it had not been a dull absurdity, and very original if it had not been worn threadbare by Mathew Carey and Hezekiah Niles, "that, although labor is so very cheap in Great Britain, yet owing to the oppressive weight of British taxation, the British manufacturer cannot contend with the untaxed labor of the United States." Now, sir, is it not palpably obvious to every one who knows any thing about the subjects of British taxation, that the British laborer pays his taxes, oppressive as they are, out of the miserable pittance which he receives as the wages of his labor? Every thing he eats, drinks or wears, every blessing he enjoys—even the light of heaven, comes to him charged with the burthen of excise and impost duties and direct taxation. Sir, can it be possible that those who undertake to instruct the National Legislature on this grave subject, can be so utterly ignorant of the commonest elementary principles, as not to perceive that the comparative weight of British and American taxation, can have no possible bearing upon the question at issue? An American manufacturer receives six dollars a week, a British manufacturer only two. The British manufacturer performs one-third more labor in a day than the American, and pays out of his wages six times as much tax. And, in the face of all this, the Harrisburg Convention, followed by the member from Rhode Island, go into a solemn mockery of reasoning, to prove that labor must be "really cheaper" in this country, because taxes are lower!

I need scarcely add, sir, that the same course of reasoning which I have applied to labor, is applicable to the profits of capital. The capitalist who lends money in Great Britain at 8 per cent. pays all his heavy taxes out of this low rate of interest; whereas the American capitalist, though he pays much less tax, will not take less than six per cent. for his money. The case, then, is clearly made out, and the argument has not been fairly met, but artfully evaded, that the wages of labor, and the profits of capital, taking the average of both, are permanently one hundred per cent. at least, higher in the United States than they are in Great Britain.

What, then, are we to think of the testimony of our manufacturers, when they tell us they could manufacture woollen cloth as cheap as it can be made in Great Britain if it were not for the higher price they have to give for the raw material? Can such a statement be regarded as testimony at all? I do not mean to assert, though this statement is obviously false upon the face of it, that the manufacturers are obnoxious to the imputation of stating what they know to be false. What I mean to say is, that their crude and conjectural opinions upon a question of which they are entirely ignorant—opinions founded upon the loosest sort of hearsay evidence of the state of things in other countries, are not entitled to the slightest possible weight in this investigation.

Having shown, sir, that the two principal elements which enter into the cost of manufactured articles, are more than one hundred per cent. higher in the United States than they are in Great Britain, how is it possible that those articles can be fabricated in this country as cheap as in Great Britain? Here, then, is a plain, common sense, practical view of the question, involving no speculative theory, and level with every understanding; and I confidently defy any man to meet the issue fairly and candidly, without being exposed to utter defeat and overthrow.

Having said this much on the cost of the fabrication, I will proceed to submit a few remarks, applicable to woollen manufactures, relative to the cost of the raw material. The manufacturers come here, and tell us with a liberality quite as commendable as their consistency, that it is indispensably necessary to give further protection to the wool growers; that they are rapidly abandoning their business, and will entirely abandon it, if they do not get better prices for raw wool. And to give a tragical interest to the subject, we have been told that, if the price of wool be not raised, the knife will be speedily applied to the neck of every merino sheep in the country; and this bloody scene of oratorical sheep slaughter is conjured up to excite our tender sympathies, at the very moment that we are told, from the same quarter, that raw wool is now selling in the United States 60 or 70 per cent. higher than it is in Great Britain. Now, sir, though

I admit that this tragic story is pregnant with a most instructive moral, it is a very different one from that deduced by the manufacturers. It proves, most conclusively, all that I have said on the subject of the wages of labor and the profits of capital. For it will be conceded, I presume, that if any thing can be produced cheaper in this country than in Great Britain, it is the produce of the soil and the animals sustained by it. And yet the very men who would make us believe they can manufacture woollen cloths as cheap as it can be done in Great Britain, tell us that the British farmer, upon land which cost ten times as much as such land would cost in the United States, can sell wool for little more than one-half the price to which it must be raised in the United States to prevent the wool grower from abandoning the business. It is most obvious, then, that the high price of wool, like the high price of manufactures made in this country, is founded upon permanent causes.

There cannot, indeed, be a higher evidence of that prosperity which we derive from the munificent bounties of Providence, and which we are laboring so sedulously to destroy, than the fact that a farmer in the United States can apply his labor and capital more profitably than in raising wool and selling it at a price 70 per cent. higher than the British farmer obtains for his. It is perfectly evident, therefore, that if both foreign wool and foreign woollens were absolutely prohibited, and the domestic manufacture "completely established," to use the favorite phrase of its advocates, there would be a permanent increase of the price of woollen manufactures, and of raw wool, to an extent that will be presently stated.

The idea that domestic competition will reduce the price till it becomes as low as that of the foreign production, is founded upon an utter confusion of ideas, and a total misconception of the whole matter, though this proposition was stated, by the member from Rhode Island, as a thing so obvious that those who denied it must be sinning against light.

Having disposed of one branch of this dry argument, I beg leave, by way of episode, to call the respectful attention of the House to the address of the Harrisburg Convention, that celebrated document which has been trumpeted forth to the nation as the great depository of practical wisdom, and as containing an unanswerable vindication of the doctrines I am attempting to refute. I beseech the House to favor me with as much gravity as they can command, while I read, for their edification, the first sentence of that wonderful production, which I also beg them to remember is the work of practical men, taking a mere business view of the subject. Here it is: "The ever-restless thirst for knowledge in man, leads him to the measurement of the volumes of the waters discharged by the rivers, to the weighing, as it were, in a balance, the Alps and the Andes, to the establishment of the courses of the planets, and a determination of the eccentric ranges of comets through the immensity of space itself, [Bear it in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this is about woollen manufactures!] and reduce it to human ideas of the extent of matter—[I suppose you know what that means!] yet the study of himself, the ascertainment of those qualities given to render himself and his fellow man happy, are fatally neglected, [I am not half through the sentence yet!] and the capacities of the human race to walk erect, the image of God, are chiefly given up to the warm visions of speculators, or cold calculations of tyrants and masters; to the former, to indulge some pretty theory or beautiful notion, fitted to other conditions and circumstances of society—and to the last, that it may be counted how many must be slaughtered to win a battle in the field, or how great burthens he (who?) can bear, (Deliver us from this tariff!) and still exist to labor, and groan out 'a weary life of servitude and shame.'" Now, sir, when I inform the House that this is a fair specimen of the entire composition, I presume no man of discriminating taste and sound judgment will hesitate to admit, that the grave solemnity and dignified simplicity of the style, is in perfect keeping with the "great argument" of which it is the vehicle. But, sir, that you may have a specimen of the didactic portion of this sententious and statesmanlike document, I will gratify you with a sentence from the main body of the work, in which we are indirectly advised to establish a home department: "In the want of a Home Department, in which, as in our own 'plummet found' Mississippi, rolling the congregated waters of millions of supplies, (millions of water!) to a common reservoir, might be found collected the multitudinous!! facts necessary to a correct understanding of the internal affairs of our country, and a wise legislation concerning them—in the general deficiency of knowledge in political economical subjects, and of the desire to obtain it from the absence of professorships in our superior schools, to lead the mind of youth to contemplate and add up the sum of production and consumption, and investigate the wants of this nation and its means of supply—(I do not understand the meaning of all this jumble of words: but mark the inference!) it is to be regretted the Convention had not remained in session a considerable time, (Heaven forbid!) that the dispersed and important facts in the possession of as respectable a body of practical men! as ever was assembled, might have been fully gathered, and preserved for public instruction, but the sparse items mutually communicated, and in part retained, may act like 'a little leaven,' and 'leaven the whole lump,' if liberally received and rightfully used!!!" Now, sir, having extricated myself from the Cretan labyrinth of this sentence, and recovered my breath a little, I must be permitted to say, that we have here a combination of high sounding words, mixed metaphors, swelling bombast, and profound bathos, which it would puzzle all the rhetoricians in Christendom to bring within the compass of any definition. Neither Aristotle, nor Blair, nor Campbell, could reduce it to any of the categories of rhetoric; and, as to Longinus, it never entered into his imagination to conceive of such sublimity. In all my reading, sir, I recollect but a single specimen of style having any resemblance to it; and that is in an oration I heard recited from the Columbian Orator, when I was a boy at school. (I had too much taste, even then, thank Heaven! to speak it myself.) It was in the following words, and will apply to the subject of woollen manufactures, as well as the sentences I have just quoted: "Guided by reason man has travelled through the abstruse regions of the philosophic world. He can trace the comet's flight through the regions of immeasurable space: he can almost make the marble speak." Now, with all becoming deference, I would suggest, that the Harrisburg Convention stand much more in need of a Professor of Rhetoric, than they do of a Professor of Political Economy. Their address would certainly furnish abundant matter for a new theory of the art of rhetorical mystification.

But, sir, to be serious. I should not have criticized this document with so much severity, if it were not that I feel indignant, as an American, at the very thought of its miserable jargon going down to posterity as the foundation of this prohibitory system, and as the apology offered by an enlightened people for submitting to the most odious and oppressive tyranny ever devised by "artful men, for private advantage, under pretence of public good." The writer of this address, who is a mere instrument in the hands of designing men, understands no more of the political and economical bearing of the "American system," than the intoxicated priestess at Delphos understood the effect of the oracular responses she uttered from the tripod, and which an artful priesthood countenanced by political rulers, converted into the means of governing the world.

It has been conceded by all the intelligent advocates of the protecting system, from Alexander Hamilton to the present Secretary of State, that free trade would be most conducive to national prosperity, if all nations would pursue the policy of tolerating it. In other words, we are called upon to protect our manufactures against foreign regulations, which are supposed to be of a tendency to give foreign manufacturers an undue advantage over ours, in competing for our own market. Now, sir, I undertake to establish the proposition—and I will concede the policy of this measure, if I do not—that there is not now a single bounty on the statute book of Great Britain for encouraging either the making or the exportation of any one of the manufactures embraced in this bill, nor a single commercial restriction that does not tend to give our manufacturers an advantage over the British, in our own and in foreign markets.

But, sir, if this oppressive system of policy, of which this bill is almost the consummation, shall be pushed any farther than it has already gone, our brethren of the North will not long have to complain that they consume so large a portion of the proceeds of the staples we now export to Great Britain. There is a retributive justice in the dispensations of Providence—and I thank God that there is—which makes injustice and tyranny, when carried beyond a certain point, recoil upon the oppressor. Sir, if you were to destroy—utterly destroy the foreign trade in cotton, the very portions of the Union at the shrine of whose imaginary interests you propose to make the offering, would find themselves deeply and incurably injured, while we should derive a sustaining consolation, in the midst of our sufferings, from the proud consciousness that our own folly and wickedness had no agency in producing the calamity, and that our own firmness, industry, and economy, would enable us to work out new sources of prosperity. There is a pleasure in bearing up against oppression, which the oppressor can never enjoy; and I solemnly declare, sir, that I would rather be the victim of this abominable scheme of legalized plunder, than to meet the dreadful responsibility, moral and political, of imposing it upon the nation.

Yes, sir, I warn gentlemen that they have a fearful responsibility to encounter, both to their own constituents and to the Union. Thus far the burdens of this system have fallen principally on the Southern States. But it has now reached a point, beyond which you cannot carry it with impunity. Even the colonial vassalage of the Southern States—and they have been better colonies to the Northern States, than they ever were to England—will be no longer profitable to you, if you pass this bill. We shall be compelled to change the whole economy of our industry, and to become the rivals instead of the customers of the Northern States. I have stated, on another occasion, that we import from the North, of the productions of the soil, in their natural and crudely manufactured state—potatoes, onions, beer, cider, spirits, beef, pork, soap, candles, cheese, and an almost endless list of small articles, to the amount of two millions of dollars, excluding what are usually called manufactures. I will now add, that we import a very large amount of manufactures from the Northern States, which every principle of sound policy, and every dictate of patriotism, will urge us to make within ourselves, if this bill shall become a law. Of these I will barely mention, by way of illustration, the article of negro shoes, which the States of South Carolina and Georgia alone import, to the amount of half a million of dollars annually, and which every planter has the means either of making himself, or procuring in his own vicinity, in exchange for the productions of his plantation. When, therefore, the hard lessons of economy shall be impressed upon us by the burden of this system, I venture to assert, that the internal trade of the country will be curtailed, including that with the West, to the extent of seven millions of dollars; an amount nearly equal to that of the foreign manufactures of wool now imported. But the inevitable result of this measure will be to produce a reaction, ruinous not only to the great mass of the population in the manufacturing States, who have all along been the suffering and deluded victims of the manufacturers, but ruinous to the manufacturers themselves. The Southern States will be driven, by necessity, to make the experiment of manufacturing by slave labor, and nothing but an experiment is wanting to demonstrate, that we can drive the Eastern manufacturers out of our own market at least. The average cost of slave labor, which I believe better adapted to manage the ordinary operations of machinery, than hired free labor, will not cost us more than half the price of labor in the northern manufactories, and our water power, of which we have an unlimited command at all seasons, would cost us comparatively nothing. While the manufacturers of cotton bagging in Kentucky, are indulging in the anticipation of compelling us to pay 25 and 80 cents a yard for their hemp bagging, they will find that we can manufacture an article better adapted to our purposes, out of our own cotton, for half that price, thereby greatly increasing the consumption of our own material. And the Eastern manufacturer of cotton goods, while indulging in dreams of profitable monopoly, will find that our decided advantage in the superior cheapness of labor, the raw material and water power, will enable us to undersell them long before we attain equal skill in the process of manufacturing. In a word, sir, those parts of the Union that have co-operated in establishing this fatal policy, will find, that however much they have benefited by our prosperity and wealth, they will derive no advantage from our distress and poverty. And the mass of the people of the Eastern, Middle, and Western States, when suddenly deprived of the domestic market for their productions, which they now enjoy to the extent of seven millions of dollars annually, will realize, in their own distress, the promised blessings of this great system of deception and delusion.

Mr. Speaker, it is distressing to witness the kind of aristocratic influence, by which measures of this sort are obviously controlled. I have witnessed, with astonishment and regret, as a strong proof of the aristocratic tendency of every system of Government, the melancholy fact, that intelligent and honorable men upon this floor, in whose Congressional districts there is perhaps a single manufactory of iron, owned by perhaps the very wealthiest man in the country, will give their votes, without the least compunction, to impose an odious and oppressive tax upon the remaining thousands of their poor constituents, to increase the profits of one wealthy nabob.

And yet, sir, we hear gentlemen very gravely talking about promoting the interest of "a whole State," when they are in the very act of imposing a tax upon the great body of the people of that very State. Such, for example, was the language used by the gentleman from Missouri, when urging the expediency of increasing the duty on lead; when, I will venture to say, one hundred of his constituents would feel the tax, where one of them would realize the bounty of such an imposition. And yet, sir, we talk about a democratic Government, and the responsibility of the Representative to the people! I speak not the language of a demagogue, but the grave and solemn language of historical and philosophical truth, when I say, that it is the very genius of this system, as exhibited in this and every other country, to tax the many and the poor for the benefit of the few and the wealthy. Take up the articles embraced in the scheme of protection, one by one, and I defy any man to point out a single one of them that does not specifically prove and illustrate the proposition I have laid down. Salt, for example, is an article of first necessity, equally consumed by the poor and the rich. The people of the United States now pay about one hundred per cent. on every bushel of salt they consume, amounting in the aggregate to a tax of at least a million and a half dollars, paid by all classes, for the exclusive benefit of the owners of some one or two hundred salt works at the utmost. The same remark is strictly applicable to the duty on iron. It imposes a universal tax, both heavy and permanent, for the benefit of not more than one or two hundred ironmasters in the United States. And I appeal to the members from Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Western Virginia, to state whether these men have not accumulated princely fortunes by the very business which we are taxing the people still higher to sustain? I was myself informed by one of those ironmasters, that the establishment in which he was concerned yielded an annual income of, I think it was, $15,000 or $20,000, and that he could afford to sell iron at ten dollars a ton less than the present prices, and do a profitable business. And yet, sir, with all the republican simplicity imaginable, we are imposing a heavy tax upon the whole democracy of the country, to increase the already overgrown fortunes of this single branch of the aristocracy! The high duty on imported sugar is another illustration of the view I am attempting to impress upon the House; and I am induced to notice it the more particularly, because it has been urged as a reason why the Southern States generally ought to submit to the proposed imposition of high duties on other articles. Sir, what sort of logic is that which urges the justice of imposing a tax upon South Carolina for the benefit of Massachusetts, because a tax has already been imposed upon both South Carolina and Massachusetts for the benefit of Louisiana? I do not understand this system of sectional combination—I am sure it is not founded upon the principles of the constitution—by which South Carolina is to be made responsible to Massachusetts for the duty on sugar, any more than she is responsible to Louisiana for the duty on woollens. By all the ties which consecrate this Union, my State stands in as near a relation to Massachusetts as to Louisiana, and he does not consult either the spirit of the constitution, or the harmony of the Union, who deduces such an argument as that which I am considering from geographical juxtaposition merely. I, sir, complain of the duty upon sugar, as much as any other member of this House. It is obnoxious, in a peculiar manner, to the objection I have urged against the duties on salt and iron; it is a tax on the great body of the people, for the benefit of some two or three hundred sugar planters, who are men of immense wealth; for the fact is notorious, that the business is almost exclusively confined to large capitalists. Every family in the United States that consumes 33½ pounds of sugar, pays a tax of one dollar to these wealthy monopolists; and I know a single individual—he is a personal friend—worth between two and three millions of dollars, who receives annually about 30,000 dollars as his dividend of this national bounty.

Can there be a more striking proof of the injustice, and impolicy, and anti-republican tendency of this system? It imposes a tax of at least four millions five hundred thousand dollars upon the mass of the people in every State in the Union, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the iron-masters, sugar-planters, and owners of salt works, not amounting, in the whole Union, to more than from five hundred to one thousand persons; and if we add all the owners of cotton and woollen manufactories in the United States, it would not swell the number to two thousand. Sir, the foundation of an aristocracy of wealth was never more distinctly laid in the legislation of any country on earth; nor was the democracy of any other country ever subjected to such an enormous tax to sustain a privileged order. There is nothing in the legislation of England, not excepting the oppressive system of the corn laws, more justly obnoxious to condemnation.

But, sir, the manufacturers, with an art common to all those who, by the various devices of human cunning, have made subservient to their purposes the credulity of the multitude, allege, that the great body of farmers, constituting, perhaps, three-fourths of our population, are interested in the establishment of manufactures as a means of obtaining a market for their wool. Conceding, as I readily do, that the establishment of manufactories, when not forced by artificial means, is beneficial to such farmers as live within their vicinity and have capital sufficient to embark in the business of wool-growing, yet I confidently appeal to every member from the wool-growing portions of the Union, to say whether the business of growing wool for the manufacturing establishments, is not confined to a very small portion of farmers, consisting of those who have the largest capital? Yes, sir, I have been assured by members on this floor, engaged in the business of wool-growing, that the small farmers do not even raise wool for their own consumption, but actually buy it from those of the more wealthy class. I may venture to assert that, taking the average even of the wool-growing States, there is not one in fifty of the farmers who raises wool for sale; and that the whole number of wool growers in the United States, who would be at all benefited by the duty upon raw wool and woollens, would not exceed ninety thousand persons. Thus it is, sir, that this bill maintains a consistent character throughout all its provisions, and the great democratic farming interest, represented as constituting nine millions of our population, dwindles into an aristocracy of ninety thousand of the most wealthy farmers. It is to provide a small bounty for those wool growers and a very large one for the still smaller number of woollen and cotton manufacturers, iron masters, sugar planters, and owners of salt works, that the other classes of the people, including more than eight millions nine hundred thousand of the people of the farming States, are compelled to pay an annual tax of about fifteen millions of dollars. Such, sir, is the operation, and such the political tendency of this system. The heavy burden of its taxation falls upon all sections of the Union, and all classes of the community; whereas its bounties are confined to a number not much larger than the constitutional aristocracy of some other countries. But, sir, I shall be probably asked how it happens that the capitalists of the South, the wealthy cotton planters, are arrayed on the side of the great mass of the people, in this contest between capital and labor? Have they more knowledge or more honesty than other capitalists? Sir, I set up no such pretension for them. We lay claim to no other intelligence and honesty than such as enables us to understand, and prompts us to defend, our own rights. I will not undertake to say that we might not be tempted to join this plundering expedition, if a tariff could be so regulated as to increase the price of cotton. But such is our position in this contest, that our interest throws us into a natural alliance with the great body of the people in the farming States. The wealthy cotton planter of the South fights by the side of the small farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, and the laborer, in New York and Pennsylvania, because they all have a similar interest in opposing a system of which the burden falls upon them and the benefit on others. And this accounts for the fact—notorious in our political history—that what some are pleased to call the aristocracy of the Southern States, has always been found on the same side with the democracy of the Northern States in the political controversies by which the country has been divided. It is a natural alliance. (The Southern States, depending on free trade for their prosperity, must always be opposed to any attempts on the part of this Government to build up, by commercial prohibitions, an aristocracy of favored monopolists. Sir, this is not a contest, as some are anxious to represent it, between the Southern and Northern States. It is a contest of less than one hundred thousand manufacturers and farmers, against all the other farmers and manufacturers in the Union, and against the whole population in the Southern States.)

I will now invite the attention of the House to one or two views of this subject, connected not so much with political economy as with a much more important branch of politics: that which looks to the true foundations of liberty and the probable destiny of this Government.

I am not one of those, sir, who habitually stickle upon mere technical questions of constitutional construction and constitutional power. I believe such questions are not those upon which the safety of the Republic depends. I grant, sir, that Congress has the power to lay duties upon foreign merchandise for purposes other than those of revenue. These duties may be legitimately laid for the regulation of foreign commerce. But, sir, though I admit the power of this Government to the extent just stated, I am prepared to demonstrate that, to attempt any interference with the distribution of domestic capital and domestic labor, by taxing one portion for the benefit of another, under pretence of regulating commerce, is a gross and fraudulent abuse of a constitutional power. A regulation of commerce, to be legitimate, must have reference to our foreign relations and international rights, not to our internal relations and the rights of private property. The importance of this distinction will be at once perceived, if we advert to its bearing upon the great principle of political responsibility. Wherever the interest involved is a general interest—such, for example, as foreign commerce, and the public safety—the States, if permitted to interfere with it, would act without responsibility. The interest of the whole would be subjected to the irresponsible action of a part. In like manner, wherever the interest involved is a local interest, such, for example, as the interest of the cotton grower, this Government, assuming to act upon it, acts without responsibility. (Of what consequence is it, that the cotton States have some fifty or sixty representatives, in a body composed of two hundred and thirteen? Who are they, that are about to pass this tariff dooming our fields to desolation? Have they any community of interest or of sympathy with the cotton growers? On the contrary, are they not stimulated by the hope, (false and delusive, I grant you,) that their prosperity is to be reared upon our ruins? The interest of the cotton grower is essentially dependent on foreign commerce. The free and unrestricted enjoyment of that commerce, is a natural and political right of the most sacred character, and which nothing but the highest public emergency could justify this Government even in suspending. And yet, sir, without even the pretence of any motive connected with the defence of our national rights or honor, in a time of peace and harmony with the whole world, the Representatives of the other States are about to pass a law, notoriously destructive of the rights and interests of the cotton States. (What nonsense would it be to talk of Representative responsibility, when those who destroy our prosperity believe it to be their interest, and (if that be possible) their right and duty to destroy that prosperity? If, sir, as the advocates of this tariff allege, it is the interest of two-thirds of this Union, to destroy the prosperity of the other third, by cutting off the only means of that prosperity, would it be possible for that other third to submit to a practical interpretation of the compact of union, by which the right of the two-thirds would be recognized to destroy the other? This species of Government interference with the rights of private property, would be unjust and tyrannical, even in a local Government extending over a homogeneous population, and over interests equally and generally diffused over the whole geographical surface; but, in a Federal Government, extending over various sectional interests, it is utterly intolerable.)

Sir, if the union of these States shall ever be severed and their liberties subverted, the historian who records these disasters will have to ascribe them to measures of this description. I do sincerely believe that neither this Government, nor any free Government, can exist for a quarter of a century, under such a system of legislation. Its inevitable tendency is to corrupt, not only the public functionaries, but all those portions of the Union and classes of society who have an interest, real or imaginary, in the bounties it provides, by taxing other sections and other classes. What, sir, is the essential characteristic of a freeman? It is that independence which results from an habitual reliance upon his own resources and his own labor for his support. He is not in fact a freeman, who habitually looks to the Government for pecuniary bounties. And I confess that nothing in the conduct of those who are the prominent advocates of this system, has excited more apprehension and alarm, in my mind, than the constant efforts made by all of them, from the Secretary of the Treasury down to the humblest coadjutor, to impress upon the public mind the idea that national prosperity and individual wealth are to be derived, not from individual industry and economy, but from Government bounties. An idea more fatal to liberty could not be inculcated. I said, on another occasion, that the days of Roman liberty were numbered when the people consented to receive bread from the public granaries. From that moment it was not the patriot who had shown the greatest capacity and made the greatest sacrifices to serve the republic, but the demagogue who would promise to distribute most profusely the spoils of the plundered provinces, that was elevated to office by a degenerate and mercenary populace. Every thing became venal, even in the country of Fabricius, until finally the empire itself was sold at public auction! And what, sir, is the nature and tendency of the system we are discussing? It bears an analogy, but too lamentably striking, to that which corrupted the republican purity of the Roman people. God forbid that it should consummate its triumph over the public liberty, by a similar catastrophe, though even that is an event by no means improbable, if we continue to legislate periodically in this way, and to connect the election of our Chief Magistrate with the question of dividing out the spoils of certain States—degraded into Roman provinces—amongst the influential capitalists of the other States of this Union! Sir, when I consider that, by a single act like the present, from five to ten millions of dollars may be transferred annually from one part of the community to another; when I consider the disguise of disinterested patriotism under which the basest and most profligate ambition may perpetrate such an act of injustice and political prostitution, I cannot hesitate, for a moment, to pronounce this very system of indirect bounties, the most stupendous instrument of corruption ever placed in the hands of public functionaries. It brings ambition and avarice and wealth into a combination, which it is fearful to contemplate, because it is almost impossible to resist. Do we not perceive, at this very moment, the extraordinary and melancholy spectacle of less than one hundred thousand capitalists, by means of this unhallowed combination, exercising an absolute and despotic control over the opinions of eight millions of free citizens, and the fortunes and destinies of ten millions? Sir, I will not anticipate or forbode evil. I will not permit myself to believe that the Presidency of the United States will ever be bought and sold, by this system of bounties and prohibitions. But I must say that there are certain quarters of this Union, in which, if a candidate for the Presidency were to come forward with the Harrisburg tariff in his hand, nothing could resist his pretensions, if his adversary were opposed to this unjust system of oppression. Yes, sir, that bill would be a talisman which would give a charmed existence to the candidate who would pledge himself to support it. And although he were covered with all the “multiplying villanies of nature,” the most immaculate patriot and profound statesman in the nation could hold no competition with him, if he should refuse to grant this new species of imperial donative.

Mr. Speaker, such are the disguise and delusion incident to this sort of legislation, that business and treachery are not unlikely to recede the reward appropriate to disinterested patriotism. I believe, for example, that if a man of sufficient prominence to aspire to the Presidency, and representing a people whose interests were to be immolated by this system, would be base and bold enough to make that offering at the shrine of his own ambition, he would find it the most certain and direct avenue to popularity and power. He would be hailed by the whole tariff party as a high-minded statesman and disinterested patriot; and even his own infatuated constituents, the miserable and deluded victims of his treachery, whose very bread he had sold for the purple of power, would not improbably be found in the ranks of his followers, swelling the chorus of his praise. Indeed, sir, when I contemplate the extraordinary infatuation which a combination of capitalists and politicians have had the singular art to diffuse over more than one-half of this Union—when I see the very victims who are about to be offered up to satiate the voracious appetite of this devouring Moloch, paying their ardent and sincere devotions at his bloody shrine; I confess I have been tempted to doubt whether mankind was not doomed, even in its most enlightened state, to be the dupe of some species of imposture, and the victim of some form of tyranny. For, sir, in casting my eye over the history of human idolatry, I can find nothing, even in the darkest ages of ignorance and superstition, which surpasses the infatuation by which a confederated priesthood of politicians and manufacturers have bound the great body of the people in the farming States of this Union, as if by a spell, to this mighty scheme of fraud and delusion. I recollect nothing, sir, that bears so near a resemblance to it, or which furnishes so striking an illustration of this branch of human frailty, as the story—so beautifully told by the Irish poet—of the celebrated Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. This bold impostor came into the world without any of the features which distinguish the human face, an object of disgusting deformity. With the fiendlike purpose of avenging his shame upon the human race, he reared the standard of a new religious dynasty, in opposition to the Caliph. As a means of accomplishing his great imposture, and at the same time concealing his deformity, he covered himself with a silver veil; giving it out to his followers that the heavenly light of his countenance, by which the faithful were to be finally blessed after reaching a certain state of purity, was for the present kept, in mercy, from their sight. Thousands of devoted followers thronged to his standard, looking forward, amidst every disaster, and every disappointment, to that glorious day, when the angel brow of their prophet was to be “uncurtained to their view.” I need not tell you, sir, that this vision of their hopes was never realized. On the contrary, at the very time he was idolized, by the blind devotion of his followers, as a redeeming angel commissioned by Heaven to free the world from sin and bondage, he was daily muttering, in the midst of his pretended orisons, infernal execration against the hated race of human kind, and staining the altars of his demoniac passions with every species of crime and every species of sacrifice. And finally, when enclosed by the beleaguering forces of the Caliph, and surrounded by a "frightful wilderness of death," covered over with his own deluded followers, he selected this as the appropriate scene of a holy festival, at which he was to unveil, to the chosen few of his followers who still survived the successive disasters and disappointments to which he had exposed them, the long-expected splendors of his godlike brow. The board was spread "in splendid mockery;" and after administering to each of these deluded victims a poisonous draught, as a nectar proper for those who were destined for the skies, he raised the awful veil; when behold! his wretched followers, in their very last agonies, shrunk back, as from a loathsome and detestable monster, more foul than hell, more horrible than death.

Such, sir, are the promised blessings of this protecting system; such is the veil which covers its deformity; such are the sacrifices it imposes, even on its own deluded followers; and such, I fear, will be the final consummation of this stupendous scheme of imposture and delusion.

SATURDAY, April 19.

Tariff Bill.

The House proceeded to the orders of the day, viz: the consideration of private bills. On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the private business was postponed, and the Tariff Bill came up for consideration. The motion pending was that of Mr. RANDOLPH, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALEXANDER said: In examining this question, he should not follow the example of gentlemen who had gone before him, in attempting to show that the duty should be laid on the square or the running yard, on molasses or hemp; or that it was the wool grower, and not the manufacturer, who required protection. It was all the same to him. They were alike equally oppressive, destructive of the principles of the constitution, and it mattered not who was the executioner, if he were to be made the victim. He said destructive of the principles of the constitution, because subversive of the ends of its creation; these being "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. He would not say that these terms did, of themselves, convey any power, farther than admonitions to gentlemen who may choose to risk the consequences—beacons, as it were, by which the vessel of State may be safely steered throughout her political voyage. What peace, what happiness, was to be enjoyed under this bill, marked, as it is, with the iron hand of tyranny and oppression throughout? It has any thing else to recommend it to the American people, but "union, justice, and domestic tranquillity," and is a mockery of the terms themselves.

It was well observed by Chief Justice MARSHALL, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in alluding to the causes which led to the separation of the colonies from the mother country, that "the right to regulate commerce, even by the imposition of duties, was not controverted; but the right to impose a duty for the purpose of revenue, produced a war as important, perhaps, in its consequences to the human race, as any the world has ever witnessed." A declaration of this sort should have some weight with gentlemen, as it deserves to be considered in two points of view. While it admits a clear, incontrovertible right in the mother country, to have regulated commerce with the colonies by the imposition of duties, it is a negation of the power for the purposes of revenue; and the very attempt to exert it, produced, in its consequences, the most fatal effects to her—no less than the establishment of their independence. How much more so, then, are the dangers to be apprehended in a republican form of Government, prescribed in its action, with limited powers, when one is exercised, not merely of doubtful authority, but, in the opinion of many, a downright and palpable violation of the constitution itself?

It was not the three-penny tax upon tea, considered as oppressive by the colonies of this country, which led them to resistance and independence; but the principle asserted, to tax them for the purposes of a Government in which they had no participation, and for the benefit of a people with whom they had no common interest. It was not the twenty-shilling ship money tax that was held grievous by the people of England, which Hampden resisted, and finally brought Charles to the block, but the principle involved, the violation of Magna Charta, which secured to every Englishman his liberty, his property, and every thing that was dear and valuable. While speaking thus of the rights of British subjects, I am but vindicating those of the American citizen, and let me not be subjected to the unwarrantable imputation, as my colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) was the other day, of taking sides with aliens and foreigners. What was the case there? A discretionary power, contended for on the part of the crown, to tax the people to any extent, without the consent of Parliament, under the pretext of providing for the general welfare. What is it here? A discretionary power in Congress to tax them to the same extent, with no other restraint than the responsibility which they owe to their constituents. The right of Parliament, in this respect, has never been controverted, but that of the king was, and successfully, too, by the reversal of the attainder of Hampden, which a corrupt bench, in corrupt times, and under the influence of the crown, had not the firmness and independence to resist. But, Mr. A. said, he never expected to hear the supremacy, the omnipotence of the Parliament of Great Britain, claimed for the Congress of the United States. If the power be admitted, to the extent contended for by gentlemen, he had no hesitation in saying, that this Government was, to all intents and purposes, a consolidated one; that, so far from being a charter of delegated powers, it was a monarchy in disguise; that it was any thing a majority of Congress might choose to make it. As to the Supreme Court ever declaring a law of Congress unconstitutional, which accumulates power in the Federal head, it was what he never expected to see. When speaking, therefore, of this Government being one with limited powers, he meant something more than "enumerated" merely, which seemed to be the opinion of some gentlemen, unless they were pleased to consider, by the enumeration of powers, the exclusion of all others, not enumerated, which were reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. This was the principle both friends and opponents had in view at the time of its adoption, and upon which the contemporaneous expositions, as well as judicial decisions, profess to have gone ever since. The ninth and tenth amendments to the constitution were made in order to secure it more effectually, and to allay the apprehensions of those who entertained doubts upon the subject. Judge TUCKER, in his commentaries upon Blackstone, who wrote at a time when the principles of the Government were considered as settled, and may, therefore, be relied upon as an authority, after alluding to the clauses restraining the powers given, says: "The sum of all which appears to be, that the powers delegated to the Federal Government are, in all cases, to receive the most strict construction that the instrument will bear, where the rights of a State, or of the people, either collectively or individually, may be drawn in question." It is the only sound doctrine that can obtain, consistently with their interests and safety; because, as all power was originally derived from them, whenever these are likely to be affected by the usurpation of powers, or by the exercise of doubtful ones, the idea of a liberal or enlarged construction should be excluded. Chief Justice MARSHALL, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, lays down the rule, as generally conceded, that "the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is primary as to those objects," with no other limitations than those prescribed in the constitution. It is then an instrument, not merely of enumerated, but of limited powers; by which I mean, powers expressly confined to specified objects, sometimes general in their character, at others restrained in the manner of their exercise. This view is more strongly confirmed by the Federalist, which admits, in unqualified terms, "that the States will retain all pre-existing authorities, which may not be exclusively delegated to the Federal head."

When gentlemen, therefore, speak of precedents, let them go back to fundamental principles, to constitutional authorities, and not abide the decisions of legislative enactments merely. There are occasions when it would be as unwise in Congress to execute powers that are given, as it would be dangerous to attempt the exercise of those which are prohibited, or of a doubtful character. There are cases which neither the decision of this House, of Congress, nor of the Supreme Court in the bargain, can ever determine, but must be left to the high contracting parties—the States themselves—to settle, peaceably, if they can, but forcibly, never! There is no umpire between them and their rights. Forbearance, justice, a mutual respect for the authorities of each other, can alone be appealed to, to reconcile conflicting interests. When these ends fail, and it becomes necessary to apply force, after destroying the moral energies of the people, to execute your laws, that moment is this Union at an end—dissolved into its original elements!

Mr. A. said he did not mean to blink the question, but to meet it fairly and openly, and, if he could, to vindicate the violated purity of the constitution. He knew that it was unfashionable to speak of the constitution here, unless it be to get power by implication; that it had become a by-word and reproach, particularly when emanating from the quarter of the country which he represented; and the man who did it, ran the risk of subjecting himself to the gibes, the sneers, the contempt, of some one or other. But he cared not for that. He had a duty to discharge to himself, to those who had sent him here to guard their rights and interests, and he should do it to the best of his abilities, cost what it might, regardless of the opinion of this or that party. Whenever views of this sort were pressed upon the House by any one from that State, it was immediately said that the sceptre had departed from her, and she was now for tying up the hands of the Federal Government. He rejoiced that it had; and, unless it should be used more to the advantage of the people, than when recently held, he trusted it might never return. Virginia was now, where she had always been—against power, contending on the side of the weak, not the strong; and, if she chose to give up her principles—to lie down and worship the Golden Calf—to become a suppliant at the throne of Majesty, as many of the States now were—like the sons of Samuel, who departed from the ways of their father, to go in pursuit of other gods, kings, and monarchies—why, be it so! He should have "no part or lot" in the business: for the day of retribution would come when she would be "scourged with scorpions."

Sir, it is contended that the power to protect domestic manufactures is derived from two clauses in the constitution—"to regulate commerce, and to raise revenue;" neither of which, in my humble judgment, confers it: although one, if clearly shown, would have been sufficient. It is, however, no new opinion, and stands supported by the authority of the present Secretary of State. In alluding to the course which Virginia had pursued in relation to this subject, he took occasion, while on an excursion to the western country during the last summer, to express himself in the following style of derision. Speaking of the opponents of the tariff, he says: "Availing themselves of the irritations and divisions incident to a late contested election, and enlisting under the banners of a distinguished name, they have taken fresh courage, and assail the further progress of our manufactures with renovated vigor. Prior to that event, they had contented themselves with controverting the policy of encouragement; and no statesman in Congress had been seen bold enough seriously to question the right of Congress to afford it. But now the Legislature of a distinguished State, after long deliberation and mature consideration, has solemnly resolved that Congress does not possess the power to counteract foreign legislation by laws of self-preservation. It is delegated by more than one clause in the constitution. Under the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations, we have seen the power exercised to suspend, for long and indefinite periods, commercial intercourse with all nations, and more especially with Great Britain and France. Under another clause, also full and explicit, the power is granted to lay imposts, without limitation as to amount, and has been exercised far beyond the wishes of the friends of the American system to apply it."

Now, sir, it must have been known to that gentleman, who could not have forgotten all that transpired during the session of Congress in 1824, that two of my colleagues, (Mr. RANDOLPH and P. P. BARBOUR,) in the debate on the tariff of that year, expressly contended that it contravened the spirit, if not the letter of the constitution, and was therefore equally a violation of it. Mr. R. said: "I do not stop here, sir, to argue about the constitutionality of this bill; I consider the constitution a dead letter; I consider it to consist, at this time, of the power of the General Government, and the power of the States: that is the constitution. If, under a power to regulate trade, you prevent exportation; if, with the most approved spring-lancets, you draw the last drop of blood from our veins; if, secundem artem, you draw the last shilling from our pockets, what are the checks of the constitution to us? A fig for the constitution!" In another part of his speech, which was in answer to Mr. Clay, he farther observed: "But we are told this is a curious constitution of ours: it is made for foreigners, and not for ourselves; for the protection of foreign, and not of American industry. Sir, this is a curious constitution of ours, (said Mr. R.) and if I were disposed to deny it, I could not succeed. It is an anomaly in itself. It is that supposed impossibility of all writers, from Aristotle to the present day—an imperium in imperio. Nothing like it ever did exist, or possibly ever will, under similar circumstances. It is a constitution consisting of confederated bodies, for certain exterior purposes, and, also, for some interior purposes, but leaving to the State authorities, among a great many powers, the very one which we now propose to exercise: for, if we were now passing a revenue bill, a bill the object of which were to raise revenue, however much I should deny the policy, and however I could demonstrate the futility of the plan, I still should deem it to be a constitutional bill; a bill passed to carry, bona fide, into effect, a provision of the constitution, but a bill passed with short-sighted views. But this is no such bill. It is a bill, under pretence of regulating commerce, to take money from the pockets of a very large, and, I thank God, contiguous territory, and to put it into other pockets." In reply to Mr. McLANE, he remarked: "It costs me nothing, sir, to say that I very much regret that the zeal which I have not only felt, but cherished, on the subject of laying taxes in a manner which, in my judgment, is inconsistent, not merely with the spirit, but the very letter of the constitution, should have given to my remarks, on this subject, a pungency, which has rendered them disagreeable, and even offensive, to the gentleman from Delaware."

My colleague (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) went more at large into this view of the subject, and showed his decided objection to the bill, upon constitutional grounds. They are presented in a manner too forcible to have escaped observation, and I take leave to refer to them in his own words:

"As far, sir, as this bill is designed to give encouragement to manufactures, or even, if you please, to national industry, in general, I would vote against it, for another strong, and, in my estimation, decisive reason. And here, Mr. Chairman, I am about to derive an argument from the constitution. I trust I shall not press upon the confines of political metaphysics. The constitution gives to Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. This bill proposes to lay and collect duties, and, therefore, I shall not undertake to say that it is a violation of the letter of the constitution. But this I do mean to contend, and I think I shall be able to prove, with as high an approximation to demonstration as moral evidence is capable of, that this bill does violate the spirit of the constitution. The power to impose taxes, duties, &c., it will not be denied by any gentleman, was given to us for the purpose of raising revenue—which revenue is to be applied to the ends pointed out in the constitution. Now, sir, as far as, by this bill, it is proposed to encourage manufactures, or any other department of industry, we shall be using this power, not only not for the purpose for which it was given, but for another, and a different one, and, as I shall attempt to prove, one which will defeat that for which the power was given; and then this question presents itself: whether we do not, in effect, transcend the limits of our legitimate authority, as much by the exercise of a granted power for a purpose for which it was not granted, as by the exercise of a power not granted? I answer, that we do. As no general reasoning strikes the mind as forcibly as examples, I will illustrate my proposition by putting some analogous cases. Congress has power to borrow money. Let us suppose, that the capitalists of this country were, by petition to this House, to complain that, in consequence of the general languor of the commerce of the world, they could find no longer any mercantile investment of their capital, which would yield them any tolerable profit, or, if you please, any profit at all; and, therefore, they called upon us to borrow some millions of money, at any given rate of interest. Let us suppose our finances to be in such a situation as not to need it, and yet, to save these capitalists from sinking, we accepted their proposition under our power to borrow money. Let us suppose that Congress, impressed with a belief that the importation of certain articles of luxury was injurious, either to the wealth, the morals, or the simplicity of the manners of our people, with a view to arrest the importation of such articles, imposes very high duties, not at all with a view to revenue, but for the avowed purpose of prohibition, and high enough to produce that effect; and that this was done under the power to lay duties and excises, by which, in effect, we should pass sumptuary laws. I could go on, sir, multiplying examples of this kind, with much more ease than they could be answered. These are sufficient for my purpose. In each of the cases which I have here put, it might be affirmed, with just as much propriety as in the present, that we were exercising powers which were clearly given; yet, every man would admit that we were abusing those powers. And why, sir? For the simple reason that we were using them for purposes for which they were not granted; and let me ask, sir, whether the same objection does not apply here? If, as must be admitted, the power to lay duties were given solely to raise revenue, surely when we apply that power, not for that purpose, but for another, and that, too, which defeats the legitimate one, we are exercising that power for a purpose for which it was not granted."

Such were the opinions of these gentlemen on that occasion, and whether they deserve to rank as statesmen, I leave for the American people to determine.

I know it may be said, that no duty upon imports has been, or can be laid, but must protect, in some degree, domestic manufactures; and hence is argued its constitutionality. But, I take it, there is a wide difference, in a moral point of view, between the direct and consequential operation of a power. Congress has power to declare war, but it is presumed it will be done for some justifiable cause, known to the law of nations. The effect, and consequent measures thereupon, would be, to protect domestic manufactures. Yet, will any one pretend that it is a good or justifiable cause, in virtue of the constitution, to go to war for that purpose? And still, I think, there is as strong, if not a stronger reason for it, than in the present case; because the power of declaring war is given generally, without restriction, save the common sense of mankind, and the common law of the world. Again: Congress can, under particular circumstances, declare a non-intercourse, lay an embargo, as an act of retaliation—a war measure—I take it, preparatory to such a state of things, or as a security against it. But surely not with the view to regulate, when it would be to destroy commerce altogether; much less to foster and protect domestic manufactures; although in its consequences it would have that effect. And yet, why not, if the arguments of gentlemen be correct? No one, in his senses, will contend, that Congress, in time of profound peace, can, constitutionally, cut off all intercourse with foreign powers, under the idea of regulating commerce, which pre-supposes its existence. Still, the extent of the argument goes that far. It is one thing to regulate; it is another to destroy. The effect of regulation may prove destruction, but the purpose for which it is done, must be a legitimate one. It is mistaking a power for its effect, its consequences, and reasoning accordingly. The protection of domestic manufactures is a substantive power, and not among the enumerated articles in the constitution; on the contrary, it was proposed as one of the powers to be given; but we look for it in vain throughout the instrument; it is nowhere to be found. Among the powers offered to the consideration of the convention, for their adoption, is the following: "To establish public institutions, rewards, and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trades, and manufactures." This view is further supported by the Federalist, in No. 84, considering it a subject belonging exclusively to State regulation. In speaking of the revenue power, for national purposes, Mr. HAMILTON says: "The expenses arising from those institutions which relate to the mere domestic police of a State, to the support of its legislative, executive, and judiciary departments, with their different appendages, and to the encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, (which will comprehend almost all the objects of State expenditure,) are insignificant, in comparison with those which relate to the national defence." These are authorities for gentlemen, such as I am disposed to respect, because they show the intention of those who framed the constitution, and are not founded upon acts of legislation merely, which may be the circumstance of caprice, of interest, of party views, adopted without due deliberation, or a proper regard to the principles of the constitution.

With these evidences before my eyes, I should consider myself as having forfeited every obligation to the constitution, were I to disregard its commands, and most obvious meaning. We are not permitted, in the face of such facts, to entertain opinions, where all doubts are removed upon the subject. And, if gentlemen deem the encouragement of the domestic industry of the country an object of such high importance, let it be done consistently with the provisions of the constitution, by such States as may desire it, obtaining, in the first place, the consent of Congress to lay duties on imports and exports, where the burdens would be felt by those who wish the benefits. I might, moreover, answer the question, and say, of this, as of all other measures presented to the consideration of Congress, that its power can extend to them for national purposes alone; and, by national, I mean Federal, since it was a term repudiated by the convention, and United States substituted in its stead. And this is the rule laid down by Chief Justice MARSHALL, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, to which I subscribe in the fullest extent, when honestly exercised. In speaking of the inspection laws, quarantine laws, the internal commerce of a State, turnpike roads, ferries, &c., admitted to be clearly reserved to the States, he says: "If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose, or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given." Where is to be found the "special purpose," I may ask, for which the power contended for has been granted? Nowhere. How, then, does it become necessary to carry into execution an express power that it can be claimed as an incident? It is not the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, nor among the several States, with which you pretend now to have any thing to do, any more than to lay taxes or duties for the purposes of revenue. A tonnage duty is as much a tax as a duty upon imports. It has, however, never been imposed under the taxing power, (although it may, whenever taxes become necessary, Congress being unlimited as to the manner and subjects of taxation,) but under the power to regulate commerce. And so, where you have power to do a particular thing, it does not follow that you can do a different thing, however remotely connected with it. Nor, that you can resort to different powers, to sustain it by implication; for, there is scarcely any thing but what may be resolvable under one or other of the powers in the constitution, as an incident, by construction.

Sir, if Congress can constitutionally pass this bill, it can assume complete legislation over the subject, incorporate the companies, and do any thing else which may be calculated to promote their interest.

I have, sir, as I intended, considered this subject in one point of view only; I would not deign to place it upon any other ground, nor do I think any gentleman should, who regards the happiness of this Union, or the sacredness of the constitution. If we cannot stand here, as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) said, some days since, we can stand nowhere. And why stop to argue about a cent upon this or that article, as too high or too low, when millions are at stake. No, sir, I will not. I would rather be guillotined at once, than burnt alive at the stake by degrees. Go to prohibition, as some of the friends avow to be their policy, and then the people will understand you. And is there no resistance, no relief from this yoke which is galling to the quick, and bowing you down to the earth? Yes, sir, the States and the people have the remedy in their hands, and if they fail to use it, they will become, as they deserve to be, to all eternity, the slaves of manufacturers, of monopolists, and capitalists, who are willing to risk the peace, the harmony of this Union, and riot in the oppression of the people.

Mr. HAMILTON said: If I have abstained from participating in this discussion, it has not arisen from the absence of a conviction of the utter injustice of the measure which now seems about to pass this House.

I should most unworthily represent the feelings of my own constituents, if I condescended to discuss the detail of the bill before you. We care not by what rule of division or proportion you settle the contribution which you are determined to levy, on the only portion of this Union which is destined not to participate in the booty with which the bill itself is freighted. I have considered, that I should as little consult the interest as the pride of my constituents, by chaffering for a reduction of this or that duty, and in effect telling you that however grossly we deemed the charter of this confederacy violated, yet if you would rob your injustice of a little of its oppression, we would bear your burdens with commendable philosophy and moderation. No, sir, my constituents believe, as a sovereign party to the compact of this Union, that South Carolina never did confer upon this Government the power to tax the industry of her own citizens for the exclusive benefit of the industry of the citizens of the other States. Relying on the truth of this principle, we disdain to impair its strength, by taking refuge under miserable expedients to supplicate your mercy.

If any bill is to pass this House, to cater for an appetite which seems as insatiable as the vulture of antiquity—an appetite which may be fed, but never can be appeased—I trust, that the one on your table is destined to become a law; because, out of the extreme evil, the remedy is to come: that other and larger portions of this Union than the South, will then be made sensible of the injustice of the system, by feeling its severity.

Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I mean to discuss the political economy of this question. No, sir, in an enlightened age, when we appear to have imported a Professor from Germany, in absolute violation of the doctrines of the American system, to lecture upon its lessons—to convict Adam Smith of stupidity, and Ricardo of error, I will not say one syllable upon either the solid truths, or the subtle abstractions of this much-contemned science, more especially in the presence of some statesmen, who seem to glory in their utter ignorance of its principles, as a matter of just and honorable pride.

If, sir, I have neither risen to discuss the general principle or the practical details involved in the bill, or those views of the constitution by which your power to pass it is absolutely denied, you may well ask, for what I have risen. Not, sir, to signalize the thriftless effort of reasoning, when argument has been exhausted though error has not been subdued; not, sir, to combat that mania which has fastened upon the question of how much the poor man is to be taxed for the benefit of the rich—the cunning stratagems of another question, on whom the pelf and power of this Government shall fall—but to enter the firm and unfaltering protest of the freemen I represent, against this whole system of restrictive or prohibitory imposts; which we consider as originating in a radical misconception of the powers of this confederacy, and leading to a ruin no less certain than irreparable, to our interest—interests which are unchangeable as the physical laws of our soil and climate.

Shall I ask you to pause? That is too idle. Shall I ask you to relent? That, indeed, would be vain. But let me entreat you to listen, when I say that this remonstrance comes from a State which, in proportion to her population and the extent of her surface, has of all others in this Union, the richest and most varied staples; which, nevertheless, by the process of a tariff of rapidly increasing and rapidly exhausting high duties, is fast sinking into that condition in which it is no treason to God, if it is to man, to implore him to tell us how it comes to pass, with his bright sun pouring its genial torrent on our plains, quickening into life at once the products of the temperate zone and the fruits of the tropics, that we are growing poor, even amidst the abundance of his blessings? The voice of God is only to be heard in the truths which he reveals. Through these he tells us, that the current of these blessings is turned, by the pernicious hand of Government; that what he makes simple, it is the pride of man to make complicate; what he makes good, it is the selfishness of man to make evil; and that we are sinking by a perversion of those mighty laws of production, which signalize, as first principles, the providence of his beneficence. Let any man look at the State whose humble representative I am, and say that this is not true. With exports that have averaged, for the last thirteen years, at least nine millions of dollars, which ought to have purchased, in the ordinary profits of exchange, at least ten millions of imports, we are nevertheless becoming hourly more impoverished. The solution of our ills is to be found in the operation of Government. If the consumption of our State of articles, paying a duty at your custom-house, is equal to eight millions of dollars, annually, we pay at least, out of these eight millions, two millions in tribute to "your American System." Whilst this tribute is levied in a manner the most burdensome, it brings with it no requiring or redeeming benefit. The moisture extracted from the parched and suffering earth, does not return, in refreshing showers, to pay back, with accumulated blessings, its temporary exaction. No, it is gone forever; and the only miracle to be considered is, that a State, with so small a population as South Carolina, should have been able to pay, since the late war, at least 25 millions of dollars, in the undeniable shape of a bounty to an industry, no part of which is exercised within her own limits.

Sir, the surfeit which this House has had of statistical details, admonishes me of the propriety of abstaining from the financial calculations, which are at hand, to demonstrate this position. An average duty of only 30 per cent., for the last 18 years, on only eight millions of imports, annually consumed in South Carolina, would justify something more than this estimate, which rests on the great principle of political economy, that, in the long run, the imports of a country will be equal to her exports; and although the exact measure of the former is not furnished at the custom-house at Charleston, because a vast proportion—perhaps seven-eighths of the articles thus consumed—come coastwise into our State, and the duties are collected in Boston, New York, or Philadelphia; nevertheless, they are refunded by the consumption of South Carolina. The tax, thus levied, returns to the commercial and manufacturing States, in the shape of a direct bounty.

We have at length reached a crisis from which, in surveying the intolerable evils of the past, they are in no degree mitigated by the prospects of the future. To this system, mis-called American, there seems neither suspension nor limit. The procurement of one exaction wrung from the consumers of the country, only justifies a fresh application, until our whole foreign trade is threatened with utter ruin by the steady march of a bigoted spirit of monopoly, to that point at which it hopes to reach its ultimate reward, in complete and absolute prohibition. In the progress of the curse, we believe a death-blow is aimed at the most valuable of all our staples. We consider that it is only through imports that our cotton is to be purchased; that, deprive us of the foreign market for this prime source of our wealth and comforts, and three-fourths of the amount of this staple must remain on our hands, or cease to be produced; for even the benumbing paralysis of an approaching evil, has not so stultified us that we are not able to perceive that the American manufacturer of cotton, who requires a duty varying from 50 to 120 per cent., to protect him at home, has no means of sustaining a competition on equal terms abroad; and that, in the end, the only market which will be left for the most beneficent and stupendous staple of the South, will be the limited one furnished by the domestic consumption of our country, which scarcely reaches one-fourth of its present production. These apprehensions are justly aggravated by a well-founded conviction of the present and increasing ability of Great Britain to obtain, in those countries in which she will be furnished the only market for the manufactured article, the requisite amount of the raw material. These calamities, we think, you are about to bring upon us by a perversion of the power of taxation, which was wisely limited to the necessities for revenue; and that your scheme of polity violates every just interpretation of what the "general welfare" really is, by sacrificing the interests of more than one-third of the citizens of the United States, in the threatened ruin of three-fourths of the most valuable staples for exports of our whole country.

To say that we see the approach of these evils, and that seeing them we do not feel acutely, would be something worse than the affectation of moderation. Sir, it has produced among our people not only a feeling of deep and settled discontent, but a belief of the total disregard of every thing like justice in a majority acting under either deluded views or injuriously selfish motives. Our discontent has not broken out in violation of the public peace, in combinations to obstruct the execution of the laws, or in the organization of conventions, with the cunning of working by double tides the double purposes of ambition and avarice. No, our people have met peaceably and constitutionally, to petition you in firm, yet respectful language, to stay your injurious hand. Although disregarded, your table groans with the weight of their remonstrances. Do not, however, mistake a lingering hope that you will yet be just, a respectful patience for your decision, for an insensibility to their interest or their wrongs.

Sir, I am incapable of holding out a threat to this House. I would not do it, from policy, even if I were not restrained by the higher considerations of self-respect, and a belief that I should stand rebuked by the public sentiment of my own countrymen, who are themselves too brave not to despise the poor stratagems of sheer bullying. There is, however, surely, no lack of a proper caution, that on my public and private responsibility, I shall say to you, that it is the clearly ascertained "authentic sense of public opinion" in South Carolina, that from an irresistible physical and moral destiny, we consider you are coercing us, to inquire, whether we can afford to belong to a confederacy in which severe restrictions, tending to an ultimate prohibition of foreign commerce, is its established policy? That, whatever may be our religious veneration for this Union, you are compelling us to ask ourselves, when you strike at our bread, to which we owe the highest obligation, the law of God, the law of nature, the law of necessity, or to that of artificial and political association? We tell you, that we love this Union; that we have sacrificed not a little to it, and that nothing but your injustice and unkindness can drive us out of it; that we will bear, and have borne, for its honor and security, more than our share of its burdens; that, with scarcely a single pecuniary interest which was violated by the mother country, we were the first to send our sympathy, and to pledge our lives and fortunes, in the quarrel of that then Roman colony, where the cradle of the revolution was first rocked; that, in our second contest for seven years, the whole industry of our State was palsied by a war, and restrictions worse than war, in which we had not even a remote local concern. We could bear all this, because our tribute was paid to the real honor and solid independence of the country, not to cupidity wearing the mask of patriotism!

The gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE,) in justly and philosophically descanting on the sensitiveness of a free people when wronged by oppressive taxation, told you that a tax of three-pence on tea, produced that mighty revolution, by whose success we have now a right to be here. But the gentleman seemed to shun the irresistible and inseparable moral of his own illustration. I will adopt it. Yes, sir, I will adopt it; because I wish to commit treason against this constitution? No, sir; because it furnishes a lesson of soberness and truth. It is right that the arrogance of power should sometimes be softened by those instructive memorials of humility, which it is the business of history to teach. To be supposed to be weak, and to be the object of injustice, are too often one and the same thing; and I have no doubt, that many sagacious and patriotic stockholders, in some one of the vast corporations which are to be pampered with larger profits by the nourishment of this bill, console themselves in the belief that our presumed weakness supplies an ample indemnity for your oppression. Lord Suffolk, one of the most insulting and arrogant of the persecutors of the colonies during our revolution, said in his place, that "he would not deign to inquire where a Congress of vagrants were to be found;" but as it has been well said, he was very glad soon after to despatch a secretary out of his own office to find these vagrants, without knowing where his own generals were to be discovered, who were sent out to subdue them.

Is this treason, sir? I hope not. I do not design it as even a bare threat. The only lesson I mean to enforce is, that there is sometimes a fatal delusion is speculating too much on the weakness of those whom we intend to oppress. Is it, moreover, treason, sir, to tell you that there is a condition of public feeling throughout the southern part of this Confederacy, which no prudent man will treat with contempt, and no man who loves his country will not desire to see allayed? And have you to be told, "that there are critical moments in the fortunes of all States, when they who are too weak, perhaps, to contribute to your prosperity, are strong enough to complete your ruin?" God forbid, sir, that my language should be mistaken. I neither wish to indulge in disaffection nor insulting defiance; but I should consider myself as treacherous to every obligation which I owe, both to you and to those whom I represent, if I attempted to disguise the united sentiment which animates, with the pulsation of one bosom, a State second to none in this Union, for her elevated national feeling and devoted patriotism.

Let me, sir, before I conclude, say one word to the political friends with whom I am proud to be associated in generous and zealous alliance on another question of great, and only inferior importance to the one before us. I regret, deeply regret, the excitement under which they are acting. Stimulated into a mistaken, but honest zeal, for interests that only require to be let alone to thrive, by the deep designs of an opposing party, they seem to have been hurried on in a sort of rival career with their opponents, of not who should equally adjust the relative interests and wants of our country, but who should feed highest the fever and paroxysms of popular delusion. I have met with but one melancholy parallel to this: which is to be found in the history of one of the most disgraceful acts which stain the statute books of Great Britain. I allude, sir, to the law passed during the reign of King William, against the Catholics. It was known to the Tories that this illustrious monarch was the friend of religious toleration, and that a part of the very army with which he had subdued the last and most infamous of the Stuarts, was composed of Catholics. The Tories therefore introduced this bill, for the purpose of compelling the king, as it has been truly said, either to violate his principles of toleration, or incur the odium of protecting papists. They therefore made it as oppressive and as offensive as possible, that it might be defeated. The then Court party seeing this, returned the bill filled with still greater absurdities and rigors. "And thus," (as one whom we may well call the most philosophic of historians, informs us,) this act, loaded with the double injustice of two parties, neither of whom intended to pass what they hoped the other would be persuaded to reject, went through the legislature contrary to the real wish of all parties; and in this manner, as if playing with balls and counters, made sport of the fortunes and liberties of their fellow-creatures."

It would be alien to the purpose for which I rose, to make a detailed application of the parallelism of this case. I put its moral, however, to the candor and good sense of those who are best acquainted with the history of this tariff, from its first conception at Harrisburg, through all the subsequent stages of its existence, down to the present most inauspicious moment. I will, nevertheless, ask, whether it has not, in fact, been loaded with the double injustice of both parties, and whether a compromise has not been effected, at a point by which each has been relieved from the apprehended odium of its defeat, at the price, however, of making sport with "the fortunes and liberties" of a portion of the people of this Confederacy? I know, sir, that I shall be liable to the charge of seditious violence, in the ethics of those who suffer "under severe fits of moderation," to use the phrase of one who sees far into human things, and expresses well all that he sees. I shall, moreover, be especially obnoxious to the censures of those who are to fatten on the booty that is to be extorted by this bill. Those who are to profit by injustice, are always the exclusive friends of good order, and cherish a virtuous abhorrence of the treasonable complaints of those who are to suffer. That we should bear, without repining, every exaction which cupidity may levy, I have no doubt, in the esteem of some, would be the most sanctimonious oblation we could offer on the shrine of this Union. But, after all, is it wise to push a free people to the extremity of inquiring whether this thing is just, and whether it is right that it should be borne? Our Confederacy was surely not formed for the agitation of such heart-burning and perilous questions.

Sir, one of the great masters of human knowledge, who with a ken little short of the spirit of prophecy, perceived some of the causes of the success of our revolution in the very turn of thinking of our people on the subject of taxation, has told us, that "Liberty inheres in some sensible objects; every nation has formed for itself some favorite point, which, by way of eminence, becomes the criterion of their happiness. It happened that the great contests for freedom, in this country, were, from the earliest times, chiefly upon the question of taxing. It is not easy to make a monopoly of theorems and corollaries. The colonies draw from you, as with their life-blood, these ideas and principles. Their love of liberty is fixed, and attached, on this specific point of taxing." And so, sir, it has continued, down to the present day, in our transit from colonial dependence to sovereign States. This habitual sensibility, which belongs to a free people, you have aroused, by observing no sort of moderation in your objects, until you have fixed the conviction in the public mind, that the difference between "taxation without representation," and taxation with representation, in violation of the spirit if not the letter of the constitution, is too idle, in the abstract, to mitigate the evils which, in practice, are common to both; and, depend upon it, that it will require a more ingenious and talented casuist than even such a man as the pensioned author of "Taxation no Tyranny," to satisfy our people that you are not doing the same thing, in a different form, with the superadded burden of an amount of impost, which never arose even in the imagination of Grenville and of North, to stimulate their cormorant appetite for American revenue; aggravated as all this is, by the irrepressible sentiment, that you are breaking the faith of that equal compact by which this Union can alone hope to live—"the fountain from which its current runs, or bears no life."

Sir, there may be those who are wise enough to despise, and courageous enough to brave, the settled discontent of a people who, at least, believe themselves to be free; and there may live that man, for aught I know, sufficiently base to desire to put one State out of joint, in this Union, by goading, through insult and injury, her people into rebellion, for the pious purpose of sustaining a particular dynasty, and its anointed succession. To the first, let me point to the solemn lessons which history unfolds; to the last, I know not what to say—for his illustrious infamy would deserve something more than the cheap ignominy of a gibbet.

But I trust, sir, that this cup may pass from us: that in our firmness and enlightened patience—not base submission—and in your returning sense of justice, we shall find our remedy and relief: that the spirit of concord and affection may again be breathed into this Union, animating it with the durability of eternal life. But, if an adverse destiny should be ours—if we are doomed to drink "the waters of bitterness," in their utmost woe—if we are doomed under a tyrannous legislation, to be reduced, in effect, again, to a condition of colonial vassalage, by your compelling us to purchase, in one quarter of this Union, all that we may consume, and of selling all that we may procure by the sweat of our brow to the same favored portion, you may rely at least on one thing—that, in a juncture so full of difficulty, South Carolina will be found on the side of those principles, standing firmly, on the very ground which is canonized by that revolution which has made us what we are, and imbued us with the spirit of a free and sovereign people.

Far be it from me, sir, short-sighted and unwise as I am, to indicate the crisis when she ought to act. A more humble office will be mine. It will be sufficient for me to know, that—among the least worthy, but not the least devoted, of her children—where she is, there will I also be, with hostages of an offspring that I love, and with a heart which, I trust, in all due humility, will not falter "when resistance itself becomes a virtue."

Mr. TURNER said: Mr. Speaker, at the time the constitution was formed, that mighty compact, under the authority of which we are now legislating, the great difficulty which presented itself to the convention, and which threatened dissolution more than once to that band of patriots, was the conflicting interest of different States. Each one in his representative capacity, was unwilling to part with any more of that power, which then belonged to separate and independent sovereignties, than was absolutely necessary to form a government. Under this state of things, a system of compromise was formed, which was, under its then construction, rendered sufficiently palatable to be adopted by the whole. Whether such a result could be obtained at this time, with a knowledge of the course which legislation has taken, may be matter of speculation; but I do not hesitate to affirm that it could not. No, sir, could not—unless that construction, for which we now contend, was secured beyond the possibility of a doubt. For with this construction, it was matter of doubt and difficulty with some: without it, it would have been rejected by all the Southern States. Never would they, with a perfect knowledge of the fact, have consented to place themselves under the control of a Government that had the authority, or if having the authority, would exercise it, to impose a tax, that is to operate so unequally on different sections of the Union. But, sir, we are told by gentlemen that we are not prohibited from manufacturing—that we may avail ourselves of all the great advantages that are to flow from this bill: but I will tell them that we are prohibited, not by any law, but by that which is much more powerful than any law, the absolute inability to carry them on. The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) who addressed the House yesterday, was so kind as to point out the superior advantages of the South as a manufacturing country; but I will tell that gentleman after returning him my thanks, that I believe I know something more of this country than he does. We are, sir, deficient in all the great essentials; we have not navigation to any great extent in our interior country; neither have we water power sufficient; and at the falls of our great rivers where such establishments could be formed, there is not health; and we are moreover deficient in that greatest of all essentials, a moneyed capital: besides, we are prohibited even by our prejudices. Agriculturists we are, and agriculturists we must remain, so long as we have a sparse population, and the peculiar species of property we have among us. It is in vain that we may contend against these difficulties, and any attempt to counteract them, will end in ruin and disappointment. We cannot contend with our Northern brethren; and I hesitate not to assert what is already sufficiently well known, and a knowledge of which fact, does not, I fear, render them the less ardent, in urging these measures on the consideration of Congress.

Tariff Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Do not the numerous memorials laid upon our tables protesting against these measures; and emanating from the people themselves; do not the resolutions, passed by our different State Legislatures, speak a language that should be listened to by this House? Even those sections of country more immediately interested in the passage of this bill have not been silent in protesting against it; and it is an evidence of what I believe to be true, that the body of the people in every portion of the United States, if correctly informed, would be opposed to it. We all know with what facility mechanics of every description can combine and concert their plans. They thus have it in their power to give an imposing appearance to any set of measures, and the more powerful and wealthy these individuals are, the more imposing will be their representations. But the poor farmer of the North, the humble planter of the South and West, that class of individuals who constitute the foundation of the wealth of all nations, must submit, for the want of that concert and knowledge which alone could enable them to resist successfully the encroachments, the oppressions of those, whom selfish motives have placed in their way. No doubt, sir, there are many to be found who would accept of my property, or any other man's property, if the strong arm of power should take it from me or him, and give it to them. But, sir, do not the laws afford us protection against this outrage? Would it not be an act too bold even for a despot to perform? Where is the difference between this case and the operations of this bill, if passed into a law? Does it not put its hands, I will not say its unhallowed hands, into the pockets of the planter and consumer generally, to give it to the manufacturer? It might be some consolation to the breast of the patriot, to know that this money, which is taken from the pockets of the poor, was to go to the treasury of the country, to discharge the large national debt, with which we are encumbered; but we have the misfortune to know, that it goes to enrich those who are already the wealthiest of the land. Yes, sir, the effect will be, to make the rich still richer, and the poor, poorer. Let gentlemen disguise it as they may, still it is a tax, and an odious tax, because unequal. And when we have gone as far as prohibition will permit us, and in this it must terminate—for its history proves it, and gentlemen have the honor to avow it—I presume we shall be called upon to pass laws, to increase the consumption of the article; perhaps to bury the dead in woollens, or some such law! And I conceive we have as much right to do this, as to do what has been done,—the general welfare may require it, at least, sir, the welfare of ~~the~~ <sup>our</sup> manufacturers.

This Government was formed for great and noble purposes; it was formed upon the principle, that the people should be able to control their rulers; it was formed for the benefit of the whole; it was not formed for a majority to promote their own views, as their private interest may direct. And, sir, these political schemes, which I conceive to be entirely hostile to our institutions, are doing more to weaken the Union of these States, than any plan that could be devised. Instead of leaving the people to manage their own affairs in their own way, we must administer our medicine most profusely; and God grant that we may not inscribe, on the tomb of our patient, the old Spanish epitaph: "I was well, would be better, here I am." It is but too evident, that both in our General and State Governments, we have too much legislation. Let us pass only those laws that are absolutely necessary, and no more; leave the rest to the people—let nature take its course; this is the correct policy of this Government. For all these fine-spun political schemes, which appear so well in theory, when reduced to practice, nine times in ten bring misery and oppression upon some one portion of the community. Something is left out of the calculation, which was not foreseen—it produces too artificial a state of authority; and the machine ultimately becomes so complicated, that no political juggler, however expert he may be, will be competent to its management. It is upon these principles that I am opposed to all those political measures, which, in a country so extensive as this, where the interest of the people is so diversified, must have a tendency to build up one portion of the community at the expense of the other. For the justice of these remarks, I would instance England, that glorious but unfortunate country, where political legerdemain has been exercised, until their tricks can no longer conceal, that they have brought their country to the brink of national bankruptcy. Yes, sir, that England, and that Ireland, which have been held up to this nation, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEWART) as a pattern for us to imitate. Sir, the idea suggested itself to my mind, of a physician who should advise a young, healthy, and vigorous individual to take his medicine, merely because it had afforded relief and perhaps protracted the existence of a worn-out and infirm old man. The advice is bad enough, but to follow it would be perfect madness. There was another part of the gentleman's argument that struck me as being equally remarkable. He dwelt for some time, and with considerable emphasis, on the fact, that England excludes from the list of her imports, American flour, and urges this, as the most excellent reason why we should, in return, exclude British goods. Yes, sir, England oppresses her subjects for the benefit of her landed aristocracy; therefore we should oppress our citizens for the benefit of our manufacturers; she will not permit her subjects to eat cheap bread; therefore, we should not permit our citizens to wear cheap clothing. This is retaliation, I presume, according to the gentleman's acceptance of the term; but it is a policy, against which, in the name of my constituents, I do most solemnly protest. But even according to the gentleman's own mode of reasoning, upon principles of reciprocity, is it just, is it proper, to exclude English goods, when she takes from us so large a portion of the productions of our soil, our cotton and tobacco, which are almost the only source of revenue to the planter of the South? But this the gentleman considers as nothing, not worth the preservation; and why? Because it is the exclusive production of the South, and some of the Western States; and this is the great secret. Yes, sir, this policy, if persevered in, will make us the Ireland of America. We are to be permitted to drag out a miserable existence, to contribute to the wealth and importance of the North! I will not trust my feelings, to speak on this subject; for, on this floor, it becomes us all to be temperate.

It appears, sir, that we too, like England, must have our schemes; and to render them the more palatable, great names are given—the American System. But gentlemen differ as widely, as to what is the American system, as they do from whence they derive authority from the constitution, to carry on works of internal improvement. One will tell you that this is the American system; another from a different section of the country, will tell us, Oh, no! that this is the American system; while a third will differ from both the others, and present us with what, in his opinion, deserves alone, the name of this great system. Just as the supposed interest of particular portions of country, which gentlemen happen to represent, require, so they speak. What caused the manufacturers of Lyons to exclaim, “Vive l'Empereur,” on the return of the great Napoleon from Elba? Self interest; for they well knew that the presence of Bonaparte would exclude from their country English goods; and that his hostility to England, would never permit their introduction. Yes, sir, it all proceeds from selfish motives; the great American System at last resolves itself into a system of self-interest; and the attempt is made, to render it the more popular, by the influence of a name. Sir, we all know and feel the influence and magic of a name; but the veriest minnow, to whom this bait is thrown, will, I hope, discover too much sagacity to be deceived. The American System! Sir, we disclaim the name; and to denigrate it a system, to use this Government, to promote the views of particular sections of country, would, I presume, be a more correct nomenclature. The true American system consists in the Government not interfering in these matters; in having nothing to do with political schemes, which are calculated alone to promote the interest of comparatively few individuals, and those confined to particular sections of country, at the expense, nay, sir, the ruin, of other portions of the Union.

The flame of this manufacturing mania has been fanned in certain States for political purposes; but the people, among whom there is too much intelligence long to be deceived, will discover that they have no real interest in these measures; even now it is apparent, from the counter memorials laid upon our tables, that a reaction is taking place. Gentlemen will return to their constituents, and tell them much has been done to promote their interest, that they have given them a tariff. No doubt they will greatly rejoice—but will they not inquire, whether these benefits are to extend to every portion of their country? And must not gentlemen, in candor, admit, that it is to operate oppressively on certain parts of the United States, and that the representatives from those States protested against it, and pointed out the evils that will inevitably flow from it, but we conceived it to be a measure to promote your interest, and in accordance with your wishes, and acted accordingly. What should be the reply of a generous and magnanimous people? If I mistake not their character, they will say, take back your legislation; we scorn to be promoted at the expense of a portion of our fellow-citizens. And I address myself more particularly to the West, whose interest is so intimately combined with that of the South; destroy us, deprive us of our foreign market, and that moment you inflict a vital stab on your own interest. And what have we seen on this floor? Northern members voting for a duty on cotton bagging, to promote the interest of the West. This is readily assented to, for the South alone is to be affected by it; but when they are called upon to vote for a duty on molasses and hemp, all too for the benefit of the West, their zeal receives a sudden check! for should these items be retained in the bill, and it should unfortunately be passed into a law, it is likely they will experience some of the great benefits resulting from the American System. Yes, sir, the West must deprive itself of a market for their stock of almost every description, to obtain the incalculable benefit of making cotton bagging, to sell to those who will be too poor to purchase any thing. It would not do, sir, to call this a plan of a certain description, for other States, besides those of New England, have participated in it.

Let us compare the situation of the North, at this time, with the South; and what a contrast is presented to our view. On the one hand, we behold a dense population—the country in a high state of cultivation—her towns and villages rising, as if by the hand of magic; in short, every thing combining to prove that the country is in a great state of prosperity. Can such a representation be made of another portion of the Union? No, sir, a sad reverse is the reality! We have not our flourishing towns and villages; and instead of the South being in a progressive state of improvement, it is on the high road to ruin. And we present the singular spectacle at this time, of one-fourth the population of a State willing to desert their homes, to seek for prosperity elsewhere; and nothing detains them, but the absolute inability to dispose of their property, at almost any price. Those bonds, that nature has thrown around the affections of every one, for his native place, are torn asunder; and the unhappy exile, forced to bid adieu to that home, and that country, which is made dear to him by the unchangeable laws of nature, and of nature's God—by a system of legislation, which, at the time that it inflicts the wound, is kept out of view; yes, sir, I do proclaim, that this indirect mode of taxation is an enigma that the large body of the people do not attempt to solve. At the time he purchases a pound of iron or a bushel of salt, the idea seldom presents itself to the plain, illiterate, but honest and industrious planter, that he is, at that very moment, paying a heavy tax to his Government. He may complain to the merchant of his high prices, but does not often reflect, that his Government forces the merchant to ask these high prices. And were the operations of this system understood by the people, as it is by those who examine these things, I boldly make the assertion, that so far from being engaged in the consideration of a proposition, the object of which is to place new burdens upon the people, we should be more laudably employed in relieving them of those burthens, already almost too heavy to be borne. And is it to be expected, that the manufacturers will ever cease to ask, so long as we shall give? No sir, never! It is sufficient for them that we should give—they will never refuse to receive. I have it from a source, that I value as highly as that from any other, that many of the manufacturers do not wish for any greater protection than they at present enjoy. A higher rate of duties, they justly suppose, will have the effect to throw too much capital in that direction. It is those who are at work on a borrowed capital, chiefly, who come here, and are most clamorous for the aid of Congress. With just the same propriety might an individual procure endorsers, borrow money from a bank, purchase a plantation, stock it, go to work, and then gravely come here, and ask the Government to pay the interest for him. The single fact admitted by the manufacturers themselves, that from the year eighteen hundred and sixteen, ten millions of capital vested in stock of this description, had in twenty four, increased to forty millions, is sufficient to put to flight all their reasoning on this subject. But, even now, when we hear so much of the distressed condition of the manufacturer, we are told that capital is deserting commerce and agriculture to vest itself in manufacturing. Is not this sufficient to convince every unprejudiced mind that it is the best business at this time in the country? Could the Harrisburg recommendations prevail, we should see individuals made rich by the legislation of Congress—for an immediate rise of manufacturing stock would take place; and I cannot suppose that the present holders would be blind to their interest as not to sell out.

Sir, I can compare this recommendation to nothing better than a lottery, and certainly one of the combination order—and like all schemes of this description, the schemers are to draw all the high prizes—or rather to sell the tickets, after the scheme is granted, and walk off with the money.

Yes, sir, I do religiously believe, that owing to the system of legislation pursued by Congress, we are to attribute, in a great measure, the unprecedented depreciation of our property. I know that other, and local causes, have operated towards producing this state of things—I allude, sir, to those moneyed institutions, the evils resulting from which were so eloquently depicted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) whose motion is now pending. These causes combined, have produced a state of things, never before known with us; and I do not doubt, that those, from other slaveholding and consequently agricultural States, will have it in their power, unfortunately, to make similar representations. Then, sir, I will ask, why do those, who already possess most of the advantages flowing from the Union, wish to push things further. Have they not grown into a state of wealth and importance, while the South has remained impoverished? But not satisfied with this state of things, the line which divides our interest must be made still plainer. Pass this bill, and it will be so plainly drawn, that the worst of consequences are to be apprehended. What has caused dissatisfaction, on the part of its citizens, with all Governments? Why, sir, the imposition of unjust taxes; the history of past times will prove this. What caused the separation of these States from the mother country? The attempt only to impose an unjust tax. What was the principal cause of the revolution in France? Unequal taxes. And gentlemen well recollect the insurrection that occurred, even under the administration of our beloved Washington. We should learn wisdom from experience, and beware how we persevere in a system of legislation that may destroy the prospects of this country—that may destroy the hopes of the world. Mr. Speaker, I know it is odious to make allusions of this kind, on this floor—nor is it used as a threat. No, sir, I hope we are far, very far, from anything like disunion; but it is done to impress this House with the opinion, seriously entertained, that if any thing can, the system of legislation pursued by Congress will bring about this catastrophe. I represent those who are devotedly attached to this Union, from motives arising from the noblest principles of our nature—in this, they yield to none; but there is a point beyond which human patience will not endure.

TUESDAY, April 22.

Tariff Bill.

Mr. WRIGHT, of N. Y., moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

H. of R.]

Tariff Bill.

[APRIL, 1838.]

The Speaker put the main question, "Shall this bill pass?" and it was decided by yeas 105, nays 94.

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson of Pennsylvania, Armstrong, Baldwin, Barber of Conn., Barlow, Barnard, Beecher, Belden, Blake, Brown, Buchanan, Buckner, Buck, Bunner, Burges, Chase, Chilton, Clark of New York, Clark of Kentucky, Condict, Coulter, Creighton, Crowninshield, Daniel, Davenport of Ohio, De Graff, Dickinson, Duncan, Dwight, Earl, Findlay, Forward, Fry, Garnsey, Garrow, Green, Harvey, Healy, Hobbie, Hoffman, Hunt, Jennings, Johns, Keese, King, Lawrence, Lecompte, Leffler, Letcher, Little, Lyon, Magee, Mallary, Markell, Martindale, Marvin, Maxwell, McHatten, McKean, McLean, Merwin, Metcalfe, Miller, Miner, Mitchell of Penn., Moore of Ky., Orr, Phelps, Pierson, Ramsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sloane, Smith of Indiana, Stanberry, Stevenson of Pennsylvania, Sterigere, Stewart, Storrs, Stower, Strong, Swann, Swift, Sutherland, Taylor, Thompson of New Jersey, Tracy, Tucker of N. J., Vance, Van Horn, Van Rennselaer, Vinton, Wales, Whipple, Whittlesey, Wickliffe, Wilson of Pa., J. J. Wood, Silas Wood, Woods of Ohio, Woodcock, Wolf, Wright of N. Y., Wright of Ohio, Yancey—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Mass., Allen of Virginia, Alston, Anderson of Maine, Archer, Bailey, P. P. Barbour, Barker, Barringer, Bartlett, Bates of Mass., Bates of Missouri, Bell, Blair, Brent, Bryan, Butman, Cumbreleng, Carson, Carter, Claiborne, Conner, Crockett, Culpeper, Davenport of Virginia, Davis of Mass., Davis of S. C., Desha, Dorsey, Drayton, Everett, Floyd of Georgia, Fort, Gale, Gilmer, Gorham, Gurley, Haile, Hallock, Hall, Hamilton, Haynes, Hodges, Holmes, Ingersoll, Isaacs, Johnson, Kerr, Lea, Livingston, Locke, Long, Lumpkin, Marable, McCoy, McDuffie, McIntire, McKee, Mercer, Mitchell of Tenn., Moore of Alabama, Newton, Nuckolls, Oakley, O'Brien, Owen, Pearce, Plant, Polk, Randolph, Reed, Richardson, Ripley, Rives, Roane, Sawyer, Shepperd, Smyth of Va., Sprague, Taliaferro, Thompson of Georgia, Trezvant, Tucker of South Carolina, Turner, Varnum, Verplanck, Ward, Washington, Weems, Wilde, Williams, Wingate—94.

So the bill was passed.

The question then recurring on the title of the bill, Mr. WILDE moved to amend it by adding the words "and for the encouragement of domestic manufactures."

Mr. RANDOLPH opposed the motion, insisting that domestic manufactures meant those which were carried on in the families of farmers, in the fabrication of what used to be called Virginia cloth; and that the bill, if it had its true name, should be called a bill to rob and plunder nearly one-half of the Union, for the benefit of the residue, &c. Let the friends of the bill christen their own child; he would not stand godfather to it. The title was merely ad captandum vulgus; like the words of the continental money ridiculed in Swift's verses:

"Libertas et natale solum,

Fine words indeed! I wonder where you stole 'em."

The bill referred to manufactures of no sort or kind, but the manufacture of a President of the United States.

Mr. WILDE, after a brief reply, in which he assented to Mr. RANDOLPH's opinion of the bill, but thought the manufactures in the family ought to be called household manufactures, consented to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to amend the title as follows: Strike out all after "An act," and insert "to increase the duties upon certain imports, for the purpose of increasing the profits of certain manufacturers."

Mr. D. after some general remarks on the injurious and unconstitutional character of the bill, stated the main reason for his desiring to amend the title was, that a decision might be had on its constitutionality, by an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on some case which might arise under its operation. This could not be done if the title remained as it now stood. A declaration by the power which enacted the law that it was intended for the protection of certain manufacturers, would bring up the constitutional question whether Congress could increase the duties on imports for such a purpose.

Mr. HODGES moved to amend the amendment of Mr. DRAYTON, by adding to it as follows: "And to transfer the capital and industry of the New England States to other States in the Union."

Whereupon, Mr. BARTLETT moved the previous question on the title.

The House sustained the call: the previous question was put, and carried; and the main question having been put as follows: "Shall this be the title of the bill?" it was carried without a division.

So the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.*

* The debate on this Tariff bill is very much abridged, and without loss to the subject, it being the fourth general debate upon the same question within a few years. The years 1816, 1820, 1824, and 1828, saw its regular recurrence; and as each of these debates took place at the last long session before a presidential election, they were obliged to assume, even if there had been no premeditation to that effect, a political aspect, and to connect themselves with the impending election. Before 1816, the tariffs were discussed simply as business measures, and with very little difference of principle, revenue being then the object, and protection to home industry the incident. In 1816, that principle began to be reversed—protection being made the object, and revenue the incident; and in 1824 and '28, that revival of principle, and the periodical augmenting of duties, and the political aspect which the Tariff had assumed, gave deep discontent to the planting States, on which the burthen of the duties chiefly fell. The speeches of their members exhibit the evidence of this discontent; which, in fact, became pervading, and left a large section of the Union under the painful belief that they were injured and oppressed by this branch of the federal legislation. Considerate men, in other sections of the Union, and who had been friendly to the protective policy, especially when it was considered the protection of household industry, (spinning, weaving, and knitting at home,) began to change their views, gave a reluctant assent to the act

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, moved the consideration of a resolution offered by him some time since, with a view of fixing the day of adjournment; and on the question demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered by the House, stood yeas 112, nays 44.

The resolution was accordingly considered.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of the House of Representatives, to join such committee as the Senate may appoint on their part, to fix on, and recommend a day on which the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn the present session of Congress."

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to amend the resolution, by inserting, after the words on their part, "to consider and report what business is necessary to be acted on at the present session, and."

Mr. TUCKER objected to this amendment, and urged the gentleman from New York not to press it.

Mr. HAMILTON moved the following as an amendment to the amendment: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert "That the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be authorized to close the present session of Congress, by an adjournment of both Houses, on Monday, the 19th of May next."

Mr. H. supported his amendment by a few remarks, expressing his fear that this Congress might be reproached as the long Parliament.

Mr. TAYLOR was opposed to the amendment last offered. He adverted to the great length of time which had been consumed in debate, and the very small amount of business done; and insisted upon the propriety of first knowing how much business required attention before the House fixed the length of time necessary to accomplish it. He concluded his remarks, by demanding the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. DWIGHT briefly advocated the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, on the ground that fixing a day certain would expedite the business of the House.

Mr. MARVIN opposed the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, and advocated that of Mr. TAYLOR. If no regard was to be had to the amount of business to be done, why would not gentlemen adjourn at once, since all were anxious to return to their homes? The House had just passed a bill of a very interesting character, which had occupied it for six or seven weeks—of 1828, and chiefly upon a calculation of justifiable policy; and determined to change their course, and act upon the old principle—(revenue the object, protection the incident)—after the impending presidential election should be over. The return to the old principle, with economy in the public expenditures, it was believed would remove all just cause for discontent in the planting States.

could they expect that its discussion in the other branch of the Legislature would not take some considerable time? So soon as the fate of that bill should be decided, he should be prepared to take steps towards an adjournment, but not before.

Mr. TUCKER said he would accept the amendment of his colleague if he thought it had the least chance of succeeding. He referred to the proceedings formerly had on the same subject, and objected to the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR as likely to lead to difficulty.

Mr. MCCOY advocated the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, observing that more business was usually done at the short than at the long session.

The amendment would leave the House three weeks to apply to business, and he believed, in that time, they might, with diligence, get through with every subject of general importance.

Mr. BARTLETT, after a few previous remarks, suggested a middle course, which he could not now offer as an amendment, being restrained by the rules of the House. It was, that the committee should be confined to the House alone, and not made a joint committee; and should be charged to report both on the amount of business, and on a day of adjournment.

Mr. TUCKER had no objection to the latter part of this amendment, but thought that the former would produce delay.

Mr. POLK was opposed to the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, and in favor of that of Mr. TAYLOR.

The Chair now announced the expiration of the hour allotted to morning business, and proclaimed the orders of the day; when,

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, the orders were postponed, and the debate continued.

Mr. BARBOUR then advocated Mr. HAMILTON's amendment, adverting to the reproach which had been cast upon this Government as being a logocracy. He thought the amendment had an important political bearing. If the House went on, continually enlarging the term of its session, the result would at length be, that no citizens would come to Congress but either those whose wealth relieved them from the necessity of attending to their own business, or those whose business at home was of so little value as to render them desirous of an election to Congress as a pecuniary speculation.

He appealed to the House whether the late tariff bill might not as well have been disposed of in four weeks as in seven. He adverted, by way of contrast, to the practice of the British Parliament, in which the discussion of any one subject rarely extended to the third night. No gentleman supposed that the House could get through all the business on the docket. The bills reported by the committees were continually accumulating, and would do so, even should the House vote its sittings permanent. He sincerely wished that the constitution had fixed the length of both sessions; for he believed the House generally do twice or three times the actual amount of business at their second session, that they do at their first. The excessive prolongation of debate, instead of rendering more certain a correct result, generally operated the other way. When a subject was carefully examined and reported upon by one of the committees, and an argument afterwards had in the House, in which one or two gentlemen on either side presented the leading points in controversy, the House would generally be prepared to act. He referred to the great haste in which bills were usually passed during the last two or three days of the session, and inferred that the House, before the 19th of May, might, if they used diligence, get through the most important bills before them, and those they omitted, would come up, as of course, at the next session.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, after adverting to his personal anxiety to return home, insisted that it was, nevertheless, his duty to forego his own wishes and attend to the public business. Should he plead with his constituents that he had neglected it, because he had business at home, they would never say to him, "well done, good and faithful servant," but would order him into "outer darkness." He referred to his experience in the Legislature of Tennessee, which he insisted was a far more dignified assembly than the House of Representatives had lately shown itself to be—as that Legislature never permitted members to indulge in Billingsgate ribaldry. He thought the best remedy for logocracy would be, for the people to strike from the roll of the House the 150 lawyers, who were eternally babbling. He did not include in that remark the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who was a lawyer of too high an order, to be at all within its scope. He was in favor of the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, and, in supporting it, adverted to the 848 private bills—many of them of vital importance to the claimants, which yet remained upon the calendar. Should they break up, without attending to any of these, they would well deserve the appellation of the "Rump Parliament." He was opposed to the arbitrary designation of a day, without regard to the business which had to be done. He likewise objected to empowering a committee to digest the order in which bills should be taken up. He thought no favoritism ought to be shown, but the order of the calendar rigidly and rapidly pursued. Prior in tempore, prior in jure, was the maxim of the civilians, and ought to be pursued. He concluded with referring to the worn-out soldiers that were knocking at the doors of the House, and whose only hope and resource was in its justice and liberality.

Mr. MARABLE fearing that, if he stayed much longer, he should not get off with whole bones, professed himself anxious to return home, the sickly season approaching; that, having, during this woollen contest, gained nothing, he might be in the way of fleecing. He belonged to the bloody profession, he said, and though he might not be able to look, with as much composure as some others, on blood and carnage, he could contemplate a corpse with calmness. He was, therefore, not much moved by the declining state of the Revolutionary soldiers, just alluded to, some of whom, now at the capitol, informed them that they had walked forty miles a day to get here, which proved their ability to live by labor, without a pension. He believed the chief object for which gentlemen were to be detained here, was the making of a President, &c., &c.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, replied with some warmth to the remarks of Mr. MITCHELL upon babbling lawyers, expressing his indignation that one, who himself belonged to the bar, should rise in this House and slander the whole profession.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he regretted to feel under the necessity of engaging in the debate, but arguments had been advanced by gentlemen that he could not silently acquiesce in. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) to use a homely phrase, placed the cart before the horse, and he hoped it would not be agreed to. Sir, said Mr. W., I am as anxious to return home as any one here. The calls of my family and business require me to leave here; but while I listen to these calls, I cannot disregard the obligation I am under to my constituents. When I agreed to serve the public, I impliedly, at least, contracted with my constituents, to do the public business in preference to my own, and while I recognize the force of this contract, I cannot consent to sacrifice the public interest to considerations of personal convenience, or private concerns. The amendment proposed to fix the 19th of May as the day of adjournment. Why is that day fixed upon? Have you been told that you can accomplish the public business now before the House, by that time? Will any gentleman say it is within our physical or our mental power to accomplish it? I think not. On the 7th of this month, there remained on our calendar, unless I mistake, 255 bills and propositions prepared by our committees. If you add to these, those which have been sent us from the Senate, and those which will yet be received from that body, the whole number of subjects requiring the action of the House, will fall little, if any, short of 400. It is impossible to do all this business with the deliberation that becomes this body, or for members to act understandingly upon it, in the short space of three weeks. Some of it must be left undone if we adjourn within two months. The resolution proposes to inquire how many of these subjects the public good requires should be acted on this session; and in reference to the business before Congress, to fix on the day of adjournment. This is according to the common usage, and is obviously proper. The amendment proposes arbitrarily to fix on the 19th as the day. Has the mover brought his own mind to the conclusion that the business can be done before that time? No. Has he determined which of these subjects shall be acted on, and which postponed? He will not say so. We should make the inquiry, understand the subject, arrange the business, form the best judgment we can of the time required to do what must be done, and then we can promptly fix the day. Sir, we all deprecate the evils attending hasty and inconsiderate legislation. Those who have witnessed the mode of doing business at the close of our sessions, will be at no loss for the cause of the many imperfect and blundering laws we pass, and the frequent calls upon Congress for explanatory acts, to make our legislation intelligible. The gentleman and myself have frequently witnessed bills of great importance, hurried through the forms of legislation amid noise and confusion in which no one could understand the subject before the House, when even a quorum of members were not present. Often when not more than 30 were present, numerous bills passed without a division called, lest it should be discovered there was no quorum; until some bill particularly objectionable to some member induced him to call a division, when a call of the House was commenced, and progressed in till a quorum appeared, then the call was suspended, and perhaps, before the question was taken it was found that members had again retired and left the House without a quorum. If that be called deliberate legislation, I do not desire to witness it. It is discreditable alike to this body and to the nation. If we have business to do, let us do it—sit early and late—all day, until it is accomplished. I am ready to aid gentlemen in this work, and I think, if we are fitted to be here, and are desirous of doing our duty as Representatives, this is the course for us to pursue. Let us do the business, and then go home, and not determine to go at a given time, then get into confusion, and go and leave the business undone. Coercion will never effect deliberate legislation.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) urges you to fix on the day, before you know what is necessary to be done. He has adverted to the mode of doing business in the British Parliament, and has indicated a preference for their method over ours. He deprecates the great desire among members here to engage in debate, and seems to regret that the practice of the British Commons was not adopted here, to decide a question at one or two nights sessions, after a few on each side, the leaders of adverse parties, have delivered their views. I have been acquainted with the gentleman from Virginia for a number of years, and think I do him no more than justice when I say, he would not knowingly advocate any measure whose tendency he thought prejudicial to the liberties of the people; but I think the practice alluded to would if adopted here, sap to the very foundations the principles of a free Representative assembly—the liberties of this people.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, (viz. to fix upon the 19th of May for the day of adjournment,) and decided by yeas 72, nays 118.

Mr. TAYLOR having declined to accept the amendment of Mr. BARTLETT as a modification of his own,

Mr. WARD moved, as an amendment, that the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on the 26th of May.

The amendment of Mr. WARD was rejected, yeas 65, nays 98.

The question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, and decided by yeas and nays in the affirmative.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted, in the words following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of the House of Representatives, to join such committee as the Senate may appoint, on their part, to consider and report what business is necessary to be acted on at the present session, and to fix on and recommend the day on which the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn the present session of Congress.

The committee, on the part of the House, was ordered to consist of seven members.

THURSDAY, April 24.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, on the bill "to amend an act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed 18th April, 1806.

Mr. POLK said the bill, under consideration, proposed to grant to the State of Tennessee, certain vacant refuse lands lying within the limits of that State, to be appropriated to the purposes of education. This grant was not proposed to be made as a donation, but was claimed by Tennessee to supply a deficiency which existed in the common school lands of that State, which by an act of Congress, passed on the 18th day of April, 1806, it was intended to grant to her, but which she had but partially received. It was intended by that act, to place Tennessee on the same footing, in regard to school lands, on which all the new States admitted into the Union have been placed. Owing to peculiar causes, this had not been done. It would, he said, be remembered by the committee, that what is now the State of Tennessee, once constituted a part of the territory of the State of North Carolina; and to enable gentlemen fully to comprehend the nature of the present application, and to satisfy them of the propriety of passing the bill, he would briefly bring to view the prominent acts of legislation, which had taken place, on the subject of land titles in Tennessee down to the present period.

In the year 1789 the State of North Carolina ceded to the Government of the United States all her Western territory, now included within the limits of the State of Tennessee, but in the act of cession, she reserved to herself the right to satisfy in the territory thus ceded, all her military land warrants issued, or to be issued by her, to her officers and soldiers, for their service during the Revolutionary War, and also the right to satisfy all land warrants issued by her to redeem specie certificates, a currency in the nature of Treasury notes, issued by the State, to defray the expenses of the war. The cession was accepted by the United States upon those conditions. The North Carolina claims were therefore a lien upon the ceded territory. In the year 1804, after Tennessee had been admitted into the Union as a free and independent state, a compact was entered into between North Carolina and Tennessee, by the terms of which North Carolina authorized Tennessee, to proceed to have located and granted in the territory within her limits, all the N. Carolina warrants, which then remained unsatisfied, and which by the terms of the cession act, constituted a lien upon it. This compact was sanctioned by Congress, by the act of the 18th of April, 1806. At the time that Congress ratified, and gave assent to the compact between the two States, it was not known what quantity of land warrants remained to be satisfied, but it was believed that it would not consume all the lands fit for cultivation in the State to satisfy them. Under this impression a line was directed to be run across the State, beginning at a point designated on the southern boundary of the State, and running north-westwardly across it. This line was called the Congressional reservation line, and the land warrants were directed to be entered east and north of the line, but provision was at the same time made, that if the country east and north of the line should prove to be insufficient to satisfy all the land warrants, that Congress would thereafter satisfy them south and west of the line. The country east and north of this line constitutes more than two-thirds, and very nearly three-fourths of the State. Congress, in the same act of April 18th, 1806, directed certain lands to be laid off for the use of Colleges and Academies, and provided farther, that the State of Tennessee, in issuing grants and perfecting titles on the military and other land warrants of North Carolina, should locate 640 acres in every six miles square, in the territory east and north of the said line, where existing claims would allow the same, for the use of common schools—to be appropriated for the instruction of children forever. So numerous, however, did the North Carolina land warrants prove to be, that only 22,705 acres of the common school lands were located; whereas, if a 640 acre tract of school land had been located to every six miles square east and north of the line, the number of acres secured to common schools would have been 444,444, so that the State had received for common schools less than was contemplated she would, by 421,739 acres. The North Carolina land warrants not only exhausted all the lands intended for common schools, and all other lands of much value east and north of the line, but a larger number of them still remained unsatisfied. Congress had made provision, as he had already stated, that if the land east and north of the line should not be sufficient to satisfy them, that they should be satisfied south and west of the line. Accordingly, in the year 1818, Congress did make provision for their satisfaction south and west of the line. They have been thus satisfied, and it is for the vacant lands that remain south and west of this line, that Tennessee now asks to supply in part at least, the deficiency in the common school lands east and north of the line, which were contemplated to be granted to her by the act of Congress of 18th April, 1806, but which as he had shown she had not in fact received. The bill proposed to cede to Tennessee, for this purpose, the lands which shall remain vacant south and west of the line, "after the satisfaction of all the bona fide claims of North Carolina," so that if any yet remain unsatisfied, they are provided for.

All the valuable lands south and west of the line had been taken by the North Carolina warrants; and in order to form a just estimate of the true situation, and real value of that which still remained vacant, and which the bill proposed to cede to the State, it was proper to notice for the information of those who had not turned their attention to the land laws of North Carolina and Tennessee, to the manner in which the North Carolina warrants had been located and satisfied. And here it was proper first to observe that the owners of land warrants had been permitted by law to have them divided and subdivided into warrants of small size, so as to be enabled to appropriate them on valuable lands. The North Carolina soldiers were promised land fit for cultivation, and if the division of warrants had not been permitted, the owner of a large warrant might not have been able to find a sufficient quantity of arable land in any one body to satisfy his warrants, but in order to have it satisfied, might have been compelled to include within the bounds of his tract a considerable portion of sterile or barren land of no value. To avoid this, a division of warrants (whether wisely or not it was not now material to inquire) was permitted. The owner of a large warrant was permitted to deposit it with the proper officer to be cancelled, and received the same amount of acres, in warrants of smaller size. The owner of a 5,000 acre warrant, for instance, could deposit it with the proper officer, have it cancelled and receive in lieu of it five 1,000 acre warrants—or fifty 100 acre warrants, or he might, if he chose, have it divided into warrants of still smaller size, and into as many warrants of various sizes as he pleased, so as not to exceed the number of acres of the original warrant that had been cancelled. When the country south and west of the Congressional Reservation line, was rendered subject to the satisfaction of warrants, by the act of Congress of 1818, there were floating and unsatisfied in the hands of the owners, warrants and remnants of warrants of almost every size, from 10 to 5,000 acres, and, in some instances, as small as one acre. The legislature of Tennessee established a Board of Commission to adjudicate on the validity of the warrants, and also established in the district, south and west of the line, land offices, in which entries of land were authorized to be made by the owners of warrants. It was proper likewise to state, that many old grants were issued by North Carolina, as early as the years 1784 and 1785, to owners of warrants, for lands south and west of the line, then in an Indian country. These old grants were of course valid, and the land covered by them was not subject to entry, to satisfy the floating warrants, which were still unsatisfied.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

As soon as provision was made, and land offices were opened in the country south and west of the line, the owners of land warrants went into the country, explored it, and each selected for himself the land that pleased him, and entered it in some one of the land offices, each calling in his entry for some natural or artificial object, a particular point on a given stream for instance, or a point, a given course and distance from some notorious or natural object, as the point of identity for the beginning of his tract, and designating the shape of his survey, by calls for courses and distances, from his point of beginning, so as to include in his tract all the valuable lands he could, and to exclude such as was inferior, or so sterile, that it was of no value. Upon an entry thus made, a grant issued from the State. Many thousands of entries had been made in this manner. All the valuable lands had been thus appropriated.

It would, he said, be readily perceived by the committee, that the lands that still remain vacant did not lie in compact bodies, but in detached parcels, in shapeless scraps of various sizes and figures. In many instances a narrow strip of inferior land was to be found, lying between the lines of two entries, or bordering around tracts that had been entered or granted. In other instances larger bodies of vacant land were to be found, having no regular shape or figure, surrounded in part or in whole by entries made on warrants. It would be perceived likewise that the lands thus remaining vacant were the inferior lands of the country. The Legislature of Tennessee, in their memorial to Congress, had stated, and such was unquestionably the fact, that a great portion of it was sterile, being either swamps, bordering on the creeks and rivers, or barren hills, as not to be worth appropriating at any price; and that twelve and a half cents per acre was a fair average price for that, that would be appropriated at all. Not one acre of it would probably bring the present minimum price of the government lands. The testimony in the possession of the committee, of the surveyors who resided in the country, and had an intimate knowledge of the vacant lands and of their value, clearly proved that much the greater part of the vacant land would not be worth the taxes to be paid on it to the State, and never would be appropriated at any price; and that the part which would be entered lay in small pieces and detached parcels, and would only be appropriated at a reduced price, by the owners of adjoining lands and others, for outlets, timber, &c. From the testimony given by the surveyors, he had made an estimate of the quantity of acres, which would be appropriated at the low price of 12½ cents per acre, and found it would not exceed five hundred thousand acres: a small portion of this amount would bring 25 cents per acre, and none more than 50 cents per acre. The committee would likewise perceive, from what had been stated, that the manner in which the lands in Tennessee had been appropriated for the satisfaction of warrants, was wholly different from that adopted by the United States in the disposition of the public lands of the Government. The country had not been laid off into townships. Owners of warrants had not been compelled to enter lands adjoining section or township lines; they had not been compelled to include the bad land with the good, or to lay out their tracts in regular prescribed sizes and shapes.

Mr. P. said, it must, he thought, be perfectly apparent to every one, that the United States, if she were disposed to do so, never can realize any thing from these vacant remnants of land. It would be scarcely practicable for her to survey and designate the vacant spots, lying as they do in scattered pieces, between and around the lines of entered lands; of various sizes and of all imaginable shapes. The United States never had a land office in the State of Tennessee, and he submitted it to the committee, if one were now established there, and it were practicable to bring these scattered remnants of land into market, whether they would defray the expenses of laying the country off into townships and sections; of surveying the vacant spots, so as to distinguish them from the appropriated lands, and bringing them into market in the manner the United States dispose of all their public lands.

It might then be asked, if this be the case, why does Tennessee desire to obtain them, if they are of no value? Situated as they are, to the United States, can they be of any to Tennessee? The answer was an obvious one. Tennessee had her land offices already established in the country. Her surveyors were in possession of the records of all the appropriated lands; they had an intimate knowledge of what remained vacant. The State would, therefore, without incurring any additional expenses, if the lands were relinquished to her, direct her surveyors, instead of receiving entries on warrants, as they had heretofore done, to receive entries at a low and a fixed price, to be paid into the office at the time of entry by the enterers. In this way the owners of small farms would probably enter the adjoining lands, for the timber, &c. In a few cases, poor persons, residing on these refuse lands, might be enabled to secure homes for themselves and families. Tennessee was pledged, if the land were relinquished to her, to appropriate the proceeds arising from them to the purpose of education.

SATURDAY, April 26.

Case of Richard H. Wilde.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "A bill to authorize the cancelling of a bond therein mentioned."

To this bill, the following amendment was moved by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York:

"Strike out all the bill except the enacting clause, and insert:

"That, for the purpose of refunding to Richard H. Wilde the amount he has expended in the purchase of thirty-nine Africans, parcel of the cargo of the Spanish vessel called the Antelope, or Ramirez, decreed to Cuesta, Manzanel, and Brothers, the sum of $11,700 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; Provided, the said Richard H. Wilde shall deliver to an agent of the Colonization Society, properly authorized to receive the same, the said thirty-nine Africans, or the survivors thereof, to be, by said Society, removed to the colony of Liberia."

The motion of Mr. TAYLOR led to a protracted and warm debate, in which the following gentlemen participated: P. P. BARBOUR, WRIGHT, of Ohio, SPRAGUE, GILMER, TAYLOR, DWIGHT, WEEBES, and MEROER. The question was then taken on the proposed amendment, and negatived; ayes 39, noes 99.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR offered an amendment for the purpose of identifying the bond referred to in the bill, which was adopted.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill with an amendment, in which the House concurred.

Mr. TAYLOR renewed, in the House, the amendment which, as above, he had, without success, proposed in the Committee of the Whole, and required the question thereon to be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was then accordingly put, and the amendment negatived by yeas 51, nays 103.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

MONDAY, April 28.

Case of Richard H. Wilde.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the cancelling of a certain bond therein mentioned," was read the third time as amended.

Mr. WOODCOCK delivered his sentiments at large in opposition to the bill, the practical effect of which, he insisted, would be, to add 39 more to the number of the slaves in the United States. He resisted the argument that the bill was required by motives of benevolence. 1st, on the ground that, if the consequence would be a benefit to the persons concerned, it was not the province of Congress to go hunting into foreign countries, and bring their slaves into the United States to benefit their condition, (and he considered the retaining of foreign slaves, who would otherwise go out of the country, as the same thing;) and 2d, because the laws of slavery in Georgia were more severe and oppressive than even the laws of Cuba, whither they were going: in confirmation of which position, he referred to the law forbidding slaves to be taught to read; forbidding them to marry without the assent of their masters; allowing them to be forcibly separated from their wives and children; and refusing them the power of being emancipated on the payment of their assessed value. He had all confidence in the humanity of the gentleman from Georgia, for whose benefit the bill provides; but he knew not into whose hands these unfortunate beings might afterwards fall.

Mr. FORT briefly explained the reasons from which he should vote against the bill—having ever set his face against increasing the number of slaves within the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT wished to understand the opinion of the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary with regard to two points, which he held to be important: 1st, whether these Africans would be slaves by law, supposing the present bill should not pass? And 2d, whether there was any immediate necessity for a decision?

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR replied, that, in his judgment, they would be slaves by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, whether the bill passed or not. And as to the 2d point, it was true the time for decision had been extended by the Circuit Court of Georgia, but there was some doubt as to the effect and validity of that decree. The time first limited was six months, and that time would very shortly expire. He waived all discussion, and implored the House to consume no more time, but decide promptly by adopting or rejecting the bill.

Mr. CULPEPER said a few words in favor of the bill, which he considered as going to prevent these people from being torn from the connections they had formed here, and being carried away into a still more severe slavery.

Mr. SPRAGUE wished to see the original decree of the Circuit Court of Georgia, that he might know its date, conditions, and effect, as to declaring them slaves. He did not now understand whether the failure of the Spanish claimant to embrace the conditions of the decree, would leave those persons in servitude or not.

Mr. BARBOUR replied, that no papers had been before the Judiciary Committee which they had not laid before the House. The bond itself contained a recital of the decree, on which he was prepared to act.

Mr. SPRAGUE called for a division of the question, and it was accordingly divided, and put first, on simply recommitting the bill, then on recommitting it with the instructions proposed. Both the propositions were negatived, and the question being put on the passage of the bill as amended, it was decided—yeas 92, nays 82.

So the bill was passed and returned to the Senate.

TUESDAY, April 29.

The following resolution yesterday offered by Mr. COULTER, respecting the Affairs between the United States and Brazil, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, (unless, in his opinion, the exigencies of the Government shall require the same to be kept secret,) a copy of the correspondence between our late Chargé des Affaires at the court of Brazil and the Brazilian Government, in relation to the alleged blockade by the naval force of the said Government, of any part of the coast of the Buenos Ayrean Republic, and a copy of the correspondence between the said Chargé des Affaires and his own Government on the same subject. And, also, a copy of the correspondence between our said Chargé des Affaires and the Government of Brazil, in relation to the imprisonment of American citizens. And a copy of any correspondence now on file in relation to the said Chargé des Affaires demanding his passports from the said Government, and the cause thereof, except so far as the same may have been heretofore communicated.

"And, also, that the President be requested to communicate to this House any information that may have been recently received by the Government concerning a paper blockade of the whole coast of the Buenos Ayrean Republic by the Government of Brazil, and the consequent embarrassment to American commerce. And, also, to communicate to this House what measures have been taken by this Government since the late Chargé des Affaires left the Court of Brazil, to countervail the illegal system of blockade attempted to be enforced, and to redress the suffering and losses of American citizens who were navigating the ocean under the protection of the law of nations and the guardian care of this Government."

Mr. EVERETT observed, that he was not sure that he had an insurmountable objection to the adoption of this resolution; he would not, at least, express the positive opinion, that it ought not to pass, till he had heard the explanation of the gentleman who moved it, as to the views which had induced him to bring it forward. But it was his duty, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, to say a word on the subject of the resolution, so far as it covered the same ground with other resolutions, which have been before the House this winter, in reference to this branch of the Foreign Affairs of the country. In answer to a resolution, which Mr. E. himself had had the honor to submit to the House, a communication had some time since been received from the Department of State, containing the correspondence between the Representative of the Brazilian Government and the Secretary of State, on a portion of the subject of the present resolution. That answer, he believed he might say, was satisfactory. The gentleman now asks for information as to the measures which have been adopted by this Government, to procure a redress for the wrongs inflicted on our citizens by persons acting under Brazilian authority. By the communication from the Department of State referred to, it will appear that, after the return of Mr. Raguet, before the Executive Government of the United States would consent to nominate a successor, they received, from the Representative of the Brazilian Government, an official assurance, that full indemnity would be made by the Brazilian Government for any wrong which should be shown to have been done to an American citizen, in his rights or property. This, surely, was all, which, in that stage of the business, could be asked. Having received this assurance, the Executive of the United States, nominated a new Chargé des Affaires to Brazil. It seemed to Mr. E. premature, to ask what he had done to call for his instructions or his proceedings upon them. Mr. E. was not aware of the existence of any reason for supposing that he had not done all that could be done; and that that Government would faithfully redeem its pledge. It was certainly unusual, he might say unexampled, to interpose a call for information, relative to a negotiation, at so early a stage, unless circumstances existed to awaken a suspicion of neglect. If the honorable mover of this resolution would revert to the communication of the Department of State, referred to, he might, perhaps, find it satisfactory, and be induced, at present, not to press his resolution.

Mr. COULTER said he certainly did not offer the resolution now under consideration, without having examined the correspondence between Mr. Rebello, the Brazilian Chargé des Affaires, and the Secretary of State, transmitted to this House, in answer to a call upon the President upon that subject, and to which his attention had been invited by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations. This correspondence (said Mr. C.) does not meet or satisfy any of the inquiries now proposed to be put to the Executive branch of the Government, nor does it give that information to this House and the nation, and without eliciting which, Congress could not adjourn, and be just to the high duties devolved upon it by the existing posture of affairs. The honorable chairman misapprehends my design; or, perhaps, I have not been so fortunate as to point my resolution with sufficient precision to render my views definite. It was not within the scope of my intention to disturb the progress of any pending negotiation, in relation to these topics with the Government of Brazil; or, if such negotiation exists, to impede its progress to a successful issue, by ascertaining at what stage it is now. My object is to know officially what the Executive branch of the Government has done to disembarass the commerce of the country, redress the wrongs of its citizens, and assert the dignity of the Government. If a Representative was despatched to Rio, with all convenient haste, one branch of the inquiry will be answered, and answered to my satisfaction. But the very inducement for making the inquiry, is a belief resting on my mind, that, for one year, we have been unrepresented at the Court of Brazil, during which time flagrant invasions of our neutral rights have been committed by authority of that Government; and the promise given by Mr. Rebello, that justice should be done to our injured citizens, was scarcely filed among our archives, until new and continued oppressions were inflicted upon our citizens. I will state my reasons for this belief. I do not assume to be particularly connected with the mercantile interest of the country, or claim to represent that interest on this floor, further than every gentleman may be supposed to feel concerned for every branch of the population and wealth of the Union. My attention was first attracted to the subject, from an acquaintance, formed years since, with the late Chargé des Affaires, whom I met at this place, and for whose talents and integrity I had, and have, the highest estimation. I felt a strong sympathy for a gentleman thrown into embarrassment by his zeal for the interests of his suffering countrymen, and his devotion to the dignity and honor of his country. Perhaps a mistaken zeal and devotion. But I wished the veil to be removed, and that we might all see the cause of his words and actions. After, however, the Committee of Foreign Relations had given the quietus to his case, and doomed his complaints, real or imaginary, to the rest of oblivion, I felt no more than others, upon a concern, which had, of course, occupied the attention of that committee. Within a few days, however, I saw, in the public papers, a manifesto, or protest, of twenty-seven American shipmasters, and owners of that number of vessels, which are now detained in the port of Monte Video, without having offended against any principle of public or maritime law. As this protest may not have met the eye of every member, I will refer to its general contents.

By a decree of the Emperor, dated in September last, after the pledge given, at this capital, in the Spring, all vessels then in the ports of that province, were compelled to enter into competent bonds, not to sail to any port of the Republic of Buenos Ayres. Thus establishing a paper blockade of the whole coast of that Republic, in its most obnoxious form: for, if a real blockade existed, why the necessity of taking these bonds, that vessels would not do that which they could not do? It would multiply the chance of rapacity. Many of these ships went into this port looking for a market, others were taken for an alleged attempt to elude the blockade of the Buenos Ayrean coast; and others sought the hospitality of the port in distress. A hospitality never violated or refused to the sons of the sea, among civilized nations.

Under such circumstances, the masters and owners published their protest against the infictions thus heaped upon American citizens. It is an appeal to their countrymen at home. As it is not authenticated by, or addressed to, a Representative of the American Government at Brazil, I infer, that, on the day of its date, 11th January, 1828, no such functionary was at the Court of Rio de Janeiro—almost a year after, the late Chargé des Affaires, influenced by a high feeling for indignities offered to his country, had terminated his mission at that court. The first trace I find of the history of the injuries inflicted upon our commerce, by this nation, is a paper, signed by the entire Delegation of the State of Massachusetts, dated February, 1827, shortly after news had reached this country of the war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres, and addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, urging the propriety of sending a considerable Naval force into the adjacent seas, for the purpose of protecting the American commerce which must float there. A similar application was made by the respective Chambers of commerce of Philadelphia and Baltimore.

These persons seemed to have anticipated, with great accuracy, the effects of the rapacity and cupidity, and, I may say, insolence (for I think not a little insolence has been displayed towards this Government) of the Brazilians. In his annual message to Congress, in 1826, the President stated, that our relations with the South American Governments were friendly, and improving, although many of the aggressions were committed before that period, and the alleged blockade of the river La Plata was in force. Commodore Lobo, with parade and menace, bore down upon Capt. Elliott, with a full knowledge of his character, and whilst the American flag was flying. He found, however, that he had mistaken his opponent's character, at least, if not his own. Our Naval Officers are not accustomed to let the character of a service, which their deeds has illustrated, suffer, for want of that manliness and spirit which the nation looks for from them, if not from all who represent its national character.

Affairs with Brazil.

The treatment afforded by this Government to our Chargé d'Affaires was such as to induce him to take a very extraordinary course, rarely met with in the history of Diplomacy. But can we not imagine circumstances that would justify such a step? No individual ought to permit continued indignity to the National Sovereignty of this Republic, in his person. If the course taken by the individual was the effect of an impatient, or fretful temper, at the ill-success of his representations, he could not be approved or justified. The President says, the conduct was not disapproved by him. We are not, therefore, at liberty to presume that it was merely whimsical or capricious. It would, then, be highly satisfactory to this nation to have the means of judging for themselves, whether this novel step, taken by one who represented their dignity, was justified by the occasion or not. On all this subject, we wish for all that light and information, which the archives of our Government can furnish. Because, although it is highly satisfactory to know that the Chief Magistrate did not disapprove of the proceedings of our Envoy, yet the national honor is not repositied exclusively in his bosom. I ask for light, on a matter that may demand the supervisory action of Congress. We know, from the current news of the times, that our Minister was insulted, or conceived himself to be so, by the Government of Brazil: that they attempted to dishonor our national flag; that they have pushed on a system of paper blockade, contrary to the law of nations; taken our merchandise, and maltreated our seamen; and that the cargoes of twenty-seven ships, owned by American citizens, and navigated by American seamen, are now detained, contrary to the law of nations. Have we not, then, a right to know what has been done, to redress these wrongs, by the Executive branch of the Government?

It is curious to observe, that, in the correspondence between Mr. Rebello and the Secretary of State, the first demand of the Brazilian is, that reparation shall be made to his Government, for an insult offered in the sudden departure of Mr. Raguet; that our Government shall disapprove of Mr. Raguet's conduct, in writing, and appoint a successor; who will be received with the respect due to his character. The whole affair is quietly settled, and closed up, before our own unfortunate Minister is heard or seen, although at this very date, and some days before, he had landed at New York. But, alas, notwithstanding the soft words of Mr. Rebello, a constant scene of aggression has been going on ever since upon our commerce. The nation wished to know, officially, what is the state of the controversy; how far the Brazilian Government has advanced her pretensions on the subject of paper blockade, and how far our Government has acceded. It is not only the right of this House, but it is its imperative duty to know, how far our citizens, engaged in commerce, receive that protection from the Government, to secure which, was one of the great ends of the constitution. And it surely does not wear the color of assumption in us, who have contended successfully for the trident with the former mistress of the ocean, to maintain that it shall not be rendered useless or powerless, in our grasp, by one of the new Governments of the South. When man is at home, in the midst of his friends, and surrounded by accustomed scenes, he bears misfortune with firmness. The very consciousness that he treads upon the soil of his country, nerves his resolution, and carries consolation to his bosom. But, when he is in a land of strangers, and seas roll between him and his home, it is then that he looks for protection to the moral greatness and physical power of his Government. It is then he heaves the sigh, when his country forsakes him, and denies that assistance, which it is the first end of all Governments to secure. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. EVERETT replied as follows: I will not attempt, Mr. Speaker, an elaborate answer to the gentleman, on the several topics at which he has glanced. But it is my duty to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and to the House, to make one or two suggestions on the subject. And, first, I must say a word in reply to the remark of the gentleman touching a matter not immediately involved in his resolution. He says, the Committee of Foreign Affairs gave the quietus to the complaints of Mr. Raguet, and doomed them to oblivion. Sir, it is quite a fair account of the proceedings of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, on that subject. How did they give the quietus to Mr. Raguet's complaints? By an ample and decided vindication of his character, touching the subject-matter of those complaints. What were his complaints? They were, that his character had been traduced by a foreign journalist; that, in a gazette, published at Rio de Janeiro, and said (justly for aught I know) to enjoy the confidence of the Brazilian Government, he had been accused of conduct unbecoming a man of probity and honor. What was the quietus which the Committee of Foreign Affairs gave to Mr. Raguet's complaint of these charges? They reported that they believed them unfounded and libellous; without a shadow of truth; that his character was unimpeached; that the Executive Government of his own country had not disapproved his conduct, which they believed had been actuated by honest and patriotic motives; and that the libellous aspersions of an anonymous foreign journalist were beneath the notice of the Congress of the United States. What other quietus could the gentleman wish to be given to a charge against a friend, a constituent, or a fellow-citizen?

With regard to the other and more important point—the expediency of moving the resolution at this time—the gentleman has pursued a fair and parliamentary course. If it can be made out that the Government of the United States is not represented at the Court of Brazil; and if there is a good reason to apprehend that the Executive has neglected his duty to the citizens of the country, suffering in that quarter, it is then unquestionably not merely the right, but the bounden duty of the House, to call the President to account for so strange and gross a neglect. What is the proof which the gentleman adduces of this fact? A protest of the American citizens injuriously detained at Monte Video, by the operation of the Brazilian laws; which protest is addressed to their countrymen at home, and not to any Representative of the American Government, at the Court of Brazil. From this argument, the gentleman infers, that the Government of the United States is unrepresented there, and is not taking the proper measures to procure indemnity to our citizens for the losses they have suffered. Sir, is this a satisfactory argument? It is matter of publicity, that a successor to Mr. Raguet was appointed last year, a gentleman then American Consul at Lima, a remote place, to which intelligence of the appointment would belong in arriving, and from which, also, it would take him a considerable time to reach the place of his destination. He did, however, accept the appointment, and departed for the place of his destination; and I know of no reason to think that the negotiation will not be pursued by him to a successful issue.

The gentleman has referred to a passage in the Message of the President at the opening of the last session of Congress, apparently to support the intimation, that the Executive was indifferent to the illegal course which had been pursued by the Government of Brazil. It is true, that, in the passage in the Message to which the gentleman referred, the President remarks, in general terms, that amicable relations subsisted between the United States and the new American Governments. But, in another passage, in the same Message, the President particularly mentions the unwarrantable principles of blockade, assumed by the Brazilian Government, and the resistance made to those principles by our naval officers; and that Message was accompanied by the correspondence of our naval officers on that station.

The gentleman reverted to the procedure of the late Chargé d'Affaires, in demanding his passports and returning, and had intimated that the people ought to know whether his motives were commendable. But as far as the Executive is concerned, they are (as we are told in the Message at the opening of this session) not disapproved; they are stated to have been, in the judgment of the President, honorable and patriotic. What cause, then, is there to defend, further, what no one impugns? The gentleman said, very truly, the Executive is not the sole depository of the honor of the country. Certainly not, sir, and if ever a case present itself, where the President shall fail to vindicate it, this House is the place where it ought to be, and will be asserted and vindicated. I have no fear that this House will not do its duty. But has not the Executive done its duty too? It is true, as the gentleman states, Mr. Rebello asked of Mr. Clay an expression of disapprobation of Mr. Raguet's conduct, and what was Mr. Clay's answer? Sir, it was in short terms, that Mr. Raguet "was accountable to his own Government, and that only." Nor did the Executive of the United States consent to nominate a successor to Mr. Raguet, till the Representative of the Brazilian Government had given an assurance, not merely that he should be received with the consideration due to his official character, but that indemnity and atonement should be made for past injuries.

[The discussion was here arrested by the expiration of the hour allotted to resolutions.]

Land Claims in Tennessee.

The House then, on motion of Mr. POLK, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same, passed on the 18th of April, 1806.

Mr. LOCKE, after quoting extensively from the report of the committee, examined the testimony which had been given by the surveyors of Tennessee, which, he contended, was not definite, contained mere matter of opinion, and ought to be received with caution, as being, in a great measure, of an ex parte character. He apprehended that the quantity of the land was greater than many gentlemen supposed; and must amount to little, if any thing, short of four millions of acres. He objected to the principle and policy of the bill, and thought it better that the House should defer acting upon it until fuller and more definite evidence should be before them.

Mr. CROCKETT said it was with the greatest diffidence that he rose to address the committee. Did I not (said Mr. C.) consider it due to myself, to my constituents, and to the honorable committee from whom this bill was reported, I can assure you I should not hazard a single remark. But in discharge of my duty to each, I feel myself compelled to submit a statement of such facts as have fallen within my own observation; and for which I am willing to be considered responsible. I am inclined to think that no individual whatever, knows better than myself the situation of the section of country to which the bill under consideration relates. Sure I am, that no gentleman here can understand it so well, as I presume no one has traversed it, or resided there. I, sir, have been a resident within the boundary, for ten years; and, from the nature of my engagements, have had numerous and ample opportunities of becoming perfectly acquainted with its value, as well as its various advantages and disadvantages of soil, climate, and situation.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

Before I proceed to give a general description of the quality of the land, the cession of which is sought by the State of Tennessee, it should be remarked, that the State whose interest I advocate, has a legal claim upon the General Government, for about 420,000 acres of land. When the State of North Carolina ceded to the United States its territory lying within the present limits of the State of Tennessee, it was stipulated, that, in consideration of said grant, the United States should satisfy all the military land warrants for which that State was bound.

The Carolina title being thus extinguished, Congress, by an act passed in 1806, agreed and stipulated with the State of Tennessee, that, in consideration the latter would satisfy the aforesaid warrants, she should be entitled to one full section of land in each township, for the purposes of education. In pursuance of this agreement, Tennessee did satisfy the warrants before spoken of. They were laid upon the best land, often upon but small tracts, discarding such as was unfit for cultivation, leaving none except the refuse land, and that so mutilated, as to present almost every imaginable form and figure. By this means, it was rendered utterly impossible for Congress to comply with the original understanding, or to lay out for Tennessee a full section of land suitable for cultivation, in any one of the townships. It is, sir, from the act of Congress before alluded to, that my calculation is made, relative to the extent of our claim, which yet remains unsatisfied. I say unsatisfied, because we have received, say 20,000 acres, in part discharge of your promise. The obligation, Mr. Chairman, on the part of Congress, was entered into for a most noble and glorious purpose. It was, in the first place, to discharge debts which had for forty years been due to our soldiers; and secondly, to advance the cause of learning, by erecting and dedicating temples, to at least the rudiments of science, in our western wilderness. We do not wish to be viewed in the attitude of beggars, when we ask for the benefits of this bill; no, sir, we ask it not as a donation, we claim it as a matter of right. But I must proceed to speak of the situation and value of the land which we seek to obtain. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LOCKE) estimates its lowest value at 12½ cents per acre. In this estimate, sir, that gentleman is astonishingly wide of the mark. I state it, and upon this subject I speak advisedly, that more perhaps than 200,000 acres of this very land, would not command one cent per acre. It is mountainous and poor, and from a combination of circumstances forbids the idea of its ever being populated. It may be replied, that it must to some extent be valued for its timber. This argument may have some weight with those who have been raised in towns and cities, where timber is not only in demand, but costly; but in the section of country to which I allude, it would have no weight. For, sir, instead of wishing more timber on our land, we would gladly avail ourselves of some invention, to wish a considerable quantity of it off, with less labor. It is useful for one thing, and for one only; it affords us mast for our hogs, and range for our horses and cattle. Before gentlemen arrive at the conclusion that this land is valuable, they should reflect, that since the year 1789, the whole extent has been open, to be culled by such as had warrants to locate, or entries to make. From this circumstance it would be reasonable to conclude, that such parts as were worth locating, had already been settled or secured.

East of the Tennessee River the country is mountainous and rocky, with large tracts of territory, which, as I have before said, never can be settled. True it is, there are streams which run through it, affording narrow bottoms, which are thickly settled; these, however, are beyond your control, being the property of occupants; but on the west side of the river, the face of the country and quality of the soil are different; here you get rid of the rocks, but you enter a poor, barren country, almost as undesirable as the other. In this, as in the upper section, the valuable spots, which are frequently very small, are already located; and it was with a view to secure these, that the size of warrants was varied by law, from 8 to 5,000 acres. The low grounds or bottoms, contiguous to the streams in this western division, are frequently from one to two miles in width; but an important reason why they neither are, nor can be valuable, is found in this, to wit, that they are usually inundated. This I know to be fact personally; having often rowed a canoe from hill to hill. I urge the propriety of this measure, sir, upon another ground; it is, that many of our citizens, who encountered the early fatigues and privations of that country, are still without homes. They had seated themselves upon some little spot, looking forward to the time at which they could make it their own. But they had large families to toil for: the price of land was high, and many of them have seen their little farms, which had afforded bread for their children, taken from them by warrants held in hands more fortunate than their own. To this they have submitted, and submitted without a murmur. But in the midst of their humble submission they have not ceased to look up to Congress as children would to a parent, for assistance and protection. They have fondly looked forward to the period which would enable them, instead of being tenants, to which condition they have been reduced, to become owners of at least some humble spot, on which to labor, and which they could call their own. Why does a man pride in his country? Why does he fight to defend it? It is, sir, because in so doing he fights for his home—for the spot upon which all his affections are fixed—and which stands identified with ten thousand endearing recollections. I cannot be mistaken, Mr. Chairman, when I assert, that to make of your citizen a landholder, you chain down his affections to your soil, and give him a pride and elevation of character, which fires his heart with patriotism, and nerves his arm with strength. These are ends which I wish to accomplish; and particularly in relation to the people whom I represent; for, sir, when your country was invaded, and the flag of its honor insulted, they shouldered their guns and fought in its defence; and, not to pay myself a compliment, I had the honor to fight, side by side, with them.

But the purpose for which this relinquishment is sought, aside from the obligation on the part of the General Government, recommends it to our affections and attention. It is not only to make glad the hearts of the poor, but it is also to educate the poor man's child. It is to snatch from the vale of poverty and obscurity many a youth, and dispel that gloom of ignorance which shrouds him, by inviting him to enter the doors of a respectable country school; for, sir, in that country we have but little to do with colleges. I never, myself, had the good fortune to behold the inside of one, which I trust will plead an apology for the plain and unvarnished manner in which I address you. I am, sir, but a farmer, destitute of those advantages of education which others possess. I thank heaven I know their worth, from having experienced the want of them; and on that account, I am the more anxious to extend them to those who will come after me. I say, emphatically, the measure will benefit the poor, nor am I ashamed to acknowledge that they constitute the very class of your population, among whom I have met many brave and meritorious men; the class upon whom I should delight to bestow a benefit. I heartily coincide in opinion with the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McHATTON,) in his view relative to the importance of reducing the price of public lands throughout the Union. The rich require but little legislation. We should, at least occasionally, legislate for the poor.

Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to go into a discussion of the principles of the act of Congress, upon which this appeal to your justice is bottomed. They have already been explained, and I trust to the satisfaction of the committee. I will content myself with assuring my companions in legislation, that all circumstances considered, they run no risk of making a sacrifice, by the passage of the bill before us. Should we refuse to pass it, we shall display too much of the temper and disposition of the dog in the manger. He could not eat the hay himself—he would not permit the ox to do so.

The expense of surveying, sectionizing, and selling the territory sought, would consume the value of the whole. I speak not at random; for as a candidate I have too often traversed it, to be unacquainted with any material circumstance relative to it. Having, perhaps, already detained the committee too long, I submit the question to their decision, anxiously desiring that the bill may pass.

Mr. BROWN said: The territory of Tennessee belonged originally to the State of North Carolina. That State had issued numerous land-warrants, to be located upon that part of her territory which now constitutes the State of Tennessee. Afterwards, in 1789, North Carolina ceded this part of her territory to the United States, reserving a right to issue grants and perfect titles to satisfy all the claims chargeable upon the territory. This right she continued to exercise until the year 1803. At this time, (Tennessee having been previously admitted into the Union,) a negotiation was instituted between North Carolina and Tennessee, which resulted in a compact, that Tennessee should be vested with authority to issue grants and perfect titles instead of North Carolina. Upon the 18th of April, 1806, Congress, by an act of that date, ratified this compact, so far as to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to lands lying north and east of a certain line in that act described, since called and known by the name of the Congressional Reservation line. By the same act, the United States ceded to the State of Tennessee all the lands lying north and east of this line, requiring, as one of the conditions of the cession, that 640 acres of land, to every six miles square, should, where existing claims would allow of it, be laid off for the use of schools for the instruction of children forever. The act further provided, that if there should not be sufficient lands fit for cultivation, north and east of the line, to satisfy all the outstanding claims, provision should be made by law for satisfying them out of the lands south and west of the line. On the 4th of April, 1818, upon a supposition that the lands north and east of the line were insufficient, an act of Congress was passed, authorizing the outstanding North Carolina claims to be satisfied out of the lands lying south and west of the line. This act was entirely silent upon the subject of school lands. It was now alleged, on the part of Tennessee, that the land warrants which had been extended upon the lands lying north and east of the Congressional Reservation line, were so numerous that but few school tracts could be laid off; and that therefore the lands now asked for should be granted to her, to supply the deficit of school lands promised the State by Congress. But no such promise had ever been made; and no obligation arising out of contract rested upon the United States. The provision in the act of 18th of April, 1806, for locating school lands, instead of implying a promise on the part of the United States, was imposed upon Tennessee as one of the conditions of the cession. Of this any person would be satisfied who would examine the act. And a candid and impartial attention to the terms of that act, and to the history of the transaction connected with it, he believed would satisfy every one who thus examined them, that, when the act was passed, it was believed that the vacant lands lying north and east of the Congressional Reservation line were more than sufficient to satisfy all the outstanding North Carolina claims; and that this was among the reasons why the conditions was imposed. He begged the attention of the committee to the precise terms of the condition. It was in these words: "The State of Tennessee shall, in issuing grants and perfecting titles, locate 640 acres to every six miles square in the territory hereby ceded, where existing claims will allow of the same, which shall be appropriated for the use of schools for the instruction of children forever." But no provision was made for locating school lands elsewhere, provided existing claims would not allow the location of the 640 acres to every six miles square. Such a provision would doubtless have been made if it had been understood that the United States were to make good such deficiency. But there was a provision in the act, inserted out of abundant caution, that if, contrary to what was evidently the expectation, the lands north and east of the line should be insufficient to satisfy all the outstanding North Carolina claims, then, Congress would make provision for satisfying them out of the lands lying south and west of the line. When this provision was made, there would, also, as it appeared to him, have been made provision, in the same manner, for making good any deficiency which might happen in the school lands, if such had been the intention. Again, the act of April 4, 1818, which provided for the satisfaction of the outstanding claims out of the lands lying south and west of the line, was entirely silent upon the subject of the school lands. At the time this act passed, the alleged deficit in these lands was as well known as it is now. And he put it to the gentleman from Tennessee and to the committee to say, whether, if the State of Tennessee had understood that there was promised to her the amount of school lands now claimed, it was possible that those acts would have been passed, without some provision for making good the deficiency in the amount of those lands. It appeared to him the thing was not possible. The idea, then, that there was any such promise on the part of the United States, must have been an after-thought with Tennessee—an inference by way of argument drawn by those who were unacquainted with the original understanding of the parties concerned.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. POLK stated, in reply, that the testimony of the Surveyors was better evidence than that of the Registers would be, because their offices contained the evidence of all the original entries. To repel the idea of a speculation, he said the State would be abundantly content if the deficit of school lands should be made up in any other mode which gentlemen might prefer.

Mr. BROWN rejoined, that, admitting it was so, his objection to the nature of the evidence still existed in its full form; for the estimates of the surveyors and deputy surveyors, to which he had referred, were made, not from an examination of the records of their offices, but from mere conjecture, as would appear from an examination of their letters, extracts from several of which he read.

Mr. McCORY opposed the bill, denying that the United States were under any obligation to cede a foot of school land to the State of Tennessee, at least, not till every warrant issued by the State of North Carolina had been fully satisfied. All that the United States had allowed the Legislature of Tennessee to do on that subject was, to reserve a school lot in every township, when prior locations would admit of it. If those locations took up all the land, then the condition of the grant ceased. If Tennessee asked these lands, the least she could do, was, to indemnify the United States against all warrants hereafter to appear. He referred to the great expense the United States had sustained while Tennessee was a territory, insisted that one great reason for granting school lots, was to aid the sale of the Public Lands.

Mr. LEXA quoted from the act of Congress, in order to correct some inaccuracy in Mr. McCORY's statement.

Mr. VINTON put several queries to Mr. POLK as to the quantity of land lying north and east of the reservation line—the amount of school lands in that part of the State; whether school lands were granted to the State at large, or only to the townships wherein they lay; and whether warrants had not been removed from one side of the line to the other?

Mr. STRONG stated his difficulty in assenting to the bill to be, that North Carolina, who was the original holder of the land, had never released the United States from liability to satisfy her warrants. Until such a release were given, the United States were bound to see that those warrants were satisfied in Tennessee; and until they were all satisfied, the United States could not give up their lien on the lands.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said: The gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the bill, have declared their readiness to support it, if it can be shown that the General Government is under any obligation to make provision for the support of common schools in Tennessee. This obligation, I think, can be made to appear to the satisfaction of every one. By an express article in the compact, entered into in 1787, between the Congress of the Confederation and the people northwest of the river Ohio, it is stipulated on the part of the Confederation, that "schools and the means of education should forever be encouraged." This generous stipulation in favor of light and knowledge, may have been in pursuance of the conditions upon which Virginia ceded that noble region to the United States, (my researches on this point have not gone so far back,) or it may have been the dictate of the wisdom of those who then had the guidance of our national councils: but whether it was the offspring of the State which gave, or of the Confederation which received, I conceive it cannot be more highly or appropriately commended, than by saying, that it was worthy of a period in which an enlightened love of liberty prevailed over the sordid calculations of wealth. When North Carolina ceded her western territory, now the State of Tennessee, to the United States, she made it an express condition in her act of cession, that the inhabitants of that territory should enjoy "all the privileges, benefits, and advantages" set forth in the ordinance or compact I have already mentioned, one only excepted, not now necessary to be adverted to. That I may not leave the argument exposed to attack on any point, as I proceed I will show that the stipulation in the compact between the Confederation and the inhabitants of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, so far as relates to common schools, was by no means a vague and indefinite promise to do something for the cause of education, without any understanding as to the manner in which it should be done, or the kind and quantum of the provision which should be made. By looking into the proceedings of the Congress of the Confederation, it will be found, that by the ordinance adopted in 1785, for ascertaining the mode of disposing of the public lands northwest of the river Ohio, one section out of every township of six miles square, was directed to be reserved for the maintenance of public schools. We may, therefore, with safety infer, that the compact of 1787, in the article I have quoted, had reference to this specific mode of making provision for the cause of education. This was one of the "benefits and advantages" which North Carolina intended to secure to the inhabitants of the territory she ceded to the United States. Thus, when Congress, in 1790, accepted the cession of North Carolina, upon the terms specified in her act of Assembly, passed in 1789, the faith of the United States became pledged to North Carolina, to the inhabitants of the ceded territory, and to all who should become interested in its soil, that the same provision would be made for the support of common schools in that territory which had been made in the territory northwest of the river Ohio. The question, therefore, of the power of Congress to make donations of the public lands, does not arise upon the present application, nor can the objection be taken, that these lands have been pledged for the payment of the public debt. To avoid all useless cavil, however, upon these points, it may be proper to advert to the fact, that this promise to provide the means of education was an undertaking of precedent obligation on the part of the United States. In no way, therefore, can the claim which the State of Tennessee sets up to these lands be evaded, but by showing that the means of education have already been sufficiently provided, which I believe is not seriously alleged by any one. The inquiry, however, very naturally arises, how it has happened that the State of Tennessee alone, of all the new

States of the South and West, formed out of the territories ceded by any of the old States, has not had the full benefit of the usual provisions for the support of common schools. The answer to this inquiry will be found in the nature of the other conditions with which North Carolina clogged the cession of her western territory, and in the peculiar and extraordinary circumstances under which she had proceeded to appropriate her vacant lands prior to her act of cession in 1790. A brief notice of some of these circumstances will not be without advantage, in satisfying the committee of the probable value and extent of the lands owned by the United States in Tennessee; and further to show that exact and precise information upon these points, is not, and can never be, within the reach of Congress at any reasonable cost.

North Carolina had promised bounties in lands to the officers and soldiers of her line in the war of the revolution. She had contracted other debts to a large amount, in prosecuting the same glorious controversy. For the satisfaction of the claims of her officers and soldiers, she laid off what was called the military district, many hundred miles removed from any dense population. She, about the same time, opened offices for the sale of the residue of her vacant lands, embraced in a territory extending east and west four or five hundred miles, without any regular plan or design. The plan of laying off the country into ranges, townships, and sections, was not thought of, and if such plan had been ever so well matured, it would have been impracticable, by reason of the exposed condition of the country. The military district was laid off under the protection of a strong military guard, and this being accomplished, the soldier and the citizen went forth into the heart of the wilderness, in small parties, or alone, as prudence or interest dictated, and at the hazard of their lives each selected the particular spot of earth which pleased his fancy; and if he was so fortunate as to escape the aim of the Indian who waylaid his path, he returned into the settlements, and in the proper office caused a brief description of the land he had selected to be entered. Upon this issued what was called a warrant of survey, which was transferable, and entitled the holder to have the specific quantity of land called for on the face of it, surveyed and granted to him in some part of the country, whether the land originally selected was ever afterwards found or not. As the country advanced in population, various occupant and pre-emption rights were secured by law to the settlers. Other causes of irregularity and uncertainty existed. As no two men would be likely to give a similar description of the same piece of land, it unavoidably happened, in hundreds of instances, that the same piece of land was covered by the entries or incipient claims of many individuals. When the country became accessible to a permanent population, and tribunals were established for the investigation of titles, it was but just that those who lost their lands by the prior claims of others, should be permitted to take lands elsewhere in the same territory. The officers and soldiers too, who had claims for bounties, came forward at irregular and distant periods, and when it was ascertained that the district allotted to them was not of sufficient extent to satisfy their claims, the whole of the residue of the country was thrown open to them likewise. Thus, although the whole of any of the great natural divisions of the territory would not be likely to be appropriated, yet detached, irregular, and shapeless parcels and masses were culled out and set apart in every quarter where good lands presented themselves. Under such a system of appropriation as I have described, and carried on under the circumstances I have mentioned, gentlemen will readily see and acknowledge the monstrous irregularities, uncertainty, and confusion, which must and did attend its operation. Although the law provided, in general terms, that location and surveys should be made in regular right-angled figures, yet, from the causes I have mentioned, one who has any knowledge of the manner in which that country was cut up and parcelled out, would suppose that the law had annexed a penalty to all surveys of regular form and figure, instead of enjoining such form. Such was the condition of the territory; and, subject to the satisfaction of a mass of floating and unsettled claims, of uncertain amount and extent, did Congress accept the cession from North Carolina.

But the evils I have described did not cease here. Congress, by the terms of the cession, had no right to interfere in the appropriation of the vacant lands of the territory, until all the claims with which it was encumbered should be first satisfied. The right to do this, North Carolina reserved to herself exclusively, and without any limit as to the time within which it would be done. This right she continued to exercise in the same irregular manner I have described, not only during the existence of the territorial Government which was established there, but for ten years after Tennessee was admitted into the Union as an incipient member of the Confederacy. Thus the anomaly occurred, of one State, of merely co-ordinate sovereignty in every thing else, appointing officers, keeping up offices, and controlling their operation in a sister State, the sole duties and business of which concerned the management and disposition of the soil—that which is of the very essence of sovereignty. What rendered the whole system more complex and embarrassing to the State of Tennessee, was that the United States continued to be the paramount owners of any part of the country which might remain unappropriated after the North Carolina claims should be satisfied. Complaints were heard upon this floor, from the Representatives of other States, that in the struggle on the part of North Carolina to secure to her citizens, to whom she had sold lands prior to the cession, the choice of the best lands, wheresoever situated; and a corresponding effort, on the part of Tennessee, to protect her own citizens in their occupant rights, who had pushed their settlements into every corner where the lands invited by their fertility, and which were not interfered with by Indian reservations, the United States were likely to be deprived of every part of the inheritance except barren hills and mountains. Such a state of things could not long exist, without producing serious and dangerous collisions, and, in 1805, to such a height had the opposite feelings and interests of the contending parties blown these elements of strife, that all became sensible of the necessity of adopting some plan better calculated to secure to each the rights respectively set up and insisted upon. The conviction of this necessity produced the compromise which is to be found in the act of Congress of 1806, chap. 81. Congress, by that act, with the consent of North Carolina, conferred upon the State of Tennessee the right to issue grants, and to satisfy the outstanding claims of North Carolina, in her own way; but this power was given to Tennessee upon the express condition, that the country which lies between the Mississippi and Tennessee Rivers, including a considerable tract of country lying east of the Tennessee, as it flows north through the western sections of the State, should not be encroached upon for the satisfaction of the North Carolina claims, until all the country lying east and not included in this reservation, should be first exhausted. This was the first point of time at which the United States acquired any right to interfere in the appropriation of the soil of Tennessee, and Congress availed itself of this right, to comply with the stipulation to provide the means of education, and required the State of Tennessee, as a further condition of the cession which was made to that State by the act of 1806, of all the lands lying east and north of the district I have already described, that six hundred and forty acres should be reserved in every six miles square of the lands ceded by that act for the use of schools. Tennessee, from this time forward, took upon herself the burthen of introducing some order into the plan of making appropriations for the satisfaction of the great variety of claims which had sprung out of the North Carolina system; and from the year 1806 up to this day, one-half—I believe I would not be far wrong, to say two-thirds—of the whole legislation of that State has been employed upon this subject. Her first step was to lay off the country into ranges and sections of six miles square, and to provide that the lands directed to be reserved for the use of schools by the act of Congress, should be set apart for that purpose; but by reason of former appropriations, in an extent of country in which upwards of four hundred thousand acres would have been the proportion of school lands agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress, not more than above thirty-five thousand are reserved. In many large and populous counties, not a single tract was or could be found fit for cultivation, and not already granted.

In 1818, Congress became satisfied that the country lying east and north of the reservation line established by the act of 1806, did not afford vacant lands sufficient for the satisfaction of the North Carolina claims; and by an act passed in that year, the country lying south and west of that line was placed at the disposal of the State of Tennessee, for their final extinguishment. It should not be forgotten, by those who wish to form any thing like a correct estimate of the value and extent of that part of the national domain which lies in Tennessee, that in the only district in which the United States own one foot of land, large appropriations, say of between three and four millions of acres, of the best lands, had been made by North Carolina, under the same irregular system I have before described, prior to the cession of 1790. When this part of the country was again thrown open for the satisfaction of the North Carolina claims, by the act of 1818, it was then but a remnant of a country which once presented the choicest spoils to the grasp of the warrant-holder. But now, since it has been exposed to a second visitation of locators, surveyors, and professed land speculators—with claims in their hands of between one and two millions of acres in amount, and skilled by thirty years of experience in detecting the best lands, wheresoever situated—in the plains, between the spurs of hills and mountains, or upon the margin of creeks and rivers, the residue of tillable lands can neither be considerable in extent nor valuable in quality, and it is this residue which is now asked to be relinquished. In the section of country under consideration, not one acre has been reserved for the use of schools.

In whatever of argument I have advanced in support of the present application, it will be observed that I have placed it upon the ground of right. But independently of any obligation on the part of Congress, to provide for the maintenance of public schools in Tennessee, the relinquishment which is sought may be pressed upon other grounds, addressing themselves equally to the justice of Congress. All that the State of Tennessee has received from the sale of lands heretofore ceded by Congress, in the eastern and middle sections of the State, and all that the most prudent management of her legislature and officers can glean from the sale of the mere scraps of good land, now asked to be ceded to her, would not more than compensate for the protracted and expensive legislation which has attended the settlement and satisfaction of that torrent of claims which has continued to pour in upon her from North Carolina, for the last 20 or 30 years. A million of dollars, paid directly from your Treasury, would be but a poor remuneration for having all the springs of improvement relaxed, and all the sources of her strength diminished and drained, by the most expensive, dilatory, and vexatious litigation, that ever visited its curses upon any people. Sir, if Congress had taken upon itself the management and appropriation of the vacant lands in the territory ceded by North Carolina, as it did of the territory ceded by Virginia, long since would all claim to every inch of the soil of Tennessee have been gladly relinquished: and if no escape could have been effected upon these terms, from the continued calls which would have been made for the interference of Congress, in making new regulations, or revising the old ones, in relation to these lands, an exemption would have been purchased, and purchased cheaply too, by giving an additional uncumbered territory from the great stock of the national domain to be distributed among the hungry and often averse claimants, whose appetite the State of Tennessee seems at length to have allayed, with perhaps one or two exceptions, without going beyond the bounds of her own territory. I am sure, if the federal judiciary had been drawn in to fix the construction of all the laws Congress would have found it necessary to pass in relation to these lands, and to settle all the controversies which would have arisen under them, suitors of every other description and from every other quarter would have been blocked out of that tribunal for a quarter of a century.

WEDNESDAY, April 30.

The resolution, offered on Monday, by Mr. COULTER, of Pennsylvania, came up.

Mr. EVERETT observed, that had he concluded the remarks which he was yesterday making, when the hour appropriated to this kind of business expired, he should probably have expressed his intention to waive his opposition to the passage of the resolution. Although not requiring the information for his own satisfaction, nor deeming the call, in reference to all its objects, wholly regular, yet the doubts suggested by the gentleman who moved the resolution, on the subject of our relations with Brazil, had brought him to the conclusion, that the resolution had better pass, with a view of bringing before the House a full statement of the real posture of our affairs in that quarter, as far as existing negotiations may permit. Before he sat down, he begged leave to correct an error, into which he had inadvertently fallen, in stating the time of the appointment of the present Chargé d'Affaires at the court of Brazil, which was not, of course, during the last session of Congress, inasmuch as Mr. Raguét did not return to this country till three or four months after the close of the session. The error was of no moment to Mr. E.'s course of argument, which was strengthened by thus reducing the time that had elapsed since the appointment of the Chargé d'Affaires; he corrected it merely for the sake of accuracy.

Mr. COULTER, rising in reply, said that he was so much gratified by learning that the gentleman from Massachusetts would assent to the resolution, that he could be contented to waive all further discussion, and would only make an observation or two by way of explanation, which seemed to be called for by the remarks which that gentleman had yesterday addressed to the House. It was far from my intention, said Mr. C., at all to censure the Committee of Foreign Relations on the subject of their report upon the memorial of Condé Ragnet. All I meant to convey was, that I was not quite satisfied with the mode in which they arrived at the conclusion to which they came on that subject. Their report disclosed no facts which could enable them to judge whether his conduct had been proper or otherwise. The committee appeared to have gone solely on the ground that the President of the United States did not disapprove of it. Sir, I am aware, that, under the Governments of Europe, and in England particularly, where the king is the supreme fountain of honor, that all the officers of Government look to his approbation as their highest reward, and appeal to it, in all emergencies, as a full and complete vindication. But, in this country, there resides another sovereign, to whose decision every citizen looks as the highest that can be given. That sovereign is the people of these United States; but their judgment can never be given in an enlightened manner unless they are put in possession of the facts, on which alone it can be made up. But, though I do not censure the committee for their report, yet I think that the officer in question has some reason to be dissatisfied. The President, as the committee truly say, did not disapprove of his conduct; but this is only a negative sort of approbation, and its value cannot but be much impaired by the fact that a person was appointed to succeed him, even before he returned to his country, or had any opportunity in person to give an account of his official conduct. Still, sir, I am free to acknowledge that my judgment, upon such case, can be but of slight consideration indeed when set in opposition to that of the Committee of Foreign Relations; and I well know that this House will be justified, and so will the nation, in taking their opinion, in preference to mine. There is one other observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which I am bound to notice. He stated, if I understand him correctly, that my object appeared to be, to call in question the conduct of the President of the United States in this affair. Sir, that was far from my intention; on the contrary, I only wished to elicit information which might disencumber the reputation of that Department from suspicion or censure, if not deserved. I wished to draw out the whole facts of the case; and, sir, I hope the time will never come when the Executive of this Union shall have his conduct improperly called in question, by a mere inquiry as to what that conduct has been. The gentleman from Massachusetts appears to be confident, that, when all the facts shall be disclosed, no censure will attach to the President. If that proves to be the case, I shall sincerely rejoice, since I never desire to censure any one without the requisite information as to what his conduct has been. As these are topics connected with the reputation of my Government, and through that Government with the reputation of my country, I hope I shall not be considered as having travelled out of the record, either in offering my resolution, or in accompanying it with the remarks which I have made. The resolution was adopted.

THURSDAY, May 1.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Tennessee land bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, after comparing the debate yesterday on the part of the Representatives from Ohio and Tennessee, to a squabble between two sisters as to the comparative value of their patrimony, and expressing his belief, that a further discussion of the bill could lead to no good result, moved that it be laid upon the table.

On this motion, Mr. CONNER asked the yeas and nays, and being taken, they stood—yeas 181, nays 64.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TAYLOR in the chair, and took up the bill "for ascertaining the latitude of the Southern Bend, or extreme of Lake Michigan, and of certain other points, for the purpose, thereafter, of fixing the true northern boundary lines of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois."

Mr. STRONG briefly stated the object and the necessity of this bill. After referring to the controversy which had existed in relation to this boundary line, he stated the ordinance of 1787, by which the southern extremity of Lake Michigan was fixed upon as the point through which a line east and west should be run, separating the northern from the southern sections of the Northwestern Territory. It was, at that time, supposed that such a line running eastward, would cut Lake Erie somewhere between Detroit and the Miami Bay. Several surveys had been made, but they did not agree. He hence inferred the necessity of fixing, with perfect accuracy, the latitude of the south extremity of Lake Michigan; and also, the point where that parallel of latitude would strike Lake Erie. It was also necessary to ascertain where the northern bound of Indiana would cut the Territory of Michigan, and it was of yet more consequence, especially at this time, to determine the true position of the north line of Illinois. That State had been authorized to go as far north on the left bank of Lake Michigan, as 82 degrees, 30 minutes; but very different opinions were held as to the precise point where that parallel would strike the Mississippi River. Yet, this was a point very necessary to be fixed, since that line passed through, or very nearly approached, a district of country full of lead mines, where there were already between six and seven thousand inhabitants, most of them engaged in digging for ore. Emigrants were flocking fast to the spot, and there was reason to believe, that the number this summer would be swelled to twelve thousand. These people were now in a great measure without law, because it was uncertain under what jurisdiction they lay. The land they occupied was claimed on the one side by Illinois, and on the other by Michigan, and much difficulty and embarrassment was experienced in consequence. The bill did not go definitively to compromise the question of jurisdiction, but merely provided means to ascertain the geographical fact as to the true position of this line, for which purpose it provided a commission, furnished with all the necessary apparatus.

Mr. SILAS WOOD, observing that the bill prohibited the use of the magnetic needle in fixing this line, inquired the reason; to which

Mr. STRONG replied, that it had been fully ascertained, and was now conceded, that a perfectly straight line could not be run by the compass, but must be laid on astronomical principles. Various instruments would enable the commissioners to run such a line: either the plane table or the zenith sector, were sufficient for this purpose; but the best of all modes was that of a trigonometrical survey. This was at once the cheapest and the most certain mode, and was liable to no danger from the vicinity of iron beds, &c., which would affect the needle.

Mr. S. then moved a slight amendment, which being agreed to, the bill was laid aside.

Indian Appropriations—Georgia and North Carolina.

The committee proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department.

The first amendment being under consideration, in the words following:

To the end of the following item: "And the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the articles of agreement and cession, entered into on the 24th of April, 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, which sum of money shall be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, to the extinguishment of the claims of the Cherokee Indians, to all the lands which they occupy within the limits of said State."

Add the following: "And to the extinguishment of the claim of the Cherokee Indians to the lands they occupy within the State of North Carolina."

Mr. MCCOY wished for information, as to any obligations under which the United States lay to extinguish the Indian land titles in North Carolina. He wished, also, to know whether the Cherokee Indians in that State were willing to sell their lands?

Mr. CARSON, in reply to these inquiries, went into a full statement of the facts of the case, which are in substance as follows:

During the revolution, the State of North Carolina was engaged in an Indian war, the result of which was a conquest of the Cherokees, and an arrangement by which they were located on certain lands within the State, the possession of which was guaranteed to them for hunting grounds. In 1785, the General Government took into its own hands the entire control of these Indians, (contrary to the express will and protest of the State,) and guaranteed to them possession of the lands they held. In the meanwhile, the land was sold by the State, and a collision arose, which terminated by the Treaty of Holston, in 1791, by which the General Government conveyed to the Indians the fee of their land, and prohibited them from making any treaty concerning it with North Carolina, or any other sovereignty, but the United States alone. Mr. C. concluded that this was an unwarrantable and illegal act, by which an encumbrance was placed upon the State of North Carolina, contrary to her most solemn protest, and the General Government was therefore bound to make good the money which that State was obliged afterwards to pay, in order to extinguish the Indian title, and make good the land to those who had bought it of the State. He dwelt on the liberality which North Carolina had displayed towards the United States, in the cession of all her western territory, (now the State of Tennessee, and then supposed to extend to the Pacific Ocean,) with no other condition than the payment of her Militia Land Warrants.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, the bill on the table, as it passed the House, set apart $50,000 to enable the President of the United States to extinguish the Cherokee claim to all the lands which they occupy within the limits of Georgia, and thereby fulfil a long-delayed obligation on the part of the United States. Now, sir, said Mr. L., the amendment of the Senate proposes, also, to extinguish the Cherokee title to all the lands within the limits of the State of North Carolina—this, too, is to be done out of the sum set apart by this House, for the specific purpose of enabling this Government to fulfil its obligations to the State of Georgia.

Mr. L. said: Sir, while I express a confident hope that this committee will refuse to concur with the Senate in placing North Carolina (on this occasion) upon an equal footing with Georgia—I wish to be distinctly understood, as entertaining none but the kindest feelings towards North Carolina. He said, while he protested against the interest and wishes of North Carolina being attached to the just claims and demands of Georgia, as an unnatural alliance, which would place the wishes and interest of one State upon an equal footing with the just demands and rights of another, he would again repeat, that he entertained all the friendly feelings of a good neighbor to that State. He highly respected her Representatives with whom he was associated here, as well as the people they represented.

MAY, 1838.]

Indian Appropriations—Georgia and North Carolina.

Mr. L. said, as a Representative of the people of Georgia, he felt it to be an imperious duty which devolved on him, upon this and all similar occasions, to vindicate the rights and interests of the State, and not suffer himself to be led astray, by a compromising spirit of condescension to his good neighbors. Mr. L. said, this item of fifty thousand dollars was incorporated in that bill, at his instance, and as the phraseology will show, for the express and sole purpose of extinguishing the Cherokee claims to the lands which they occupy within the limits of Georgia, and thereby satisfy her, and fulfil a contract, which this Government bound itself to perform, more than a quarter of a century ago. The propriety of this appropriation, so far as it relates to Georgia, has, at the present session of Congress, underwent the scrutiny and investigation of two standing committees of this House—was then discussed in Committee of the whole House—and lastly by the House itself; and has been sanctioned by all with a very near approach to unanimity. It was sent in this form to the other branch of the Legislature. It is now returned to us with this amendment, including North Carolina, and that, too, without the subject of extinguishing Indian title within that State being even submitted to the consideration of this House, or any one of its committees. Sir, this is joining together that which should be kept asunder. As well might Tennessee and Alabama propose to be included with Georgia; and thereby further delay the just demands of Georgia, which have so often been a fruitful subject of irritation and conflict between that State and this Government. The claims of Georgia upon this Government to extinguish the Cherokee title, as soon as it can be done on reasonable and peaceable terms, is imperative; and that it may be accomplished upon such terms as I consider reasonable and peaceable, I have strong confidence, if the proper means be resorted to by this Government; but, I am not prepared to concur in the attempt to extinguish the Cherokee title to any lands in the other States, until the compact with Georgia is completed by this Government. This policy of extinguishing the Cherokee title, in the adjoining States, has already thrown the largest portion of the Cherokee population on the territory of Georgia, and has been the principal cause of the disability of this Government to comply with its obligations to Georgia; in this is to be found the want of good faith on the part of this Government.

Mr. Chairman: It is true that I am decidedly in favor of the emigration plan, and believe the Indians can never prosper while they remain in any of the States or Territories of this Union. And I shall never be content until I see them planted in permanent and good homes west of the Mississippi River, and then I would never "leave them nor forsake them," until I made them as comfortable and happy as any township or village in New England. With all due regard to the interest of other States, in which the Cherokees reside, I hope they will not consider me as illiberal, or bearing upon their interests, while I protest against extinguishing the Cherokee title to one acre of land in any of those States, until the demands of Georgia upon this Government be fully and completely complied with, as contained in the compact of 1802.

Should I fail of success in my views, in relation to the emigration of the Indians generally, nevertheless I feel assured that justice may be extended to Georgia, by removing the Indians from her soil, and settling them in the territory which they occupy in other States, where the right of soil is admitted to be in the United States. Yes, sir, this can be done without violence to the rights, interest, and prosperity, of the Cherokee Indians: for I speak advisedly when I state to this committee, that the Cherokee Indians claim lands out of the limits of Georgia sufficient in extent and quality to sustain them in comfort for a century to come.

Mr. Chairman, I consider this amendment of the Senate injurious to the interests of Georgia. I consider it an untimely appendage, calculated, in some degree, to retard the fulfilment of the obligations of this Government to the State of Georgia. I, therefore, with great confidence, look to this committee, and this House, and trust they will refuse to concur with the Senate in their proposed amendment.

Mr. CARSON replied, insisting that the amendment went merely to extend the power of the Commissioners, who should be appointed to treat with the Cherokees, in such a manner that they might include the land in North Carolina, if the Indians there should be willing to sell it. He acknowledged that Georgia had a claim of a specific character—such as no other State could advance; but though North Carolina had not put forward her claim in the land when she ceded her territory, yet it was equally binding on every equitable ground. If she had received her proportion of the general proceeds of the western domain, she would long before have received more than enough to extinguish the whole of the Cherokee title within her bounds.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, thought that this discussion was wholly unnecessary, inasmuch as the Cherokees, who were spread through the four States of North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, when they met in council to make a treaty, neither knew nor cared any thing about our State boundary lines, but considered their own territory as one whole; and if they agreed to dispose of any part of it, would be guided by their own interest in determining what particular portion they would part with. The power of the Commissioners was one thing; and an appropriation for their expenses was another. The treaty would cost no more if the lands ceded lay within twenty States, than if they lay all in one.

Mr. McDUFFIE now stated, that the public business was suffering from delay, and pressed for a speedy decision; whereupon, Messrs. LUMPKIN and CARSON consented to waive any further discussion, and allow the question on the amendment at once to be taken.

Mr. S. WOOD, of New York, denied that the United States were under any obligation to extinguish Indian titles within the limits of any of the States, except Georgia, she having made a compact to that effect when she ceded her lands. In other States, although an officer of the United States was necessarily present to see that no improper advantages were taken of the Indians, and although, perhaps, the United States paid the expenses of the treaty, yet the consideration money was always furnished by the State, and not by the General Government. This was the first instance with which he was acquainted, where such a thing had been demanded or proposed.

Mr. SHEPPARD expressed his regret and surprise, that the amendment under consideration should be met by the opposition of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. LUMPKIN;) for, said Mr. S., though it is true, that North Carolina does not present herself, claiming the extinguishment of the Indian title within her limits, under any express contract, like that which Georgia rightfully sets up; yet, said Mr. S., by a slight consideration of the question, it will appear, that there are strong reasons why North Carolina should share in the benefit proposed to Georgia. Nor, said he, can her claim to a favorable consideration be weakened in the estimation of the committee, because she has not heretofore importuned the nation on this subject, nor disturbed the quiet of the Indians resident within her limits, but towards whom, Mr. S. remarked, that he was proud to say, his State had ever been disposed to act with due regard to the principles of humanity and justice. A strong illustration, said Mr. S., of the truth of this remark will be afforded, when the committee come to consider the farther amendment, which proposes refunding to North Carolina the money paid by her for the extinguishment of the Indian reservations.

North Carolina, said Mr. S., possessing a vast extent of western territory, in the year 1789, ceded it to the General Government, with no other reservation, in her own favor, than the mere privilege or right of satisfying, out of it, the debts due her citizens for military and other services, rendered in the war of the revolution; and even the attainment of this stipulation was, by subsequent events, retarded and embarrassed with many difficulties. Having thus liberally given, North Carolina, said Mr. S., now comes, merely to ask that she may have the honor and benefit of being associated with Georgia in the extinguishment of the remnant of the Indian title within her at present contracted limits; for this, said he, no additional appropriation is asked, nor can the allowance of the request jeopardize, in any way, the just pretensions of Georgia; whilst its rejection may, and in all probability will, lead still farther to increase the burthens already imposed upon her, by the injurious action of the General Government, in relation to this subject. There is no principle, said Mr. S., more fully illustrated by the melancholy history of the aborigines of this country, than that of their persevering adherence to the name and character of tribe or nation. Yea, Mr. Chairman; to this rallying point of distinction they are seen to cleave, when scarce a vestige of national existence remains. Extinguish, then, said Mr. S., the Indian title in Georgia alone, and the natural consequences will be, that those whom you drive from their miserable abode, in that State, will seek to unite with the remnant of their tribe remaining in North Carolina. Mr. S. adverted to the treaties of 1785 and 1791, by which the Government of the United States has bound the nation of the Cherokees to treat with no individual State; and remarked, that, while he was not disposed to condemn that policy which placed the Indian tribes under the exclusive care of the General Government, yet, said Mr. S., it certainly imposes upon that Government the obligation of extinguishing the Indian title to the lands lying within the individual States. He said, that, by the treaties of 1817 and 1819, it was no doubt the intention of the Executive of the United States to have performed this implied obligation, and that the failure to do so was merely attributable to a misapprehension of the western and southern boundary of North Carolina. There yet, said Mr. S., remains a small extent of territory in possession of the Cherokees, unimportant, indeed, in itself, but highly desirable in relation to the integral character of the State. He hoped that this little nook or corner would not be denied to North Carolina—she who had, by the donation already referred to, endowed the General Government with a fertile and extensive region, from which had long since sprung into existence a flourishing and fast populating State—one that does honor to this Union. Mr. S. concluded by expressing his regret that he should have felt it his duty to detain the committee, even for a moment, and that, too, at a time when the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDur-men) had expressed a laudable desire to close the discussion.

Mr. McCoy made some observations in opposition to the principle of the amendment—insisting that New York was put on the same ground with North Carolina, and the same course ought to be pursued towards both. He believed that North Carolina was not suffering any very great inconvenience from the Indians—and he was opposed to the scheme of removing them to the west of the Mississippi.

The question was taken on the first amendment of the Senate, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 55, noes 54.

The question then recurring on the Senate's second amendment, which is in the words following:

"For refunding to the State of North Carolina the amount expended by her in extinguishing the title of certain Indians of the Cherokee tribe, to reservations of land within the limits of said State, granted to them in fee simple, by treaties with the United States in the years 1817 and 1819, the sum of 22,000 dollars."

It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 77, noes 45.

Naturalisation Laws.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved the consideration of the bill "to amend the acts concerning Naturalization."

Mr. B. said he would briefly state the reasons which had induced the Judiciary Committee to report this bill to the House. Under the existing law, an alien cannot be naturalized unless he has resided for five years within the limits of the United States. He must, when he applies to be naturalized, prove his residence by disinterested testimony; his own oath is not allowed for this purpose. In addition, he must exhibit a certificate that he had declared, in a Court of Record, at least two years before his application, that it was his intention to become a citizen, and to renounce his allegiance to the Government from which he came. The bill will not interfere with either of these provisions. The existing laws require, in addition to these provisions, that the alien should produce a certificate that he had gone before a Court of Record, and registered himself; and this certificate is to be the evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States. The act of 23d March, 1816, farther requires that this certificate of registry shall be recited in the certificate of naturalization.

What has been the consequence? By a correct construction of these laws, no alien can be naturalized without a registry. This is the only evidence which the court can legally receive of the time of his arrival. In those cases, therefore, in which this practice prevails, if an alien has been ten years in the country, though his residence were notorious during all that time, still, if he has neglected to register himself, he cannot be naturalized until five years after his first application to the court. This neglect is common, nay, almost universal; because aliens do not know the law, and would not, for some time after their arrival, conform to it, even if they did. But this law, like every other unreasonable one, is evaded. It sets up an arbitrary standard of evidence, to defeat the spirit of its own provisions. The consequence is, that some courts do, and others do not, carry this part of it into execution. In 1824, Congress yielded this provision, so far as to declare, that a certificate of naturalization, theretofore obtained, should be good, notwithstanding it did not recite this registry. The Committee on the Judiciary believed that it would be better at once to dispense with this registry. They thought it would simplify the law.

The second section provides for another class of cases. Every alien who has arrived in this country, since the 14th of April, 1802, must exhibit a certificate of the declaration of his intention to become a citizen, made two years before his application to be naturalized.

It was believed by the committee, that, if an alien could establish, by clear and indifferent testimony, that he had arrived in the country previous to the late war, (viz., the 18th June, 1812,) and continued to reside in it ever since, this condition might, in such case, with propriety, be dispensed with. We had reason to believe that there were many persons in the country, particularly Irishmen, who served as soldiers during the late war, who have hitherto neglected to make a declaration of their intention to become citizens; and we thought it right to provide for this class of cases, more especially as such persons must prove, by clear and indifferent testimony, that they have ever since resided within the United States. It is now nearly sixteen years since the declaration of that war. This section is in strict accordance with former precedents. By the act of 14th April, 1802, aliens resident in the United States between the 29th January, 1795, and 18th June, 1798, might, within two years after its passage, have become citizens, without any such declaration of their intention. Here the residence required was not quite six years. By the act of 26th March, 1804, aliens, who have resided in the country between the 18th June, 1798, and the 14th April, 1802, and have continued to reside in it, have a right to be naturalized, without producing such a certificate. Since 1804, we have passed no similar provision, although more than twenty-four years have since elapsed.

Indian Appropriations.

The committee then rose and reported these various bills to the House; and the question coming up on the concurrence of the House in the Senate's amendments to the appropriation bill for the Indian Department, the debate was again renewed on the first of those amendments, and conducted with great animation by Messrs. S. WOOD, OULPEPER, MALLARY, BRYAN, FORT, MARVIN, P. P. BARBOUR, MEROER, WEEKS, and CARSON.

In the course of the debate, an incidental discussion arose as to the comparative merit of the several States in the cession of their public lands to the General Government. The conduct of Georgia, in requiring a price for hers, and in stipulating for the extinguishment of the Indian title, was attributed to a wise caution, which had been justified by subsequent events. That of Virginia was pronounced by her Representatives to have been generous and magnanimous in the highest degree, and was set in advantageous contrast with the cessions of States to the North and East, who had little or no land to cede.

This representation was repelled by gentlemen from those States. The original charters were appealed to, to show the extent of their title; but the merit of all the cessions was contended to be but small, inasmuch as the lands were, at that time, viewed rather in the light of an incumbrance.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, moved the previous question. His motion was sustained by the House.

The previous question was then put and carried; and the main question on concurrence with the Senate's first amendment being then taken, it was decided by—yeas 60, nays 88.

So the House refused to concur.

The second amendment being considered, Mr. MITCHELL again demanded the previous question.

The House sustained his motion, and the main question being put, it was decided by—yeas 88, nays 70.

So the House disagreed to this amendment also.

[The following are the remarks of Messrs. BRYAN and FORT on the above subject:]

Mr. BRYAN said, that he felt a reluctance to address the committee at so late an hour, almost invincible; but he could not rest satisfied, after the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOOD,) in which he challenged any person to make a discrimination between the case of North Carolina, and that of New York, as he stated it. Mr. B. said the cases were by no means parallel, and even the traces of resemblance were few and faint. Mr. B. here gave a history of the cession of her western territory by North Carolina to the General Government, clogged only with a provision for her liabilities and debts, contracted by her efforts in the war of the revolution, which, he contended, were equitably chargeable upon the Confederation, and not upon North Carolina alone, as they were contracted for the common benefit, and in the common cause. He contended that the claims of North Carolina, to have the Indian title extinguished within her boundaries, were as strong upon the General Government, in an equitable view, as those of Georgia; and said that, if there was any difference to the disadvantage of North Carolina, it arose from the magnanimity and liberality of North Carolina, in not exacting it as a condition of her cession. She gave with confidence, and the General Government should not avail itself of that confidence, in its equity, to the prejudice of that State. Surely, it will not be contended that the General Government shall always stand upon its strictly legal rights, and say to North Carolina, that, although her claim is highly equitable, yet, that, as "it was not in the bond," it cannot be considered.

Mr. B. contended that, even in a strictly legal view, if gentlemen would consider it solely in that light, the General Government was estopped to say that North Carolina could not call upon her to extinguish the Indian title. He alluded to the treaty of Hopewell, in 1785; of Holston, and to the treaty of 1791, made by the United States with the Cherokees, by which treaties the United States took the Cherokees under their protection, and excluded, in express terms, any State or individual from treating with them. He referred, also, to the treaties of 1817, '18, and '19, whereby the United States not only undertook to treat with these Indians for the extinguishment of their title in North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee; but also undertook, and actually did cede to the Indians, fee simple rights to a large portion of the Territory of North Carolina, which North Carolina was competent to extinguish by buying out the Indian titles, or, in other words, by purchasing her own soil.

Mr. B. here reviewed the nature of the Indian title; which, he said, was defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, in several cases, and also by several of the State Courts, to be a mere usufructuary right, or right of temporary occupancy; but that the ultimate right, or fee simple, remained in the State. He referred, in confirmation of these decisions, to the fact that North Carolina had actually granted much of her territory before the Indian title was extinguished, and that many titles in Tennessee, particularly in what is called the Chickasaw Purchase, depend upon this right of North Carolina, as must be known to honorable gentlemen from that State. Mr. B. gave a sketch of the legislation of North Carolina relative to the Cherokee lands; that she was compelled to appropriate her own funds to purchase out these Indian titles, in fee, which the United States had wrongfully fixed upon her soil; and that the General Government, having done her this injury, by a high exercise of the treaty-making power, should redress her injury by making her compensation. Mr. B. disclaimed the idea of now discussing the powers of the Government in making treaties, or their application to Indian tribes within the chartered limits of a State. He said that it was sufficient for his present purpose to show that the property of North Carolina had been taken by it, and he confidently hoped and expected that a just compensation would be made her; that North Carolina had been compelled to pay, as was stated by the committee who reported a bill upon the subject to this House, $22,000, which he hoped would be refunded.

Mr. FOUR addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Believing, as I do, that this body has the greatest disposition to do justice to the State of Georgia, I had intended to remain silent in this discussion. So fixed has been my determination to maintain this course, that I thought nothing could occur which would, at this time, cause me to open my mouth on the question. Sir, how often, on this and other occasions, have we heard the cry of the bond to Georgia, the bond to Georgia, the bond to Georgia! I have so often heard this subject drawn into the debates of this House, and, in my opinion, with so little justice or courtesy to those I represent here, that longer silence on my part would be criminal. We have been told that Virginia has acted with unexampled magnanimity; that North Carolina has covered herself with glory; that other States vied with them in their splendid concessions to the United States, and that they all gave freely, and without price; but, when it came to Georgia, she exacted a bond.

How stands the fact in this matter? What was Georgia at the close of the revolution? An infant in the cradle—not even in the gristle of childhood, far less the bone and sinew of manhood! Was it expedient to place her on the precise footing of the oldest States in the Union? Her sparse population, scattered along one of her borders, held an undisputed title to immense tracts of uncultivated lands, of unknown value. Was it expected that they should give up their title to all this country beyond their settled boundary? or was it not an indispensable and just policy to retain as much as would ensure them a permanent respectability, as a member of this Union? She gave up more than any State in the Union, Virginia excepted, and she gave what is more, a country of inestimable value, over which her sovereignty was undisputed. For this surrender of territory she demanded a price, and exacted a bond, which she had a clear right to do. And how have the conditions of this bond been fulfilled by this Government? By first extinguishing the titles of these tribes in every other quarter, and crowding them into the bosom of Georgia for permanent location! And this was expected to be witnessed and borne meekly and patiently. Could the people of Georgia witness these things without irritation, or is there any justice in the reiterated charge of violence, brought against them? The permanent location of these tribes, on the most valuable part of her territory, can never be regarded, by Georgia, as any thing less than an attempt to keep her in a perpetual state of pupillage; and her sons cannot be expected to submit to it in silence.

I do not wish to detract from the high merit of the States who made these concessions, nor to deny the inestimable benefits thus conferred on this Union; but I will remark, that there were conflicting claims set up to this territory by several of the States, and I must be allowed to believe that these claims could not have been adjusted by the States themselves. A surrender to the General Government was a measure of great prudence, and perhaps indispensable to the peace of the States who made it; nor will I exempt my own State from reasons of a like kind. She had, by her own legislation, covered immense tracts of her uncultivated lands with claims for soil, if not for sovereignty. And, so far am I from regretting the taking of the bond, that I think the getting rid of these claims forms her only excuse for yielding up the territory for any consideration. I will not pursue this subject, but cannot sit down without attempting to do justice to the State of Virginia. All that can be said of the disputes, as to the titles of our northwestern lands, cannot deprive her of a claim to the most extraordinary magnanimity; nor has she merited it in this instance alone. For more than twenty years her sons have predominated in the councils of the nation, and yet no solitary act of legislation has been passed for her benefit. On the contrary, by a course of legislation unfavorable to her interests, she has, in spite of her great advantages, withered on the map of this nation. If her policy, and that of this Government, which she has controlled, has been attended with these fatal results, I can never regret that Georgia has not followed her example.

FRIDAY, May 2.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill "for the punishment of contraventions of the 5th article of the treaty between the United States and Russia;" which was twice read.

Mr. LIVINGSTON briefly explained the object and necessity of this bill. The object of it was to prevent the sale of liquors and fire-arms, by citizens of the United States, to the natives on the northwest coast of America, within the limits claimed on that coast by our Government, and its necessity arose from a stipulation in our treaty with Russia, by which both powers were bound to prohibit this traffic.

Mr. MALLARY suggested that the United States had not power, at present, on that coast, to carry the law into effect, if it should be passed. He also considered the penalties as inadequate to prevent the commission of the offence.

Mr. LIVINGSTON replied, that the want of physical power to put the law into execution, did not remove, or in anywise affect, the obligation of the United States, under the treaty, to pass such a law. The treaty required the law to be passed. The passing of it was obligatory on the national faith, and although the offence might not be punished on the spot, yet it was punishable, should the perpetrators ever return into the limits of the United States, or within the sphere of its practicable jurisdiction. Laws which prohibited offences upon the high seas, had no penal operation where the offence was committed, but the penalty was inflicted when the offender returned home; and the United States was bound to prohibit and punish offences, whether the punishment could be inflicted on the spot or no.

Mr. VERPLANCK suggested that no court was specified in the act, before which the offence was to be cognizable.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said, that the discussion which had already taken place was sufficient to show that it was proper that the House should legislate upon this subject. The stipulation in the treaty was mutual, and it was the nature of all treaties, that, if one of the contracting parties refused or neglected to comply with its side of the bargain, the other party was thereby absolved from the obligation of the treaty. The treaty provided for the establishment of a line, on the respective sides of which, the two nations should inhibit the traffic in arms, spirits, and certain other articles usually disposed of to Indians, lest the natives might, thereby, be induced to do mischief to the subjects of one or other of the powers. As to the policy and obligation of such a measure, he presumed there was but one opinion. In regard to the penalty, though its amount seemed to be small, yet it must be recollected, that penalties were to be inflicted upon each offence. If liquors were sold, and the penalty exacted to-day, it might be exacted again, if liquors were sold to-morrow, and so toties quoties. For himself, he thought the penalty sufficient; but, if it were otherwise judged, its amount might readily be increased by an amendment. As to the question of practical jurisdiction, it was proper that the House should, at least, do what it could. The United States had stipulated to prohibit this traffic, and complaints had been made by Russia, that she failed to comply with this part of her engagement. Whether it was proper, at this time, to create a tribunal for the purpose of trying offences against this law, was a question which belonged to the House to determine. If they should consider that there was any necessity for a specific provision on this point, the case was provided for by the constitution, which provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trials shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed in any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may, by law, have directed." The place was, therefore, within the reach of any amendment which the House might agree to. The law, however, would satisfy the treaty, as it now stood.

Mr. VERPLANCK made an inquiry, which was imperfectly heard by the reporter, but the substance of which was understood to be, whether, as the law now stood, the crimes prohibited by this act would not be within the jurisdiction of the Circuit or District Courts of the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR replied, that that did not, in his opinion, follow as of course. When a crime was committed within a State, then ex necessitate the trial must be held within that State; but when the crime was committed at a place within the jurisdiction of the United States, but not within any particular State, then the court having jurisdiction must be particularly designated by law.

Mr. TAYLOR could not perceive how the passing of this act would fulfil our treaty with Russia. He quoted the fifth article of that treaty, which stipulated that neither party should have power, in enforcing the prohibition of the trade in arms, spirits, &c., to search the vessels of the other nation, but each party is left at liberty to punish its own citizens in such manner as it may think fit. Now, the treaty itself, as the supreme law of the land, was a prohibition of this trade, binding upon all good citizens. The professed object of this bill was to enforce a penalty for the violation of this prohibition, but it provides no court which shall have jurisdiction of the offence. Its practical effect, therefore, would be nothing, and the matter would be left just where it was by the treaty. He was told that some amendment would be offered, assigning the jurisdiction to some court of the United States, but he believed that many difficulties would arise in the exercise of such law. He inquired whether any decree had been issued by the Emperor of Russia, inflicting penalties on these offences, and if it had, what those penalties were?

Mr. LIVINGSTON, in reply, observed, that this subject had been brought before Congress in consequence of a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which stated, that the Emperor of Russia had enforced this prohibition by penalties. This letter did not state what those penalties were, but referred to a complaint made by the Russian Minister, that none had been imposed on the part of the United States. He called for the reading of this letter, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR offered the following amendment:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Superior Courts in each of the Territorial Districts, and the Circuit Courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each District of the United States in which any offenders against this act shall be first apprehended, or brought for trial, shall have, and are hereby invested with, full power and authority to hear, try, and punish, all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, against this act; such Courts proceeding therein in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, had been committed within the bounds of their respective Districts.

Indians in North Carolina, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that he should like to know what had hitherto been the practice of the United States as to the trial of offences committed beyond the limits of any State, in the Indian country. If the practice was fixed, it might furnish a guide in the present case.

Mr. BARBOUR remarked that it was always competent to the United States to punish any offence of any of its citizens. A treaty was the supreme law of the land, and the infraction of it was a crime which ought to be punished. Wherever the territory of the United States extended, there its jurisdiction extended also. No difficulty, therefore, could arise as to the principle, and the only difficulty was, where the offence should be tried. The amendment he had offered, removed this, and, as he supposed, would leave the subject wholly unembarrassed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON suggested a slight alteration in the amendment, which was rendered necessary by the fact, that in some States there are two judicial districts.

Mr. STRONG, in reply to the inquiry of his colleague, (Mr. TAYLOR,) quoted the existing laws to show that crimes committed within the Indian Territory, and not within the limits of any State, are to be tried and punished in the State or Territory next adjoining.

Mr. MARVIN suggested that the amendment would not fully meet the case for which it was intended. It gave the jurisdiction of these offences to the District Court of that State where the offender should be first arrested, or into which he should first be brought, and it confines the jurisdiction exclusively to that State or Territory. Now it might happen, that such State might prove the most inconvenient part of the Union for the trial, in consequence of distance, expense of witnesses, &c. He thought the law ought to give to that court a discretionary power of removing the venue on the application either of the accused party, or of the Attorney of the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR replied, that this difficulty might be obviated by striking out the word "first" in the amendment which he had offered.

Mr. DRAYTON considered this as a matter of form, rather than any thing else, as it was not very probable that such offences would ever come to be tried in the United States. He suggested, however, the insertion into this law, of the second section of the act of 1807, regulating process in offences committed against Indians.

Mr. BARBOUR accepted this as a substitute for his amendment.

Mr. MARVIN moved to amend the section by adding the following clause:

"Unless upon the application of the Attorney of the United States, or of the party charged, the court herein prescribed shall otherwise order; in which case the party charged shall give good and sufficient security to appear before the court so designated, which court is hereby vested with full power to try for said offence."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STRONG suggested that the bill, in its present form, was likely to prove inoperative. The crime it forbids is the selling of liquor, arms, &c., to the "natives." Nothing would be easier than to evade this law. Vessels freighted with the forbidden commodities might carry on the traffic through a Russian agent, or some other alien residing upon the coast, who would immediately dispose of the articles to the natives. Over such persons the United States had no power, and the law would remain a dead letter. He suggested the propriety of amending the bill by adding, after the word "natives," the words, "or other person or persons."

Mr. BARBOUR replied, that the law was as comprehensive as the treaty, and the United States were not bound to go any farther.

Mr. VANCE thought it would be unwise for the House to go into legislating on this matter until they had full information as to what had been done by the Russian Government on this subject; since, if we should make our law more severe than that of Russia, it might happen that our own citizens would thereby be thrown out of the trade, which was one of great value.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, finding that this discussion would occupy the whole hour allotted for reports and resolutions, and thereby preclude the consideration of the subject of adjournment, moved that the bill be laid upon the table; but the motion was negatived—ayes 62, noes 75. The amendment was adopted, and the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Indians in North Carolina, &c.

Mr. MARTIN said, that he was about to submit a motion which must be offered this morning, or not at all. It was for a reconsideration of the vote of the House, taken yesterday on one of the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill. He meant that amendment which went to extend the treaty with the Cherokees to their lands in North Carolina, and which had been disagreed to by the House. He therefore moved to postpone the orders of the day, in order that a motion for reconsideration might be made and discussed.

Mr. M. was about to explain, at some length, the reasons why he wished the vote reconsidered, important facts having been developed, which, he was persuaded, would induce the House to reverse its decision, but he was arrested by the Chair, until the question of consideration should be decided.

Mr. CARSON suggested, that, inasmuch as a motion for reconsidering any vote of the House was confined by the rules, to the day on which such vote had passed, and the day succeeding the motion, such motion, by its own right, took precedence, without the necessity of postponing the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER replied, that the uniform practice of the House had been otherwise, and that, unless the motion for reconsideration was made before the expiration of the first hour of the second day, it was wholly precluded.

The question was then put on postponing the orders of the day, (which motion can be carried only by a vote of two-thirds of the House, under a rule recently adopted,) and was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 114, nays 60. So the motion for reconsideration was negatived, a majority of two-thirds not voting in its favor.

Mr. MARTIN made a point of order, and insisted that it was in order, during any part of the day, to move the reconsideration of a vote of yesterday, inasmuch as the 39th and 41st rules of order, according to his understanding of them, allowed the whole of the second day for such a motion, and gave it precedence over the orders of the day. He quoted these two rules, in the following words:

39th. "When a motion has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof, on the same, or the succeeding day."

41st. "The unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment, shall have the preference in the orders of the day, and no motion on any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the former is disposed of."

The SPEAKER repeated the decision he had formerly given, referring to repeated decisions of the House in confirmation of it, especially in the much-disputed case of the Missouri Question. The motion for reconsideration might, it is true, be made at any time on the second day, when such a motion would be in order; but it was in order only during the hour allotted for the consideration of morning business.

From this decision Mr. CARSON took an appeal to the House, and Mr. SUTHERLAND contended, that, inasmuch as the motion for reconsideration had respect to an amendment in a bill, it was in order during any part of the second day, when the discussion of bills was in order, unless the bill to which it related had been carried by the Clerk to the other branch of the Legislature. The farther discussion of the point of order, however, was arrested by a suggestion urged by Messrs. LITTLE and P. P. BARBOUR, that the disagreement of the House would have to go to the Senate, and the bill and amendments come back again from that body, when an opportunity for farther amendment would again be presented; whereupon Mr. CARSON withdrew his appeal.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR then moved the following addition to the 39th rule of the House:

"And such motion shall take precedence of all other questions."

The said 39th rule proposed thus to be amended is in the words following:

"When a motion has been made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof, on the same or succeeding day."

SATURDAY, May 8.

Madame Dubord's Case—Petition to bring back Slaves from Cuba.

The only bill which occasioned much discussion was that for the relief of Anna Dubord, a lady of New Orleans, who, in the year 1819, left that city and went to Cuba for her health, (intending, should it be restored, to return to New Orleans,) and took with her thirteen slaves, chiefly females, who were attached to her person as domestic servants. Her husband, apprehending that some difficulty might occur in admitting these slaves to return within the United States, had a certified description of their persons filed with the Mayor of New Orleans, and provided witnesses who could swear to their identity. The experiment as to health not succeeding, Madame Dubord wished to return, but would not do so till it should be settled before she left Cuba, that her slaves might come home with her, together with their children, born on that island. On application being made to the collector of New Orleans, he considered the law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States, as peremptory, and refused to admit them. Whereupon, as she held the slaves in her own separate right, she applied to Congress for an act to allow them to return to the United States. The case has long been before Congress, and repeatedly referred to the Judiciary Committee, who always reported against the petition, until the present session, when a majority of that committee being in favor of it, reported the present bill.

The discussion, though animated, was conducted with good temper on all sides, and resulted in a refusal to have the bill engrossed for its third reading, by a vote of yeas 61, nays 70.

The claim of Madame Dubord was advocated by Messrs. LIVINGSTON, GURLEY, BRENT, P. P. BARBOUR, GORHAM, and WEEMS; and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, of Ohio, BUCHANAN, STORES, and TAYLOR.

It was advocated on the ground that it was the right of every citizen of the United States, wishing to travel for health, pleasure, or business, to take with him such servants as he chose, and to bring them back at pleasure, whether white or black; whether bond or free. In illustration of which principle, reference was had to the cases of our Ambassadors to Europe and South America, and also of our Naval Officers, all of whom took black servants with them, and were allowed, as a matter of course, to bring them back on their return. The law prohibiting the importation of slaves, never contemplated the case of such as had been temporarily absent from the United States; but was intended to prohibit the slave trade, and prevent any increase from abroad to the mass of our slave population. This case did not violate the spirit of the law, even supposing it (which was not admitted) to be forbidden by its letter. And though these slaves had had children while abroad, these were to follow the condition of their parents, just as much as the children of free American citizens would; and these, everybody knew, were entitled to citizenship here, though they had been born during the temporary absence of their parents abroad.

Mint of the United States.

Had these slaves never left the United States, they would probably have had the same number of children, so that the mass of American slave population would not be increased by their readmission. To these arguments were superadded a consideration of humanity, arising from the fact that slaves were much more humanely treated in the United States than in the West Indies.

It was contended, on the other side, that the law prohibiting the importation of slaves, like those for the security of the revenue, was to be construed in the most strict and rigid manner. The settled policy of this nation, (advocated as strenuously by Southern as by Northern statesmen,) was to reduce the amount of our slave population, as far as was consistent with the rights of their holders, and was not to be relaxed, unless on considerations of high and imperious necessity, or some great view of national policy. No such necessity existed here—it was, at the utmost, a case of individual hardship, to which a settled and vital course of policy was not to give way. But, in reality, the case was not a very hard one. The owner of the slaves had acted voluntarily, and not from any compulsion in taking these slaves out of the country; he had done it with a full knowledge of the law, as appears by the steps he took before hand; and though his wishes or interest may be crossed in his being refused liberty to bring them back, after a foreign residence of nine years, this was his misfortune, and he must submit to it. His disappointment was a far less evil than the risk of public injury that would result from easily relaxing the provisions of the law against the importation of slaves. Under the revenue laws, harder cases frequently arose, where goods were burnt or stolen, yet those laws were always enforced, because, otherwise, the door would be opened to numberless frauds and evasions. So, in the present case, if all slaves, with their offspring, were to be allowed to be imported, who had ever before resided in the United States, it would infallibly lead to the most injurious consequences. As to the case of the servants of our Ambassadors and naval officers, the argument amounted to nothing, inasmuch as, by the law of nations, the residence of a minister abroad was viewed as an integral part of his own country, and so was the deck of a national ship. Slaves, while in either place, were, in view of the law, still within the United States; and these slaves might be used as sailors in the merchant service, and in that capacity, touch at foreign ports for a short time; the case being widely different from where they had been taken abroad to reside for five, six, and nine years together. As to the question which had been put by one of the advocates of the bill, whether its opponents would prohibit the return of slaves who had been kidnapped? It was answered in the negative. But that case was not at all applicable, because here they were taken out of the country from free choice, and with a knowledge that the law was thought to prohibit their return. In reply to the argument for humanity, it was said, first, that the Spanish laws were less severe as to the condition and treatment of slaves than those of Louisiana; and, secondly, if the case were otherwise, (as it was declared to be by a gentleman on the side of the bill, from personal knowledge, he insisting that whatever the laws might be on paper, that they were in fact a dead letter,) still, the argument went too far, since, if it proved any thing, it proved that slaves might be imported from any country where they were more severely treated than in the United States, a doctrine that would, at one stroke, abrogate the law entirely. And besides, as it seemed that these female slaves had contracted marriage ties in Cuba, to bring them back, and thus tear them from their husbands, would be any thing but humane.

TUESDAY, May 6.

Mint of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House proceeded to consider the bill "to continue the Mint at the City of Philadelphia, and for other purposes," and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LONG in the chair, on that bill.

Mr. S. briefly explained the provisions of the bill. The principal points of which were, that it provides for continuing the Mint at Philadelphia for an indefinite time, and also establishes the troy pound of England, as lately fixed, from a scientific investigation in that country, as the standard weight for gold and silver in the United States. Two provisions of minor importance were also included, one enabling the director of the Mint to appoint his own clerks and servants, without requiring, as heretofore, the concurrence of the President of the United States; and the other allowing assays to be made of metals at the mint, without confining these assays to bullion brought them for coinage.

Mr. VERPLANCK made some inquiries as to the difference between the troy pound established by the bill, and that heretofore in use. Our present standard, for the alloy of gold and silver, was not that of the commercial world, in consequence of which, our gold coins sold at a premium, and were immediately exported.

If the pound was much increased, this inconvenience would be increased in proportion.

Mr. SERGEANT replied and explained, stating the difference to be very inconsiderable, and not such as would have any injurious operation. The gentleman from New York could not but be aware, that a great and almost insuperable difficulty attended the fixing of any ratio of fineness in the coinage of a country, when the coin consisted of two different metals. It had been experienced as strongly in England, as in this country. No legislation could fix the changing relation of the value of gold and silver. It was a fact well authenticated, that an emission of three millions of sovereigns from the British mint, had wholly disappeared from the kingdom in three months. There seemed to be no other remedy, but to confine the current coin to one species alone.

Mr. VERPLANCK declared himself satisfied with this explanation, but expressed his hope that the entire subject of the national currency, and that of weights and measures, would soon be taken up by Congress, and finally adjusted. After some explanation between Messrs. LIVINGSTON and SERGEANT, as to the appointment of Clerks, &c., by the Director of the Mint, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House without amendment, when it was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

North Carolina Indians.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriation for the Indian Department, and the message received from that body, stated that they insisted on their second amendment to that bill, to wit:

"For refunding to the State of North Carolina the amount expended by her in extinguishing the title of certain Indians of the Cherokee tribe to reservations of land within the limits of said State, granted to them in fee simple, by treaties with the United States, in the years 1817 and 1819, the sum of $23,000."

Mr. CARSON moved that the House do recede from its disagreement to that amendment.

The motion to recede was opposed by Messrs. CLARK and BUCKNER, and advocated by Messrs. ALSTON, CARSON, WEEMS, MITCHELL, of Tenn., and DRAYTON.

Mr. CARSON said: Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could have induced me to obtrude myself upon the indulgence of the House, at this late period of the session, but a sense of the responsibility which devolves upon me, as one of the Representatives of North Carolina. I am aware sir, that it will afford the House but little pleasure to listen to an argument of any length, upon this, or any other subject, at this time; and I beg leave to assure them, that it will afford me equally as little to inflict one upon them. But, sir, I hope I shall find an apology for the time I may occupy, in the subject now before us, in the opposition it has met with from the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLARK,) and others, to not only solicit the indulgence but the attention of the House, while I endeavor to explain the grounds upon which this claim depends. The alarm, sir, which this claim appears to have conjured up in the imagination of certain gentlemen, and the objections to which they think it obnoxious, I am confident I shall be able to show are not only gratuitous, but wholly unfounded.

The most prominent objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLARK,) is "that, if we pass this claim, it will be a precedent, by which other States can come in, and, with equal justice, demand similar remunerations from the Government"—and, by way of alarming our fears, we are told "that her Mammoth Majesty, the great State of New York, will come down upon us, and swallow up the Treasury." Sir, these objections exist only in the imagination of gentlemen, and not in fact; and I must be further permitted to say, that it seems to me, that gentlemen have racked their ingenuity to get up objections to this claim—and which, after being produced, would appear much better adapted to the quibbling special pleading of a County Court, than to the grave deliberations of a National Legislature; and I assure gentlemen, that I do not envy them any part of the distinction they may have obtained in their efforts against this measure.

Sir, no State in the Union has such strong claims upon the Government as North Carolina, with the exception of Georgia. And our claims are founded upon the following reasons:

During our Revolutionary struggle, it will be recollected, that the Cherokees seized that opportunity to wage war upon the frontier settlements of North Carolina. That State subdued them, and was at the whole expense of the expeditions fitted out against them. Some time in the year 1777 or '8, a Treaty was held by Commissioners on the part of that State, as an independent sovereignty, with that tribe of Indians, at Long Island, on the Holston River. This treaty I have never seen, myself, and, therefore, can only speak of it upon the authority of others; and it may admit of doubt whether it could now be found, inasmuch as printing presses were not known in that section of country at that day. But, if to be found at all, it will be in manuscript, in the archives of our State, or, what I think equally probable, among the old papers of a late distinguished citizen of my country, who was one of the Commissioners that held the treaty—I mean, sir, Col. Weightstle Avery, and this presumption is founded upon my knowledge of the correctness with which he transacted all his business, and his great care in the preservation of important papers.

But, sir, the fact of the existence of the treaty cannot be doubted, from the fact of North Carolina acting under its stipulations from the time of its ratification till the year 1785, when the General Government made a treaty called the treaty of Hopewell—is well known to all the citizens of North Carolina, who lived at that day, and by none better than my honorable colleague, (Mr. ALSTON,) who has already stated the fact.

It is also known to our Senators, and to Judge WHITE, from Tennessee, who stated the fact to the Senate, when this question was before them. By this treaty, North Carolina extinguished the Indian title to all the lands within her limits; she permitted the Indians, however, to hold as hunting grounds certain portions of the country as described by the treaty; over which, however, North Carolina assumed the control, and sold to her citizens considerable quantities of this country, subject to the Indian occupancy; and, sir, North Carolina went on in her own way, managing her Indians as best suited her interests, (as she had an undoubted right to do,) with reference, however, to their interest, as well as her own, and, sir, might have continued her control and management to this day, had it not been for the improper, nay, sir, the unjust interference of the Confederate Government. What did the Government do? Why, sir, in the year 1785, she extends her paternal care over those Indians, takes them from under the guardianship and control of North Carolina, and prohibits them from holding any treaty with any power on earth except themselves. But, further, sir, by the aforesaid treaty of 1785, this Government retrocedes to the Indians the very lands which they had previously ceded to North Carolina by the treaty of Long Island, before alluded to: and, what is more, sir, North Carolina entered her solemn protest against the interference of this Government between her and her Indians, at the time, and that protest is now of record in the archives of the other branch of Congress, and can be seen by any gentleman who will give himself the trouble to walk there and examine. Nor is this all: not content, Mr. Speaker, with giving away our lands, they were also graciously pleased to empower the Indians to cut the throats, or otherwise treat our citizens, who dare cross within their boundaries to disturb their rights, in any manner that to their discretion and humanity might seem fit. (See 5th Art. Treaty of Hopewell.) Nor does it stop here, sir: for so wonderfully anxious was the Government at that time to ensure the Indians against any injury to which they might by possibility be subjected from North Carolina, or even herself, that she, by treaty, authorized that nation to send a delegate here, who should take a seat upon this floor, and mingle in the councils of this nation; and, sir, if there is any virtue in the treaty of Hopewell, that nation can now send her delegate here, and we could not refuse him his seat: for that article of the treaty has never been repealed or altered by any subsequent treaty. (See 12th Art. Treaty of Hopewell.) I shall not stop now, Mr. Speaker, to inquire into or comment upon the very respectable figure the American Congress would cut, in the eyes of foreign powers, with some Cherokee Chief among us, assisting in our deliberations, and giving his aid in the directions of the councils of this nation. Matters went on in this disputed condition, between us and the Indians, till the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the election of Gen. Washington as President. Mutual complaints were made to him upon the part of North Carolina, and the Indians: for North Carolina persisted in her right to her lands, and continued to sell, and her citizens continued to live on parts retroceded by the treaty of Hopewell. Gen. Washington appealed to the Senate to know whether he should send an armed force and remove the whites, or whether he should issue a commission and peaceably purchase out the claim of the Indians, which claim they held by the treaty of Hopewell. The Senate advised by all means to send a commission and hold a treaty. Said they, we have placed this incumbrance upon North Carolina, it is but just that we should remove it; and accordingly the treaty of 1791, held upon Holston River, was effected, and from that time to this, the Government has recognized and acknowledged the obligation she was under to remove the incumbrance, which, by her own officious, unjust acts, she imposed upon us; and hence the various treaties which the Government has made for the extinguishment of the Indian title in North Carolina, among which may be numbered, the treaty of Philadelphia, concluded in 1794, confirming the boundary established in 1791; also, the treaties of Tellico, concluded in October, 1798, &c., and the treaties of 1817 and 1819.

And now, sir, I demand of the gentleman from Kentucky and others, who have said "that New York and other States could come in, and, with equal justice, claim similar remunerations," when did New York, by treaty, extinguish all the Indian title to lands within her limits? And if she has done so, has the General Government retroceded it to the Indians, against the solemn protest of that State, as was done in the case of North Carolina? No, sir, this has never been done; and how it is, that gentlemen can get up here, and gravely state that New York or any other State, stands upon the same footing with North Carolina, as regards her claims upon the Government, is, to me, not only surprising, but utterly incomprehensible.

I repeat it again, Mr. Speaker, that no State in the Union has been treated in the same unjust manner by the Government, nor has any State in the Union acted with more loyalty, or dealt with a more liberal hand towards this Government, than has North Carolina.

But, sir, let us run the parallel of the comparative merits of the respective claims of New York and North Carolina, upon this Government, a little farther. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MARVIN) has said, (by way, I suppose, of setting up a claim upon the liberality of the Government,) "that New York ceded a vast tract of Western territory to the General Government." This act of cession, Mr. Speaker, was assuredly, vastly liberal on the part of New York, especially when we consider that she had no title to the lands which she ceded. I have not read her act of cession, but I venture to say that her deed is only a quit-claim, or special conveyance, (as it is called in law,) conveying only that title which New York possessed, and which, in fact, was no title at all. Thus much, sir, for the extraordinary liberality of New York, so highly lauded by her faithful Representative, (Mr. MARVIN.) And now, sir, for the part which North Carolina acted in this drama of liberality, played off by the States. She did cede to the General Government, not lands to which she had no title, but lands to which she had a bona fide, undoubted, and unquestioned right; and that cession includes not only the whole State of Tennessee; but its western limits is bounded by the Pacific Ocean. And let us next inquire into the causes, sir, which induced her to part with this vast and almost boundless region of country, and see whether it does not impose an additional obligation upon this Government to reimburse her in any and every loss she may sustain by the acts of this Government, or by the residence of Indians upon her soil.

The moving causes are to be found in the preamble of her act of cession, which reads as follows:

"Whereas the United States, in Congress assembled, have repeatedly and earnestly recommended to the respective States in the Union, claiming or owning vacant western territory, to make cession of part of the same, as a further means, as well of hastening the extinguishment of the debt, as of establishing the harmony of the United States; and the inhabitants of the said western territory being also desirous that such cession should be made, in order to obtain a more ample protection than they have heretofore received; Now, this State being ever desirous of doing ample justice to the public creditors, as well as establishing the harmony of the United States, and complying with the reasonable desires of her citizens—Be it enacted," &c. Here follows the act of cession.

From this preamble, and the act of cession, Mr. Speaker, it is clearly manifest, that the great object which North Carolina had in view, in parting with her Western lands, was the extinguishment of the public debt, contracted in our Revolutionary struggle. And I here might pause, Mr. Speaker, to pay a just compliment to my State for her liberality, her magnanimity, and loyalty, to this Government, if indeed, sir, I had not seen ample reasons, in the investigations of this subject, to regret, to deeply regret, that she had ever parted with her Western territory. Although this act of hers must remain as a monument to the credit of North Carolina, while this Union exists, or the name of Tennessee is remembered, yet, I would to God, sir, that that monument had never been erected, and that this act had never appeared upon our statute books. Then could North Carolina have reared her head among the proudest of her sister States. Then, sir, would her influence and her weight have been felt; and, instead of having assigned her the humble position of a follower, she would have proudly led the van. I hope, by these remarks, Mr. Speaker, that my friends from Tennessee would not understand me as wishing any injury to that State. Far from it, sir; for, while I regret that the parent State has parted with the dominion and soil of that fertile and desirable region, yet North Carolina does, and always will, feel a just pride in the recognition of that State as her daughter; and, at this time, sir, we must be permitted all the gratification and pleasure which a parent can derive from seeing her offspring the belle of the Union. And permit me to hope sir, that the old State will be pardoned for the part she may act, and the anxiety she may feel, in seeing the favorite son of a favorite daughter elevated to the first office in the gift of this nation.

But, sir, a further obligation on the part of the Government; to extinguish the Indian title to lands in North Carolina, results from the third reservation in her act of cession. That reservation is in the following words:

"Thirdly, that all the lands intended to be ceded by virtue of this act, to the United States of America, and not appropriated as before mentioned, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of the United States of America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand of this House, whether this Government did "faithfully dispose of the lands," according to this reservation? Sir, she did not; and, by the improper disposition of those lands, by this Government, North Carolina sustained an injury which cannot be repaired, not even by refunding this money, but by the extinguishment of all the Indian title to lands within her limits; for, if those lands had been faithfully disposed of, and North Carolina had received her just proportion, it would have been an amount far exceeding all that the Government have, or all that she ever can expend, in the extinguishment of Indian title within her limits. How, then, were those lands disposed of? They, sir, instead of being disposed of according to the terms of this reservation, were exclusively appropriated to the use of the State of Tennessee. This will be seen by the act of Congress of the year 1806, &c. As those lands were improperly disposed of, I am certainly as well satisfied that they were given to Tennessee, as I could have been by any other improper disposition of them. But my complaint is, sir, that, after North Carolina has suffered so much by the improper acts of the General Government towards her, that this House should hesitate to reimburse North Carolina in the money, which, by the wrongful act, and by the unjust assumption of power, on the part of this Government, she compelled North Carolina to pay. Yes, sir, an assumption of power, which, if justified and persisted in by this Government, then, farewell, a long farewell, to State rights, and to State Governments. No State, then, sir, can grant away her own lands; we must look to this National Government for all our land titles. I say national, sir; for the federate features of our Government will all have merged into that of a national; and a State Government, if, indeed, they should be in existence, will be merely nominal; for, take away the right of soil, as the right to grant the soil, then have you divested them of almost all the rights which are valuable, or worth having.

But, sir, I deem it superfluous to argue this point, for, surely, no gentleman on this floor could be so reckless of his reputation, as to hazard the opinion, that this Government has the right to grant fee simple titles to land within any of the original States. Yet, sir, the United States did, by the treaty of 1819, grant reservations of land, in fee simple, to certain Indians of the Cherokee tribe; and all the facts connected with this Government, and the conduct of North Carolina, relative to the grant, had been laid before this House, in the report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I had the honor to submit in the early part of the session, accompanied by a memorial from the Legislature of North Carolina; and trusting, therefore, that they are recollected by the House, I shall not again go into the details of them.

It has been said, however, sir, by way, I suppose, of justifying the Government in her improper act, "that North Carolina solicited this Government to make the treaty, and that she accepted the treaty after it was made," &c. It is the fact, Mr. Speaker, that North Carolina has been solicitous to have that incumbrance, which was improperly placed upon her, and imposed upon her too, against her solemn protest, removed, and, for that reason, has applied to this Government to take that off, which she put on. But, sir, by this treaty of 1819, instead of complying with the just requests of North Carolina, removing that incumbrance, they placed a greater one on us.

How is this? Why, sir, instead of extinguishing that peculiar kind of title which the Indians held in their land, which was only a possessory, or usufructuary right, and, in fact, all the title which they are capable of holding, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and this can be seen in the report of the celebrated case of Fletcher vs. Peck, where the whole nature of their titles was thoroughly investigated—I say, sir, instead of extinguishing they altered, and converted that which was, previously, a mere possessory title into the best of all possible titles, that of a fee simple. Nor is this all; they have palmed upon North Carolina, endowed with all the privileges, franchises, and immunities of citizens, those Indian reserves; a species of population which we did not want; a kind of people whose very nature forbids the possibility of our fraternizing with them; and, in short, a people, sir, we never can elevate to an equality with ourselves, until such changes have taken place in their habits, their morals, their education, and in their very nature, sir, which the most sanguine hopes of the philanthropist, for the amelioration of the condition of man, cannot anticipate for ages to come. But how did North Carolina act, under this additional injury of the United States? In justice to herself, sir, she should have taken and kept possession of the land, and left the Indians and this Government to have settled that matter between themselves: then she would not have suffered the rebuke of gentlemen upon this floor, for asking but justice from this Government. She, however, acted differently; she went pacifically to work, and, rather than violate the faith which the Indians had in the General Government, she applied her own money, and purchased out the Indians, and now appeals to the justice of Congress, to reimburse her in the amount paid; and, after this act of magnanimity and liberality, upon the part of North Carolina, it is humiliating, sir, to hear it tauntingly said, "that North Carolina was acting in her own wrong," in her liberal course towards this Government, and that she should not be permitted to take advantage of it. What, sir? Wrong to keep inviolate the faith of the Indians in this Government? Wrong to submit to an injury rather than fly in the face of the General Government, and bid defiance to her treaties? Sir, it may have been wrong in North Carolina; but, permit me to say, that the discussion of that question mainly depends upon the decision of this House, upon this question: for, should she give us the amount, North Carolina is justified; but, should she refuse it, it will then be for North Carolina to pursue a different course towards this Government, under similar circumstances, should they ever occur.

But, said the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLARK,) "there is no legal obligation upon this Government to refund this money, and, if there ever was, North Carolina has relinquished that right by her own acts, in the acceptance of the treaty, and the advancement of her money to purchase those reservations."

In answer to this, Mr. Speaker, I will say, that, should it be considered that the legal obligation is weakened, most assuredly the moral obligation, an obligation, sir, always recognized by honorable men, as much higher and more binding in its nature, has been greatly strengthened; and, instead of the policy of North Carolina being brought up here as forming an objection to her claims, it should be set down to her immortal honor, and should operate as an additional inducement to grant the remuneration which she now demands.

But, Mr. Speaker, as the gentlemen from Kentucky and New York (Mr. CLARK and Mr. MARVIN) appear to bow with such deference to the omnipotence of precedent, permit me to read, for the benefit of those gentlemen, a case, which I consider strictly in point.

By a treaty held with the Kickapoos, in the year 1819, the United States ceded to that nation a tract of country lying in the then Territory of Missouri, "to them and their heirs forever," (See book of Indian Treaties and laws, page 268, Article 6th.) This treaty was communicated to the Senate, and they refused to ratify that part, because it vested the Indians with a fee simple title, and the consequence was, that a supplemental treaty was made at the expense of the United States, by which the title intended to be conveyed by the 6th Article of the previous treaty, was altered so as to convey only the possessory kind of title, usual among Indians.

Now, sir, in this case, the Senate refused to ratify a treaty, by which a fee simple title to land (which she had the unquestionable right to convey, for it was within the Territory of Missouri) was guaranteed to the Indians, and caused that article to be altered. But, in the case of North Carolina, the treaty was ratified. Our lands were taken; and will this Government now say that she will refuse to pay us back the amount we have paid, after she has decided, by her refusal to ratify the treaty with the Kickapoos, that it was improper to invest Indians with any other title to lands, than that usually held among them? I hope not, sir. But, should she do so, it may teach North Carolina a salutary lesson—which will be, never again to extend her liberality to, or confide in a Government, which treats her kindness with such injustice: for, sir, had North Carolina been as provident of her interest as her sister State of Georgia, she now might have proudly demanded as a right, that which she only asks in justice.

My thanks, Mr. Speaker, due to the House for its kind indulgence, I tender to them most sincerely. And if any thing has escaped me, in the course of these remarks, which may be considered exceptionable by any gentleman present, I beg that it may be attributed to that zeal which I must be permitted to feel for the interest of my State: for, sir, it was foreign from my purpose to impugn the motives of any gentleman, however widely he may differ with me upon this subject.

Mr. STEWART moved the previous question.

The motion prevailed, ayes 92: and the previous question having been put, and carried, the main question on the receding of the House from its disagreement to the Senate's second amendment was then decided by—yeas 89, nays 70.

So the House agreed to recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

WEDNESDAY, May 7.

Revolutionary Soldiers.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to take up the bill for the relief of the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution. The committee agreed to this motion, and the bill was considered by sections.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, moved to amend the first section by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, also, That no officer shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act until he shall swear in due form, before some judge or justice of the peace, that he was not the owner or possessor of money or property, real or personal, clear of all incumbrances, and over and above the amount of debts which he owed, to the value of five thousand dollars, at the time of the passage of this act."

The amendment was warmly advocated by Mr. MITCHELL, of Tenn., and Mr. WILLIAMS, of N. C., and opposed with equal warmth by Messrs. DRAYTON, SPRAGUE, TAYLOR, CULPEPER, S. WOOD, LIVINGSTON, EVERETT, BAERNET, SERGEANT, BUNNER, and TUCKER, of New Jersey.

It was twice modified, first, by requiring, that the oath should state, that the applicant was not the owner or possessor of real or personal estate free of all incumbrance, over the value of five thousand dollars, and then by requiring farther, the addition of the words, "over and above all the debts he owed."

It was contended on the one side, that, as the officers had no legal claim, any grant that might be made them, was to be considered in the light of a gratuity, and if so, it ought not to be given except to those who were in needy circumstances. Some of the surviving officers were known to be very wealthy, and stood in no need of aid, and if the gratuity was to be graduated by the fixing of a certain sum, then it ought to be guarded in such a manner as to prevent fraudulent evasions of the law. Though the general character of the officers was highly respectable, there might be among them unworthy individuals, who would convey their property to their children, antedate deeds, and take other base means of imposing on the treasury. Though the number of officers was supposed to be small, it had never been correctly ascertained, and the number of claimants might turn out to be far greater than was now anticipated.

The amendment was opposed, on the ground that the officers had a valid claim against the Government, founded on contract, the Government never having complied with the promise it made to them, when they commuted their half pay for Government certificates; the full amount of those certificates had never been paid, either to the officers, or to those persons to whom the officers were compelled, by the pressure of necessity, to sell them; the Government had gained a large sum by funding these certificates, a sum much larger than would be granted by the effect of this bill, and was therefore bound in equity, as well as by express contract, to make some compensation; the appropriation would, therefore, not be a gratuity, but a mere act of ordinary justice, and it was, therefore, unjust in principle, to withhold it from any of those who were entitled to receive it, merely because, by industry or economy, they had been enabled to obtain a competency; it was neither delicate to them, nor creditable to the Government, when about to make some small compensation for services which were beyond all price, to require these aged veterans to expose their poverty under oath, and, besides, the sum proposed was perfectly arbitrary, and its adoption would have an unequal and oppressive operation in practice, since five thousand dollars, in some parts of the country, was worth to its owner double what it would be in other parts; and while it might be a competence to a single man, it would not be so to one burthened with an aged and infirm wife, or a large family of dependent children.

Mr. TUCKER, of New Jersey, said: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a single word upon the subject before the committee, inasmuch as the cause of that illustrious band of heroes, the revolutionary officers, has been so ably and zealously portrayed by honorable gentlemen, at the last and present session, that little remains for the most intelligent to add.

It may therefore be thought arrogance in me to attempt to advocate or elucidate their claims, after such displays of eloquence in their most righteous and just cause. I shall therefore only briefly touch upon a point, on which the grand superstructure (in my opinion) the claim rests, and on which the cause must ultimately turn. Secondly, exhibit a calculation, showing how much is now legally due to each of the surviving officers of the revolution, and how much in the aggregate. And that I may be the better understood by the committee, I will state a single case of a captain within my own knowledge; and this case will be applicable to the whole.

It is the case of Captain Cyrus Dehart, of New Jersey, who served during the revolutionary war—and for the sake of argument, I will admit that he was settled with and paid every thing that was promised him by the various resolutions of the Confederation, down to the year 1783, when the army was disbanded.

I shall lay out of the question too, all losses by depreciations of the currency and certificates with which he was paid; the unparalleled sacrifices and sufferings of hunger and cold, and privations of every sort, during a seven years' doubtful and sanguinary war, and proceed briefly to the basis on which, as matter of legal right, the claim rests.

It would be almost superfluous, Mr. Chairman, to refer the committee to the solemn engagements entered into by the old Confederation with the officers of the army of the 21st of October, 1780, and the 22d of March, 1783, on the final settlement of the parties; and I will here admit too, Mr. Chairman, that the officers were honestly and honorably settled with by the old Confederation, agreeably to the respective contracts of the parties; and that the officers respectively received a certificate for their respective dues, bearing interest at six per cent. payable annually; and it is not to be controverted, that that illustrious assemblage of sages and patriots composing the old Continental Congress, as far as the Confederation was pledged to the officers, scrupulously and honorably complied with their engagements; and I venture to say, that if the United States had acted with equal good faith, you would not have heard a murmur or complaint from the officers to this day.

But, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts? Sir, instead of paying the interest annually on those certificates, agreeably to the solemn contract of the parties, eight long years rolled around before a single cent, either of principal or interest, was paid; and this was in consequence of the inefficacy of the powers of the old Confederation, which were only recommendatory instead of coercive. Hence, the honest and honorable views and engagements of the old Continental Congress were paralyzed and prostrated; and hence the depression of the public securities, and the distress of the officers, growing out of that event. It is ascertained Mr. Chairman, that each captain for his five years' full pay, received a certificate for $2,400, bearing interest at six per cent. payable annually, and such a certificate Captain Dehart received in lieu of his half pay for life, which run eight years without payment of interest as before stated, viz: From the first of January, 1783, to the first of January, 1791, the interest amounting on the latter day, to $1,152, making in the aggregate $3,552. It will be recollected that in March, 1789, the present Government went into operation, and in the year 1790, made provision for, and funded the public debt.

Well, sir, how did they provide for the payment of Captain Dehart's $3,500 principal, and $1,152 interest, due on the 1st of January, 1791? Why, sir, they gave him three certificates, one for $1,600, being two-thirds of his principal, with interest at six per cent., and one for $800, the other third of his debt, but deferred ten years without interest; and instead of paying Captain Dehart his $1,152 down, or giving him paper at six per cent., they gave him a certificate for his $1,152 interest redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, at three per cent. Let us now examine, Mr. Chairman, how this funding system operated upon my old friend Captain Dehart's honest dues, and consequently upon every officer's pay according to his rank:

First.—Loss of interest on 800 dollars deferred from 1st of January, 1791, to 1st of January, 1801, ten years at six per cent. - - - $480 00

Second.—Interest on the above sum from 1st of January, 1801, to the 1st of January, 1828, twenty-seven years, at six per cent. 777 60

Third.—Loss of interest on the 1,152 dollars, of three per cents from 1st January, 1791, to the 1st January, 1828, thirty-seven years, at three per cent. 1,278 72 and in the same proportion upon every officer's pay or commutation according to his rank. It is ascertained, Mr. Chairman, that the pay of the officers of all grades, from a Major General down to an Ensign, will average the pay of a captain.

Total loss on Captain Dehart's pay down to this time, $2,536 32

If then the loss on a Captain's pay by the operation of the funding system down to this time, amounts to $2,536 32, what will the loss on the 240 officers amount to that are now living? Why, sir, to the sum of $608,716 80, and this sum the United States are withholding from the officers now living, by the strong arm of power, contrary to common justice; and in contravention of the constitution by which you, Mr. Chairman, occupy that Chair. Let us for a moment examine into this case: It is self-evident that a solemn contract existed between the old Confederation and the officers of the army, and in accordance with contract, as has been shown, the old Confederation issued the paper in payment to those officers, which was accepted; and the question recurs—have the United States paid those certificates agreeably to the original contract with the confederation? I have shown Mr. Chairman, incontrovertibly, that they have not, and that the sum of $2,536 32 is now due to each captain, and in the same proportion to every other officer, according to his rank, who remained in service to the close of the war; making in the aggregate $608,716 80 due to the 240 officers now living.

The 6th article of the constitution of the United States reads as follows: "All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution, as under the Confederation;" hence it is apparent that the contract entered into by the Confederation with the officers of the army, is completely recognized by the Constitution of the United States.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, and I think I have shown conclusively, that you are withholding those moneys from the claimants, in violation of that venerable instrument under which you occupy that Chair, and in violation of every principle of justice between man and man, and in despite of the assurances of the immortal Washington to his brother officers, in the name of the Confederation, on the dissolution of the army; and, in my humble opinion, could the United States be brought into Court at the suit of the officers, you would be compelled to refund that which you now withhold by the strong arm of power.

The preceding calculations are predicated upon the acts of the whole Confederation, and of the United States, respectively, to which I have referred, and will, I presume bear the most scrutinizing examination. It may be alleged that I have calculated interest upon interest—be it so. But let it be recollected that the moment interest becomes due, and is paid, it merges in principal, and may be loaned the next day; and had the interest on Capt. Dehart's capital been punctually paid, and himself or his banker managed it in the ordinary way of loaning, it would have amounted to a larger sum than he claims from the Government, or that I allege the United States are indebted to him. Other views have been taken of the subject in relation to the contract of half pay for life; but it will be seen that my calculations are applicable to the non-performance of the contract for the five years' full pay, and is the fundamental basis, in my opinion, on which the claim rests. I may possibly have committed some slight errors in my calculations, but I believe they are substantially correct; and I flatter myself I have shown, irrefragably, that there is now legally due from the United States to every captain of the Revolutionary Army, that were in service at the close of the war, the sum of $2,536 32, and to every other officer, in that proportion, according to his grade, that are now living: making, in the aggregate, the sum of $608,716 80. Hence, Mr. Chairman, those officers do not come here asking a boon of this nation—they merely ask for even a part of their just dues, predicated upon a solemn contract with the Confederation, and as solemnly recognized by the Constitution of the United States.

How then, I will ask, Mr. Chairman, can you escape paying this balance? Will you tell me, that this vast empire is unable to pay her legal and just debts? This you cannot say, inasmuch as your resources are ample: and will you, under all the circumstances of the case, submit to the humiliating dilemma, and establish the fact, that the high-minded sons of the Revolutionary heroes of your country, shall suffer those aged heroes to pine in penury, in want, and depart from the stage of action, creditors of the United States? Surely not. Sir, you was not only just, but you was liberal to that distinguished and gallant foreign officer, Lafayette. It was well, and the nation responded to the noble deed. And, sir, will you refuse to do justice to your native officers, who fought gallantly by his side? I trust not.

It was said by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. ALSTON,) at the last session, in debate, that some or one of those officers were hanging upon the House in relation to their claim. Be it so; but permit me to remind the honorable gentleman of the lowering times that tried men's souls; when the States hung upon those officers for years, in awful suspense; when the fate of this empire was suspended as it were by a brittle thread; and had it been severed as it was intended by the British ministry, and their hordes of mercenary troops, and subsidized Hessians which infested your shores, your fate was inevitably sealed; and you must have again returned to Colonial bondage and degradation, while your Hancocks, your Adamses, your Franklins, your Carrolls, and your Jeffersons, with your Washington and his brave compeers, (according to Gen. Gage,) were destined to the cord. But those undaunted heroes, with Washington for their leader, (though menaced with the halter,) laid their sabres at the root of the tree, and with a hard stroke, and a heavy stroke, and a stroke altogether, they felled the royal oak, and snatched from the British lion the brightest gem of his crown. And Mr. Chairman, what have been the fruits of their hazardous toils, and matchless achievements! Sir, twenty-four free, sovereign, independent States, and three organized Territories, your empire covering one-twelfth of the globe; your shores washed by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans; your canvas whitening every sea; your flag revered by all nations; and your Union complete, prosperous, free, and happy; these are the fruits of the unwearied toils in the hour of danger, of these hangers on. Is it meet then, Mr. Chairman, that a distinguished officer,* acting a distinguished part by the side of Washington, in that great drama of the Revolution, while attending here as agent for his brother officers, in pursuit of that justice which you have but too long denied, be stigmatized by the degrading epithet of dependant or hanger on? Sir, to me the idea is every way inadmissible, and I could charitably hope that it was rather a slip of the tongue of the honorable gentleman, than the spontaneous effusion of the heart. Be that as it may, and however the honorable gentleman may indulge in epithets, to the wounding of the feelings of those officers long smarting under their wrongs, for consolation, and to assuage their grief, I will venture to predict that, although the splendid flinty-marble columns which support that lofty dome, and ornaments this hall, may fall into decay, the sweet and cheering recollections of their meritorious services and brilliant achievements will live forever.

It is an old adage, Mr. Chairman, that although justice may sleep, she is always sure.

I can only say that as it respects the Revolutionary officers, she has slumbered for a long time; but I trust the hour is at hand when she will start from her slumbers, and prevent the famous Newburg anonymous letter writer's predictions being verified, viz: that if the Revolutionary army was disbanded previous to the officers being settled with and paid off, they would grow old in poverty, wretchedness, and contempt; that they would wade through the vile mire of dependence, and owe the miserable remnant of that life to charity, which had hitherto been spent in honor.

But, Mr. Chairman, what was the reply of the immortal Washington to those predictions? He says to his assembled officers, in the then New Buildings at Newburg, on the 15th March, 1783: "If those predictions of this anonymous letter writer are verified, then shall I have learned what ingratitude is—then shall I have realized a tale which will embitter every moment of my future life; but," proceeds the General, "I am under no such apprehensions: a country rescued from impending ruin by your arms, will never leave unpaid the debt of gratitude."

And, Mr. Chairman, the crisis has now arrived, and the decision of this House will settle the question, whether the famous Newburg anonymous letter writer's predictions, or the immortal Washington's shall be verified. In justice to the officers, and for the honor of the nation, I pray God the latter; and I will appeal to you, sir, and to the House, and ask you emphatically, if you can reconcile it with your duty to your country, and your God, to suffer one word of the promises and predictions of the immortal Washington to his brother officers upon that solemn occasion, to fall to the ground; nay, sir, so well am I satisfied of the justice and equity of this claim, that rather than record my name against it, I would adopt the language of one of old, let me be anathema maranatha.

Although the bill before you does not give the officers that which is justly their due, yet I will take it as the man takes his wife, for better for worse. Inasmuch as any amendment will be death to the bill; I hope, therefore, that no amendment will be agreed to.

One word more and I have done: what little you do then, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of those aged veterans, now bending under the hand of time, do quickly: time is flying, and life is on the wing. Do you not, almost weekly, hear the death-knell of one and another of those saviours of your country? And believe me, Mr. Chairman, you will not long have the opportunity of refunding any part of their just dues to the relief of their wants, inasmuch as in a few years they will, each and all, be cut down by the all-devouring scythe of time, and landed at that bourne from whence no traveller returns.

The amendment was negatived—ayes 81, noes 92.

Mr. GILMER moved to amend the first section of the bill, by restricting payment to those officers whose commissions bear date prior to the commencement of the year 1778.

Mr. G. supported his amendment by a short speech, in which he contended that, inasmuch as the bill was not even professed to be a compliance with the contract of 1780, it was removed from the ground of contract, and placed on that of gratuity, and if a gratuitous reward were to be distributed to the officers of the Revolutionary war, it was best deserved by those who had come forward in the early stages of that war, when the result of the contest was wholly doubtful, when individual responsibility was far greater than was incurred by those who entered the army when the contest was more advanced, when the whole nation became thoroughly involved, when foreign aid had been obtained, and when the prospect of a successful issue was much more probable. Of those who received the promise in 1780, many never so much as saw the face of an enemy in the field.

Mr. STERIGERE said, the claims of the Revolutionary officers had been before the nation for half a century. They were known and understood by almost every man in the nation, and he might add, their justice was admitted by almost every man in the nation. In his opinion there existed no doubt of their legality or justice. From the discussion of this question in Congress for several years past, he was convinced there was not a member on the floor who did not understand this subject as well now as he would after a week's debate.

Whether this bill granted the relief the Revolutionary officers were entitled to, was one question—whether any thing better could be now obtained, was another.

He thought it did not go far enough. But, from what had taken place in the other body, it was evident nothing better could be obtained now, and any attempt to obtain any thing better would be useless, and might end in the loss of this bill. As his colleague (Mr. SERGEANT) had very correctly observed, it was now a question whether this bill should pass or none. For one, he would not consent to hazard the fate of the bill by admitting amendment after amendment, and a protracted debate. If a majority of the House are determined to defeat the bill, it may as well be done immediately. If a majority are in favor of its passage, it was unnecessary to waste time in a useless discussion. He was sure that, whatever determination existed in the majority, that no debate which would take place would change that determination.

He believed a speedy decision would be favorable to the passage of the bill. Besides, there was much important business on our tables to be acted on, and the session was drawing near its close, and he thought the House owed it to those interested in that business, as well as to the nation, that the time should not be wasted in useless debate. From the vote which had just been taken, he believed that the House would not agree to any amendment, but was in favor of passing the bill in its present shape. Therefore, with a view to put an end to discussion, and to have the question decided, that the House could go to other business, he moved that the committee rise and report progress, declaring that if his motion prevailed, he should follow it up with another, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, that it might be acted on immediately in the House.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, and Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, successively requested the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion; one of them alluding to an amendment which he wished to offer, (as was understood in relation to the militia,) which would require an increase of appropriation, and could, therefore, be only considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STERIGERE, in reply to Mr. CLARK, said, as the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was pending, his amendment could not be received, if he were to withdraw his motion; and as his object was to prevent farther discussion and amendments, he could not consent to withdraw it, but would leave it to the committee to decide.

The committee rose, and reported the several bills which had been before them.

THURSDAY, May 8.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to amend and explain an act, entitled An act confirming an act of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and an act of the State of Maryland, for the same purpose," was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The House then resumed the bill authorizing a subscription of Stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

Mr. WICKLIFFE was one of those who voted for the law of 1824, authorizing the Executive to make certain surveys, with a view to national improvements; by which I understood works of a national character, in a commercial or military point of view. I gave my vote, on that occasion, from an honest conviction of duty; but with the express understanding, that the objects of a national kind could not be very numerous. My impression was, that they could scarce be over eight or ten, and I think it was so declared by those who advocated the passage of the bill on this floor.

If, sir, the bill of 1824 had proposed the survey of the ninety-one objects exhibited in this Schedule from the War Department, which I will presently read; if those who advocated this bill had been told it was to order the survey of Ashtabula Creek, Cunningham's Creek, and many other Creeks, Lake Memphramagog,* and a host of small lakes and streams, of similar importance, I am inclined to think that they would have found more difficulty in obtaining the vote it received in this House.

Permit me now to read the List of Surveys commenced, with the cost for completing the works.

* By the table and report from the War Department, it will be seen that the administration have commenced a survey of a route for a canal to "unite the waters of the Connecticut River with Memphramagog Lake in New Hampshire." Of the precise extent of this lake, its depth, and importance, I am not informed. We have a traditional story of this lake, that, at one time, it disappeared.—Note by Mr. W.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

H. OF R.

I voted for the same proposition which is embraced in the amendment of the Senate, when the bill making appropriations was before this House, and I voted for the Senate's amendment. I am responsible for that vote to my constituents. I had not then an opportunity of explaining the reasons which influenced that vote, although the obligations to do so were increased by the remarks of two of my colleagues, who addressed the House, and seemed to treat the subject as one peculiarly affecting the interest of Kentucky, and thereby placed me in the attitude of hostility to the interests of my State. It is my purpose now to give the reasons which influenced my vote, and they connect themselves intimately with the subject under consideration.

When I gave my support to the Senate's amendment, I was under the impression that we had at that time extended our system of surveying and reconnoitring nearly far enough, and I voted to limit the appropriation of 80,000 dollars, with a view to the completion of such objects as had already been commenced. I did it from an examination of the number and extent of those objects; I did it with a view to our ability to accomplish them, or such of them as were of national importance. But, in supporting measures of this description, I must draw the line of distinction between objects which are strictly of a national character, connected with the general interests of the whole country, and such as are of mere private, local, and neighborhood consequence.

With these explanatory remarks, I will now pass to the main subject before us. And, in the outset, I will take the liberty to say, that, if the friends of the system of Internal Improvements do not wish to see that system utterly broken down, they must consent to have specific appropriations made for specific surveys. Sir, on this subject I may refer the friends of Republican Institutions to the sentiments of our great Apostle of Liberty and Democracy, (Mr. JEFFERSON,) that man who was the first to establish, in this Government, a system of strict national economy and accountability. The first occasion in which he addressed Congress, he admonished us against the consequences of leaving the expenditure of the public resources to the wild and lawless discretion of any administration whatever. Permit me to read from that message a single paragraph:

"In our care, too, of the public contributions entrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose, susceptible of definition; by disallowing all appropriations varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money; and by bringing back to a single department, all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform."

With this cardinal principle for my guide, I do avow myself the advocate of specific appropriations for all our works of Internal Improvements. And, in pursuance of this general principle, I felt myself called upon to look into what had been the application of a fund placed by our indiscretion at the discretion of the President of the United States.

Having been called to look somewhat particularly into the application of this fund, I confess to you, sir, that the more I examined the subject, the more I became convinced of the necessity of making the appropriations for these surveys specific. My duty, as a member of the Committee of this House, has compelled me to examine, with some care and scrutiny, the expenditures of the various contingent funds, placed under Executive discretion.

That examination has strengthened the conviction I had formed, that it was unwise, if not dangerous, to trust too much to Executive discretion, in the expenditure of public money. It is a discretion liable to abuse, under any and every administration, and none more so than at present.

Under color of the law of 1824, we have expended no less than $110,000 on the surveys of roads and canals. The whole of this sum has been disbursed at the discretion of the President, or of the War Department. Besides these $110,000, expended under that law, we have expended $48,000 under various acts of Congress, making specific appropriations for reconnoissances and surveys, forming an aggregate of $158,000, about $148,000 of which has been expended by this Administration within the last three years. If this was the whole expense we might content ourselves, under the hope that the labor and advantage to the country bore some proportion to the amount expended. To this must be added the increased and increasing expenditures of a growing corps of engineers, and, worse than all, a little army of civil agents, blood-suckers, hangers-on, and dependants, who feed from the public crib, and whose pay and emoluments, and very existence, depend upon Executive discretion and official will—"Non-resistance and passive obedience."

This latter corps amount to about forty, now in the pay of the Government. I refer gentlemen to what is called the Blue Book, some of them with a compensation equal to three hundred dollars per month, fixed by the unrestrained will of the Executive.

These gentlemen, united with the officers of the Army who are engaged in surveying, &c., form a formidable phalanx in the field. The whole expense of this corps, for the last three years, has not been much less than $200,000. We have, it is true, sir, seen some of the fruits of this expenditure, in reports, maps, and charts, the printing and engraving of which has cost us, for the last three years, near $30,000. I do not pretend to say these officers have been idle. No, sir; far from it. They have been kept busily employed, it would seem, from the multiplied number of the national objects that have attracted the attention of the Administration.

I hold in my hand, and have read, a list of the various objects on which they have been employed. Sixty-nine objects were reported to us last session, as having been examined since 1824. Since the last session a large addition has been made to the list. The whole number now is ninety-one, of which I understand thirty-seven only have been completed; for which we have estimates of the expense of carrying them into execution. And the aggregate of these estimates amount to 82,858,000 dollars. Now, sir, if the balance of these ninety-one objects will cost at all in proportion to these thirty-seven, the whole number cannot be completed under $70,000,000 or $100,000,000. Such being the fact, I put it to the House to say, whether it is not the course dictated by prudence, to apply the surplus revenue of the country to the commencement and completion of some of those ninety-one objects, which have been already commenced, rather than to go on and survey new objects? and whether the surveys hereafter ought not to be confined to objects of a strictly national character, rather than be farther extended to merely local and neighborhood objects? If I am not mistaken in my estimate—and I have made it with some care—we have already surveyed or reconnoitred three thousand and fifteen miles of road—all of which remains yet to be made. I find in this list the following roads:

From Washington to New Orleans,	-	1,100	miles
" Baltimore to Philadelphia,	-	90	"
" Washington to Buffalo,	-	250	"
" Black Swamp, Cadiz, Wheeling, &c.	-	150	"
" Miami Rapids to Detroit,	-	70	"
" Cumberland Road, from Zanesville to St. Louis,	-	625	"
" Zanesville, (Ohio,) through Maysville, Lexington, (Ky.,) to Florence, (Alabama,)	-	600	"
" Cumberland, (Md.,) to the District of Columbia,	-	150	"
		3,015	"

The surveys of these roads have all been commenced. They remain yet to be completed. It will require the $30,000 to do this. And yet it is desired by some that the Administration shall still seek for new routes and new roads to be surveyed.

Sir, this latter road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the District of Columbia, is, to my mind, a striking instance of the abuse of this power under the law of 1824. What is called the Cumberland road, commences at Cumberland, in Maryland. On the present route we have, with the exception of about twenty-five miles, an excellent turnpike road. The whole distance is about 130 or 140 miles. It is proposed to make another road, on the Virginia side of the Potomac, by which you may save ten or fifteen miles in the distance of 140 miles. If this canal is completed, no man would think of making this new Cumberland road. Certain I am Congress would not undertake it; for this road, so much needed, of such national importance, there have been no less than six different routes surveyed—around, about, through Leesburgh, and Winchester, Virginia. Sir, can any man believe that it was ever contemplated to do more than survey it? We are asked to commence a turnpike road of 120 miles in length, to save a distance of about fifteen miles.

Mr. Speaker, is it not time for Congress to say to the Department of War, finish some of the routes you have commenced surveying, before you ask us for money to commence new ones? If they have done these things "in the green tree, what may we not expect in the dry?" Look, sir, at this enormous list. [Here Mr. W. referred to the list from the Department, of various roads reconnoitred and surveyed.] I have said, and I do still say, it is time for us to finish some of these projects before we embark in new ones.

I have turned my attention to the States and sections of the Union where surveys are contemplated to be carried on during the next Summer. New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, form the principal theatre of their operations. Where there is a probability of the greatest political strife, it seems always prudent to have these surveyors engaged. Among the list, I see that Barren and Licking Rivers, in Kentucky, are to be surveyed, as national works of internal improvement. Notwithstanding this I was disposed to say to the department, finish first the road through Kentucky, which you have begun; it is of more importance to us than a survey of those two small streams, which have scarcely attracted the attention of the Legislature of the State, further than to declare them navigable, and regulate the height of the mill dams across them. Sir, I will not now say what I might be disposed to do on a fit occasion, with respect to the survey of these rivers, as national works; but allow me to say, there is, in my State, a river called Salt River, which runs through my district, and that of my colleague, (Mr. Moore,) and is, perhaps, not altogether unknown, at least by name, by many gentlemen here. If I had asked a survey of that, it is very possible I might have been "rowed up" it, instead of having it surveyed.

I am ready to admit that many of the objects in this list may possess meritorious claims, and be strictly national in their character; but I will also say, that there are some upon that list, for which I would never vote an appropriation, not even if the Treasury were full to overflowing, and the national debt paid. I ask whether a canal from the Potomac to the Rappahannock is to be denominated a national object of improvement? Did it ever enter the mind, even of the Virginia Legislature, to make this canal, of seven or eight miles in length? I appeal to the gentlemen from Virginia, whose State has expended more money upon internal improvements, in proportion to the advantages derived, than any State in this Union, in consequence of pursuing the very policy which the United States are engaged in. She commenced too many works at the same time. Like her, sir, we have "too many irons in the fire." Yet, sir, we find this route surveyed, as a national work, at public expense, and that, too, just previous to a contested election for a seat on this floor. The inevitable consequence of such a course must be, to excite hopes to be disappointed, waste the public funds upon useless experiments, and bring the whole system into disrepute.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

I forbear, at this time, further comments upon many of the objects contained in this schedule, lest I might, inadvertently, do injury. If gentlemen will turn to the estimates of the department, for the public works heretofore undertaken by the Government, and compare them with the bills rendered and paid by the United States, I believe they will find the former, in all cases, to exceed the latter. The estimate for carrying this canal (the Chesapeake and Ohio) across the mountains, was, if I mistake not, $23,000,000. But, before we see one step taken by the Government towards its commencement, we have four or five different routes surveyed, or reconnoitred, and examined, to connect this canal, which exists only on paper, with Lake Erie. Sir, I should have thought it time enough for those surveys when the canal was finished, or in some likelihood of being soon completed. But there are six or seven different routes surveyed for connecting a canal, not made, with Lake Erie. Sir, if we could once see the canal boats crossing the Alleghany mountains, we could better judge of the expediency of forming the connection with Lake Erie. If the Ohio Canal and the Grand Canal of New York, are found not sufficient channels for inter-communication with the Lakes, I might be disposed to aid by an appropriation of money an examination of the project for throwing an arm of this canal across into Lake Erie.

It will be recollected that, in the Spring of 1826, Congress subscribed $100,000 to the stock of a company in Kentucky, who were making a canal at the Falls of the Ohio. This Canal is a work of national importance. It is intended to remove the difficulty in the navigation of a river which forms a boundary of nine States in this Union; the only outlet to a market for the rich and various productions of that fertile region.

It will be found to be money well expended, and in dividends paying the interest on the stock invested. This work has been of deep concern and great solicitude to the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana. Great expense has been incurred, and labor spent, in order to ascertain on which side of this river the canal should be located. Both banks had been surveyed, and the costs estimated by men, in whose judgment as much confidence should be placed as by any officer in your corps of engineers. It was ascertained to be practicable to make a canal on either side; but that on the Kentucky shore was believed to be the least expensive. No further surveying on either side was necessary. Such was the interminable disposition of the department to surveying, that, although there could not be an engineer spared to survey or examine the road through Kentucky, in 1826 one or more could be found to reconnoitre the falls of Ohio, on the Indiana shore. I ask, for what purpose? Did Indiana desire further information? Do the United States design to open an opposition canal around the Falls? Will any person say that capital and labor would be profitably employed, if vested in two canals around this obstruction?

At whose instance was this survey around the Falls made? I am induced to believe it was not done at the suggestion of the worthy representative of that district, whose vigilance to the interests of his State and constituents all will acknowledge.

Mr. Speaker: Entertaining the opinions which I do upon the subject of Internal Improvements, I have witnessed with deep solicitude, the course this Administration have pursued to execute the trust reposed in them by the act of 1824. I have believed that the practical operation of the system, to the unlimited extent to which its own zealous advocates wish to carry it, will do more to defeat the whole plan, than all the constitutional arguments which have ever been urged against it on this floor.

If it is designed to pass the boundary which divides national from mere local measures, and apply the revenues of the United States to the purposes of improving our rivers, creeks, and roads, it would be a much safer plan to distribute the money equally among the several States, and let the State Legislatures expend it upon such objects as their judgment may approve.

Mr. MERCE made a brief reply, in which he implored the friends of internal improvement not to enter into a general discussion of the subject of surveys, but to confine themselves to the subject immediately before the House, and come to a speedy decision as to the fate of the present bill. He had hoped not to be obliged to enter into debate on the question, but had anticipated answering any inquiries which might be addressed to him on the subject.

Mr. HOFFMAN then put a variety of queries to Mr. MERCE, as Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, calculated to elicit a statement of facts in relation to the probable expenditure of the canal—the time of its completion—the resources of the Company—and the benefit likely to result to the General Government from the proposed subscription—and, also, what benefit the United States had derived from the subscriptions it had heretofore made to similar companies?

Mr. MERCER replied, at some length, to the several points of this inquiry. Supposing the present bill to succeed, the company would then have subscribed to its stock $3,600,000. The canal was divided into three sections—the eastern, middle, and western. The eastern section was 186 miles in length; the middle 85, and western section 121, making the total length of the canal 342 miles. If the canal should be made of the same dimensions with the Grand Canal of New York, the total cost of the eastern section would be $3,600,000; or, with the allowances for the usual contingencies, about $4,000,000. If it was made forty-eight feet wide, its cost would be increased by about $200,000, and if, as was most desirable, and upon the whole, most economical, it should be made sixty feet in width, and five feet deep, its cost would be about $4,500,000. He then stated the subscriptions of stock by the several corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, amounting in all to one million and a half. He stated the undoubted ability of these Corporations to comply with their engagements, and besides, that ability would be vastly increased by the very effect of the enterprise, in reducing the price of one of the prime necessities of life, the article of fuel, in such a manner as to produce a net saving of one hundred and twelve thousand dollars in the annual consumption of that article. Coal of the very best quality could be furnished in this city, so soon as the first section of the canal should be completed, at 12½ cents per bushel. He then adverted to the provisional subscription on the part of the State of Maryland, of half a million of dollars, to take effect when $2,500,000 should be subscribed from other sources. He then proceeded to make a few remarks with regard to the number and amount of private subscriptions, the highly respectable character of the subscribers generally, and their ability to pay the sums which they had subscribed. When the canal had reached Cumberland, it would prove itself to be a very profitable enterprise, and there would be no difficulty in obtaining further funds, either in this country, or in Europe. Its total cost from Georgetown to Pittsburgh, would probably amount to about ten millions. The stock of the English canals was profitable in a high degree; that of one of them having advanced from £100 to £4,000 per share. The greater portion of these profits were derived from the carrying of fuel. As to the benefits to be derived from the canal, the profits of the stock would be shared by the Government in proportion to its subscription, while the benefits of a commercial and a political kind would ultimately reach every part of the Union.

Mr. M. adverted to the subject of railroads, which had been set up by some gentleman as a rival to the cause of the present canal, and a reason for their opposition to it. He professed the most sincere desire for their success, allowed them to be superior to canals, where light and swift transportation was required, but insisted on the vast superiority of canals, in point of cheapness, for the conveyance of heavy commodities. Under the present form of this bill, the constitutional question could not legitimately come up, and he hoped no attempt would be made to discuss it. He adverted to the proprietary right of the Government in 8,350 lots within this city; that being the case, the Government and people ought to unite in forwarding a measure which promised very greatly to augment the value of real estate in the District.

Mr. HAMILTON, after adverting to the remarks which had been made by Mr. MERCER, as to the undoubted solvency and ability of all who had subscribed to the stock of the company, presumed he could have no objections to having the bill slightly amended by the insertion of the following proviso, which he offered to guard against the United States being reduced to the very awkward situation of finding itself left the sole proprietor of a work not half completed:

“Provided, That no part of the saidsum shall be paid by the United States, until the other subscribers to the stock shall have paid up the amount of their respective subscriptions.”

Mr. MERCER objected to this amendment, the practical effect of which would be to destroy the bill. What it proposed was, that the United States should pay its subscription, not pari passu with the other stockholders, but after all the rest had paid. If, then, it should happen that some one individual who had subscribed to the stock should die, and no administration be had upon his estate, the whole subscription of the United States would be tied up; the same would take place in the case of widows and orphans, besides which, some cases would, in all probability, occur of derelict stock, owned by foreigners dying abroad, whose heirs were unknown. In reply to Mr. HAMILTON, as to the vast amount which the canal had been estimated to cost, Mr. MERCER stated, that the reduction which had been made in the estimate of the United States Engineers, had been made, not by him, nor by the Committee on Roads and Canals, but principally by two of the most distinguished Engineers in the United States, Messrs. Geddes & Roberts, than whom none could be more competent to the task. They had both passed over the whole of the proposed line of the canal, and were well acquainted with the ground. Mr. Roberts had enjoyed great experience in the canals of New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, and Mr. Geddes, who had struck the first staff into the earth, in laying out the great Western Canal of the State of New York, had been conversant with all the details of his profession, and had grown gray in the practice of it. There was no mystery in the subject of these estimates. The excavation of earth, embankments, and the erection of stone work, were matters of plain, practical calculation. The estimates made by the Military Engineers, were such as might be expected from them. A scientific chief, who had reaped glory by following the conqueror of Europe from one end of the continent to the other, was not likely to be so accurately acquainted with the prices of labor in this country, as a practical native, who had grown up in it, and had long conducted operations of a similar kind among American farmers and mechanics. He adverted to several items in the estimates of the Engineers, which were manifestly extravagant. One of them consisted of $2,700,000 for stone walls; every perch of which was estimated at $8; while Mr. M. had ascertained, from an examination of the expenses of fifteen different canals, that a wall of that description had never cost more than one dollar. This was sufficient to show that their estimates of $23,000,000 were not at all to be relied upon.

Mr. MARTIN offered an amendment, which he believed would be acceptable both to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERCKE) and to his colleague, (Mr. HAMILTON.) The amendment is as follows:

"Nor shall any greater sum be paid on the shares so subscribed for, than shall be proportionate to the assessments made on, and paid by, individual and corporate stockholders."

Mr. HAMILTON accepted the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN briefly explained, and supported his amendment, the effect of which would be, to require the United States to pay only in proportion as the other subscribers paid.

Mr. MERCKE said that, if that was the intention of the amendment, it was reached by the present provisions of the bill, and he quoted the following words from the first section:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to subscribe, &c., and to pay for the same, at such times, and in such proportions as shall be required of the stockholders, generally, by the rules and regulations of the company, out of the dividends which may accrue to the United States upon their Bank Stock, in the Bank of the United States."

Messrs. MARTIN and HAMILTON insisted that the provision in the amendment was more explicit than that in the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed that the distinction was broad and important, as the bill provided that the United States should pay no more than what was required from other stockholders; but the amendment said that the United States were to pay no more than in proportion to what was actually paid by other subscribers.

Mr. MERCKE replied, that, if such a provision was insisted upon in any joint stock company, it would not exist a single year. He, therefore, considered the amendment as going to destroy the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN supported the amendment. It was only intended to guard the interests of the United States against the effect of specious lists of subscribers, respectable in appearance, but insolvent in fact.

Mr. STANBERRY remarking that the object of this bill was of high importance to the people of many parts of the country, and to none more than to the State of which he was a Representative, to put an end to debate which might, in the end, defeat the bill, required the previous question, and his call was sustained—ayes 64, noes 56.

[The vote was afterwards reconsidered.]

Mr. MARTIN, disclaiming all intention, by his motion for an amendment, to defeat the bill in any indirect manner, and explaining what he now understood to be the effect of his former amendment, moved to amend the bill as follows:

Insert, at the end of the first proviso—

"Nor shall any greater sum be paid on the shares so subscribed for, than shall be proportioned to assessments made on individual or corporate stockholders—nor until one-half of the aggregate amount of such assessments shall have been paid."

Mr. HAYNES moved to amend the amendment, by restoring it to the form in which it was first offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, preferring it in that form.

Mr. MARTIN opposed this motion, on the ground that its practical effect would be, entirely to defeat the bill; for, although the Government should have subscribed a million of dollars, and be bound to advance $200,000 every year, yet, according to this amendment, if a single stockholder should fail in paying a single dollar of his subscription, the Government would be free from its engagement.

Mr. STEWART stated, that subscription books had been opened through all the country, and there were in his district more than one hundred shares subscribed to the stock, many of the subscribers taking but a single share. They were scattered about in various directions, and if by any accident it should happen that any one of these persons held back his subscription, not a cent could be received from the United States in the meanwhile. He earnestly hoped an amendment like that would never be sanctioned by the House.

Mr. GILMER suggested to his colleague, that this difficulty would be obviated by striking out the word "or," and inserting the word "and;" which was accepted by Mr. HAYNES as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. G. briefly explained the effect of this alteration; which would be to bind the United States to pay up its subscription only in the same proportion as the aggregate amount subscribed, as well by corporations as individuals, should be paid in.

Mr. KREMER approved of neither of the amendments. If this object was of sufficient importance to induce the Government to subscribe for it, the United States should come in as a subscriber, on precisely the same footing in every respect, as all other subscribers. If the amendment were adopted, and the Government should in effect say, that they would only pay as much in proportion as Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, had paid, who could be got to take upon him the office of Collector? If one subscriber refused to pay the quota required until he was satisfied that all other subscribers had done the same, how could the Company ever get on? He was for extending precisely the same benefit to this Company, which the Government had extended when it subscribed to the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. Its subscription in that case was trammelled with no such conditions, and why should it be trammelled now? If there was any feature which ought to make a Government of Republicans, it was the observance of equal justice.

Mr. CARTER was satisfied that the bill required amendment. It must be evident to all, that a mere requisition to pay is not the same thing as payment, and as the bill now stood, the United States might be called on to pay, notwithstanding the insolvency of all her associates. Mr. C. concluded by expressing his preference of the amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR now proposed the form of an amendment, which went to require that the United States shall pay pari passu with the States and Corporations subscribing for the Stock, but not with individuals.

Mr. MERCER expressed his preference of the amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN. He approved of it, however, only because he must. He found himself in a state of duress, and that, unless he yielded to a certain extent, he could not hold even his friends. He believed the amendment would be productive of no practical injury, as it was impossible that the States and corporations, who had subscribed to the stock, would fail to comply with their engagements.

Mr. HAYNES defended the amendment he had offered, suggesting that it was the same which had been inserted in the bill to aid the Louisville Canal Company. If the corporations should fail to pay up their subscriptions, the Government would be left with the whole project upon their hands; and when the Company should once have got its hands into the Treasury, a powerful appeal would be made to Congress not to abandon what it had begun.

Mr. MERCER replied, that the bill, in this respect, was a literal copy of that authorizing a subscription of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company.

Mr. SERGEANT expressed himself willing to acquiesce in the amendment, though he thought there was much force in the observations of his colleague, (Mr. KREMER.) The United States ought, if it were practicable, to be put on the same footing with every other subscriber; but as each subscriber had a sovereign right with respect to the paying or withholding of his own subscription, there seemed a necessity for some guard, lest the Government should be compelled to go on with its payments after all prospects had ceased of a successful prosecution of this work. He reminded Mr. K. that the present course was the same as had been pursued by Pennsylvania in the case of the Union Canal.

Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, inquired what provision was contained in the charter, in case the subscribers should not pay up their stock.

Mr. MERCER, in reply, read the fifth section of the charter.

Mr. GILMER now explained the effect of the amendment offered by Mr. HAYNES, as going to guard against any great failure on the part of any of the other parties subscribing. He believed, for his own part, that neither of the Corporations of Washington, Georgetown, or Alexandria, was vested with the power to subscribe into such a company. Not a dollar could be collected from either of them: for who was then to issue the quo warranto to dissolve the corporation?

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, opposed the amendment. He was against subscribing at all, unless the work was to be gone on with, and if the Government did subscribe, it ought to enjoy the same privileges as other subscribers, and no more. According to the amendment, the United States might withhold their payment until the Corporations and individuals had paid in theirs; but, if this right existed at all, it was a mutual right, and others might as well wait for the Government. Congress ought not to touch the matter, unless it meant to go on with the work whether others did or no. Supposing Alexandria should fail to pay up its subscription, and, in consequence of that, the Government should also withhold its subscription—would not the Government stock be liable to be sold under the charter? He thought the United States ought to pay up its own subscription faithfully, and sell the stock of all defaulters.

The question was now taken on the amendment of Mr. HAYNES, and negatived; the amendment of Mr. MARTIN was carried.

Mr. MERCER replied to an inquiry of Mr. HOFFMAN, in relation to the profit which the United States had derived from its subscription in other companies. No dividends had yet been received, because the works to which she subscribed were not yet complete.

Mr. HOFFMAN then went into an extended speech in opposition to the whole measure, which he considered as a stock-jobbing scheme, the least participation in which was degrading to the Government. If the United States did possess the constitutional power to carry on works of Internal Improvement, (which he denied,) let her take this work into her own hands, and do it in a manner worthy of herself.

Mr. BARNEY moved the previous question; which was sustained—ayes 70, noes 50.

The Speaker put the previous question: "Shall the main question now be put?"

On which, the yeas and nays stood—yeas 115, nays 64.

FRIDAY, May 9.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

The bill authorizing a subscription, on the part of the United States, in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, having been read a third time, and the question being, "Shall it pass?"

Mr. WHITTLESEY said: The gentleman was pleased in his examination of the report of the Secretary of War, detailing the different routes surveyed under the act of April 30th, 1824, to notice the routes surveyed in the northern part of the State of Ohio, to connect the waters of the Lake with those of the Ohio, by means of a canal; and he seemed to think that these surveys were useless, inasmuch as the Eastern section of the canal was not completed, and that they were made from political considerations. The blame of carrying into effect the law of 1824, in this instance, is, as usual, laid at the door of the present Administration; but, if the gentleman is as unfortunate in his other statements as he is in those relating to these surveys, I should hope he would retract the charges he has made.

The extension of the Ohio and Chesapeake Canal to the Lakes is necessary, before that great work can be said to be completed, or before it can be said to be eminently useful. This is necessary to open a water communication to the lands owned by the United States, on Lake Erie and the Upper Lakes, with the Metropolis of the nation. The extension of the canal to Lake Erie was contemplated by the eminent person (General WASHINGTON) who first suggested the practicability of connecting the Eastern and Western waters, by a canal. That idea has never been abandoned by those who have cherished a belief that any part of this canal would be constructed. Soon after the passage of the act of 1824, an application was made to Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, for a reconnoissance of the country from the Ohio River to Lake Erie, and he gave the order for this examination, and detailed for the service General Bernard and other scientific gentlemen. This corps traversed the country, and made a favorable report, which may be found among the printed documents. It was understood, at the time, that Mr. Calhoun left this city for the purpose of accompanying the Engineers to the Lake, but was prevented by the sickness of his family. The report of the Engineers being favorable, an order was afterwards given to have a route surveyed from the Ohio River to Lake Erie, at Ashtabula. It was ascertained that a sufficient quantity of water could not be obtained for this route without bringing to the summit level the water of French Creek; and a reconnoissance was made, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of using that stream as a feeder. The result was favorable; but as the Engineers had been directed to examine a route in Western Pennsylvania, and, as the State of Pennsylvania had undertaken a system of Internal Improvement, and would necessarily use this water in some of her works, that route was not further surveyed. When the Convention sat in this city, in December, 1825, a proposition was submitted to that body, to have a survey made from a line run by Col. Kearney, in the State of Pennsylvania, to the Ohio Canal, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of uniting, by this cross cut, the Ohio Canal with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, if it should terminate in Pennsylvania; or for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was not the most favorable route for the extension of the main canal. The subject was debated on two several days, and was well understood, and the Convention recommended the proposition to the favorable consideration of the President, under the provision of the act mentioned. The Convention also passed a resolution, declaring distinctly that its members did contemplate an extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to Lake Erie, or to some water communication connecting with it. There is not any canal of the same length, of greater national importance. It will open, in connection with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, or with the Pennsylvania Canal, whichever may be constructed, a direct communication with the extensive country bordering on those great inland waters. On it will be conveyed the produce destined for a market south of New York, which may be brought up the Ohio Canal. So important has it been considered by the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio, that they have concurred in incorporating a company, for the purpose of constructing it; and this company will, in due time, apply to Congress for aid and assistance in completing the work.

The gentleman has also seen proper to find fault with the surveys made for harbors at Ashtabula, and at Cunningham's Creek, and supposes that these, with the other surveys, were made to accommodate neighborhoods.

The gentleman must have been unacquainted with the importance of the commerce on that Lake, and with the danger to which it is exposed, or, I am sure, he would not have seized on these surveys as a ground for criminating those who administer the Government. Sir, there is not a natural harbor on the whole of that coast, from Buffalo to Sandusky—a distance of more than two hundred and fifty miles. The sudden storms of winds are violent, and greatly endanger both the commerce and the lives of those employed in carrying it on. The construction or improvement of harbors there, is as much in aid of commerce, so far as principle is involved, as similar works are on the seashore. The value of that commerce now, in importations, by which I mean (said Mr. W.) all goods shipped at Buffalo, amounts to not less than five millions annually, and is rapidly increasing. I have, said he, sufficient evidence in my possession to prove this assertion. The amount of exports is very great.

Mr. GILMER said, that in opposing the final passage of the bill under consideration, he should avoid discussing any objection which arose out of the provisions of the constitution. He should feel that his time and efforts were worse than wasted, in endeavoring to resist the violation of that great fundamental law of our Union. He observed, that there had been too many proofs during the present session, that the combinations of party intrigue, and the union of selfish interests, operated much more powerfully in determining all questions depending upon legislative authority, than regard for the essential powers of the Government, to justify him, at this late period of the session, in saying any thing upon that subject. He should, therefore, in the few remarks which he should make, consider only the question of the expediency of this Government becoming a joint undertaker with the Corporations of this District, and a few individuals in making the proposed Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. And this question he considered one of the most important that had agitated the United States. That, in truth, it was the great question, whether any form of Government could secure to the great body of the people, the certain enjoyment of a due share of the profits of their labor.

We have boasted (and who had not felt pride in the truth of the boast) that ours was the only Government which protected alike the interest of the rich and the poor, and where all were equally entitled to every privilege. In fact, that privileges were unknown to our free country. That here the true object of Government had alone been attained, in securing, by its peculiar organization, the rights of those who were unable, by ignorance, poverty, or weakness, to protect themselves from the ambition or grasping cupidity of those, in whose hands power usually centered. He remarked, that, upon this subject alone, he had been an enthusiast. He had felt more zeal for the country's service, because the poorest man in it was as secure in the enjoyment of his property as the most wealthy, than in any display of national power and authority. He had believed, that the great and patriotic men to whom we were indebted for our political institutions, had succeeded in effecting what others had struggled for in vain. He asked if his enthusiasm in these opinions of his had been the result of an over-heated imagination. He observed, that the policy which the Federal Administration had pursued for the last few years satisfied him that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible for any Government so to be framed that its conduct would not be directed by, and for the advantage of, the active and influential members of society. The struggle by the body of the people to protect themselves from the cupidity of the select classes, had commenced with the origin of Government; and that wealth, intelligence, and the force which the few were always able to combine, had invariably overcome in that struggle. That a struggle of very nearly the same kind had formerly excited all the energies of our people; but that, since the signal victory then obtained by popular rights, the funding and banking systems, the war, and the erection of numerous corporations, with large capitals, for manufacturing and other purposes, had organized new and powerful interests, which had years ago commenced, and were now carrying on a more successful attack upon the great rights of the community.

Mr. G. observed, that he had no doubt that every member of the House understood the nature of the increased force which wealth and intelligence derived from the smallness of the numbers of those, who, in every country, wielded those great levers of society. And he hoped that they would, without difficulty, understand the reasons upon which he had attempted to show the expediency of confining the authority of the State and Federal Governments within the limits already stated. But, (Mr. G. observed,) if any proofs were wanting of the truth of the distinctions which he had made, he supposed they might be found in the history of the policy pursued by the Federal Government, of late years. He would take a familiar example, which, he thought, could be found in the West Point Academy. That institution owed its origin to the collection of a few of the officers of the Army, for the purpose of improvement in the scientific part of their profession, at West Point, by order of the Government. At the commencement of the late war, the numbers were enlarged to two hundred and fifty, and, by construction, to two hundred and sixty-two. After the war was ended, when it was determined to make the national defence depend chiefly upon the Navy, when the Army had been reduced to six thousand men, and there was every probability of a long-continued peace, repeated efforts were made to reduce the number of Cadets at West Point. These efforts had failed, because the members of Congress, and their friends, through them, were enabled, by the means of that institution, to procure the education of their children at the public expense, and to prepare them for avocations of life wholly unconnected with the military service.

Mr. G. then observed, that every one united in feelings of gratitude to those by whom our revolution was effected; but that the advantages secured by that revolution were very differently estimated by different portions of the community. One party appeared to consider the establishment of a great and splendid National Government, well-equipped armies, numerous fleets, grand canals, highly ornamented public buildings, and the encouragement of the fine arts, as the most desirable results of that great event; whilst the other would be fully satisfied by having individual happiness secured to every citizen, by protecting his rights to the enjoyment of the largest possible share of the profits of his labor. These two parties, he said, had existed in all free Governments. It was the strife between the Democracy and Aristocracy. And although we had no titled nobility, and were all novi homines, yet we had an aristocracy, not the less powerful because it is not artificial. He knew that it was said that our Government was Republican, and that we had a Democratic Administration; for his part, he thought a large portion of the members of the Administration were like the head of it, but pseudo-Democrats.

Mr. G. then proceeded to apply the general remarks he had made to the bill before the House; insisting that the proposed canal for connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio was too visionary in its conception, would be too expensive in its execution, and too profitless in its enjoyment, to have been undertaken by any Government properly regardful of the profits of the people's labor. He stated, that neither the State Governments, nor any association of private individuals, ever would have attempted to have made the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. The fact, that the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, were its projectors, and, apparently, chiefly interested in its execution, Mr. G. stated, was no contradiction of what he had said. These States, he observed, expected to reap advantages, fully equal to their expenditures, and that the individuals of that company might expect to be amply rewarded for their advancements, out of the profits of the agencies and contracts which an expenditure of 23 millions would create, and that a considerable portion of the subscription of that company was in Potomac stock, known to be of little value. And he observed that both those States and that company would advance money only from the expectation that the largest portion of the expense would be borne by the Federal Government. He observed that the subscription for stock by the Corporations of Washington City, and Georgetown, and Alexandria, might be called a phenomenon in the history of stock-jobbing. Those corporations, created for the purpose of regulating the police of their towns, had, without authority, and contrary to the nature and design of their institutions, subscribed $1,500,000 for stock. He observed, that these subscriptions he considered a lure to, or rather the cover under which the Government was to commence stock-jobbing itself, and was to be induced to advance so far, in expending its treasure upon the canal, as to be finally compelled to carry it on when all the other parties to the undertaking had become unable or unwilling to expend anything more upon it. He said that he had no doubt that those corporations would have subscribed $100,000,000 for stock in the company, if they could not otherwise have induced the Government to become the responsible stockholders. What means, he asked, had the declining Corporations of Georgetown and Alexandria of paying their subscriptions, and what power had the corporation of Washington City to compel its citizens to pay such a subscription? He admitted that it was to have been expected that those corporations would use all the means they could control, to induce the Government to make the canal, and in what he had said in relation to them, he wished to be understood, not so much as censuring their conduct, as that of the Government in making their subscription any reason for its expenditure.

Mr. G. then admitted, that all his general remarks would be inapplicable to the immediate subject under consideration, provided it could be shown that there was a reasonable probability that the canal would yield the ordinary rate of profit. He observed, also, that by profit he did not mean the mere toll which could be collected for transported produce, but all the advantages which any portion of the people would derive from it. He asserted that profit was the only object which could justify such improvements.

Mr. G. then proceeded to examine the question, whether a reasonable profit was likely to be enjoyed by the people of the United States from what the Government should lay out in completing the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. He stated, that the best means of determining such a question would be by ascertaining the cost of making the canal, the quantity of every material which it would transport, the difference between the advantages of that transportation and such as could otherwise have been attained, and the benefit of the new market which it would give to the productions of the country. As to the first point of inquiry, to wit, the cost of the canal, he stated that there had been much difference of opinion. The United States Engineers, employed specially for the purpose of determining that point, had estimated it at $22,875,429 69 cents. He said that great efforts had been made by the special partisans of the canal, to lower that estimate. But, observed Mr. G., if that should be an over-rated estimate, it was the first that the Government has yet been furnished with by its Engineers. He stated his belief, that the expense would far exceed the calculation which he had mentioned, and that belief, he said, was founded upon the singularity of the attempt to make a canal over a very extensive range of mountains, and the impossibility of foreseeing all the obstructions which would be found to exist in the execution of such a work. And the House, he observed, would perceive the force of what he said, when it recollected the number of locks, bridges, culverts, &c., which were supposed to be necessary, and the fact that the expense of one tunnel of five miles' length, it was calculated, would cost $3,500,000.

Mr. G. then proceeded to examine the second point he had made, to wit: the quantity of material which would be transported by the canal. He stated, that the largest portion of its route was either through a very sterile country, or an extensive range of uncultivated mountains. He admitted that one portion of it passed through a very different kind of country. He remarked that the valley between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany Mountains was not surpassed in richness of soil, salubrity of climate, picturesque scenery, and the industrious habits of its people, by any part of the world. It was, indeed, he said, to him a most lovely and beloved land, endeared by a thousand of the most tender and happy recollections.

But the valley, Mr. G. observed, was too small in extent, to justify a very large expenditure for the purpose of lessening the price which its inhabitants had to pay for the carriage of their produce. He further observed, that many were of the opinion that the flour, hemp, and pork, of the Western country, would be transported by the canal. But he thought differently himself. He stated that no country, so inland, had so fine a natural communication with the ocean, as that upon the waters of the Mississippi. He stated also, that the canal from the Ohio to Lake Erie would soon be completed, and would furnish an easier (though not quite so short) communication with the Atlantic than the proposed canal. He asked whether it was to supply Virginia and Maryland with horses and hogs?

Mr. LEFFLER said that, when he came to the hall this morning, it was not his intention to have said any thing on the question now under consideration; but, from the course which the discussion had taken, representing as he did a district largely interested in this matter, he felt bound to say something, and that his remarks should be confined to some extent in reply to the objections urged against the passage of the bill, by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. GILMER.)

The gentleman from Georgia sets out by stating what might be called with some propriety a political axiom; he says that Governments are formed for the protection of the weak against the strong, and infers that the incorporation of this company will be oppressive, instead of a benefit to the people. Now, sir, I am at a loss to see the application or force of this argument; it seems to me to prove too much. If the incorporation of companies be oppressive, then this Government and the several State Legislatures have been in error from the first establishment of our institutions: for they have all, from the beginning, been in the continued practice of granting corporate powers. In fact, the argument, without going further, is fully met by the experience of the country: for great as the bugbears have been which have been held up to the public gaze, by some statesmen, in relation to corporations, yet I doubt whether the gentleman from Georgia, or any gentleman, can show that they have been oppressive to the people; while I think it must be admitted that the incorporation of companies in the United States, has, in a variety of instances, been of great public utility. The only thing necessary to secure the rights of the citizen, is to have the law well grounded; and from the examination which I have given his bill, and all the laws relating to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, I am perfectly satisfied that this object is fully attained.

The next objection urged by the gentleman from Georgia is, that we are about to make a canal to a point where there is no market. I must confess I felt some surprise at hearing the honorable member thus express himself. For the talents of that gentleman I entertain a high opinion: and how he could arrive at this conclusion, is to me matter, not only of surprise, but great astonishment. Why, sir, I hazard nothing in saying that this point opens to a market equal to any in North America. It is about midway of your Atlantic coast, presenting all the advantages of the trade along your whole seaboard; and at once puts you afloist on the ocean, whence you may command the market of the world. This is the light in which I would regard this branch of the subject, not, as I suppose the gentleman meant, that we intended nothing more than to avail ourselves of the markets of Georgetown, this city, and Alexandria. No, sir, they will receive their portion of the benefits, but we have greater and higher objects in view; we wish, and if this bill passes, I hope we shall all see the day when the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal will be the great avenue from the west to the ocean, affording facilities to some millions of the people, by which they can avail themselves of any market they choose. But the gentleman from Georgia says, if the canal was made, but little produce will pass along it. If he were as well acquainted with the Western country as many gentlemen in this hall, he would have no difficulty in coming to a very different conclusion. He would readily see, that we not only wanted the means of getting to market, but that we had the products, in great abundance to supply a market. Yes, sir, the produce of the West is incalculable. Give us a market, and there is no limit to our resources. Every year we drive from west of the Alleghany Mountains, between eighty and one hundred thousand head of hogs. We send immense quantities of tobacco, whiskey, bacon, and many other articles, and the time has been, and may be again, when the country on the seaboard will have to depend on the upper and Western country for their iron and salt. Yes, sir, the iron and salt is found principally in, and west of, the Alleghany Mountains. In time of war, when these articles cannot be imported, the supply must, in some measure, come from the West. Without this canal, they must come enormously high, if got at all; because they are heavy articles and of difficult transportation. Besides these products, the people who will avail themselves of the benefits of this canal raise immense quantities of grain, of every kind. In fact, wheat is the staple article of a great portion of the Western country, and its culture can be enlarged to almost any quantity. To match the Eastern cities, as the Western people can, by this canal, with their flour, it must be evident to every gentleman, is a matter well deserving the favorable consideration of this House. Sir, as the people of the West are now situated, they have no market for this great staple of their country, except at the city of New Orleans—a market perhaps more fluctuating and precarious than any other that can be named; and from 1,500 to 2,000 miles distant from the wheat country, and that, too, in a climate where the elements seem to combine not only to injure the quality of our produce, but to destroy the lives of our citizens, hundreds of whom have fallen victims to its influence.

But, again: The gentleman from Georgia states, that this and the adjacent cities are surrounded by large forests; and that, while wood remains plenty, there will be no considerable coal trade on the canal. It is true, Mr. Speaker, there is considerable timber not far distant from these cities, yet wood costs, I am informed, from four to six dollars per cord—a price certainly not very low. Open this canal to the coal mines, and I cannot entertain a doubt, you will at once bring into existence an immense coal trade, by which this city, Georgetown, Alexandria, Norfolk, and other places, will be supplied with great quantities of that valuable article at twelve and a half cents per bushel. From these facts, therefore, I think I have shown that the gentleman from Georgia must be, in some measure, mistaken in his views on this subject.

But he goes further: He supposes that canals never succeed well, except in old populous countries; that the country through which this canal is to pass, contains too thin a population; and has gone into a detailed account of canals in Europe. Why, sir, the two countries are vastly different, both in locality and their articles of commerce. Neither England, Ireland, nor Scotland, export many of the heavy bulky articles. Their territory is small, and is entirely surrounded by navigable waters; their exports are generally of manufactured articles of great value, light, and of small bulk, and consequently of easy transportation. The case is very different here; our products, for the most part, are of the heavy, bulky kind, lie in the interior, and are far from navigation; and hence the greater necessity for canals. So far as regards the population, the gentleman is equally wide from the mark. Yes, sir, more than two millions of your citizens are now anxiously looking to this Congress for the passage of this bill, that the canal may be commenced. All Western Pennsylvania, all Western Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, hold a large stock in this enterprise. Independent of the vast population to be benefited between tide water and the mountains, in my humble judgment, it would puzzle the ingenuity of the gentleman from Georgia, either in the old or the new world, to point to the case that has equal claims even on the score of population; and I would say further, that, when so large a population make their appeal to Congress, it becomes a grave question, and should be met in that spirit, and not in the spirit of ridicule. The gentleman from Georgia urges, as another objection, that the city corporations and the individual stockholders will never pay up their subscriptions, and that the burden will eventually fall on the Government. This, again, in my humble judgment, is a delusion: for the bill itself contains an express guard against any such contingency. And besides, we have the strongest evidence of the ability and willingness of all to join heartily in the work.

Mr. Speaker: Having made these remarks in reply to some of the arguments urged against the passage of this bill, let us look at this question in another light; here is an improvement carrying with it, perhaps, more of national character than any that can be made in these United States; the very first great national improvement that attracted the attention of our ancestors, and which has been viewed and approved of since the foundation of the Government, as one of the great means of holding this Union together. Yes, sir, when that country west of the mountains was yet a wilderness, that great patriot and statesman, General Washington, in looking into futurity, foresaw that sectional feelings and sectional interests were to take root, and grow up in this land. To guard against their consequences was to his mind a matter of no small moment. He could readily see that this was the rock on which this fair fabric was the most likely to be dashed into pieces. He was, therefore, the first to recommend a union of the eastern and western waters, on the very line of the proposed canal. Is there nothing due to his judgment? Is his paternal address, on his retirement from office, not to be our inheritance, and are we not to look upon this as the favored moment to give greater strength to this vast Republic?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, moved the previous question.

His demand was sustained by the House—ayes 90.

The previous question being then put and carried,

The main question was then put—"Shall this bill pass?" and decided by—

SATURDAY, May 10.

Electoral Votes for President.

Mr. WILDE moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate of the United States, respectfully requesting that body to transmit to this House, if in their possession, copies of the several certificates and lists of all the votes given for President and Vice President, on the first Wednesday of December, 1824, or of so many thereof as were received, opened, and counted in this House, on the second Wednesday in February, 1825, when the persons who fill the offices of President and Vice President were ascertained and declared.

Mr. WILDE said, a word or two of explanation might be expected from him, and perhaps was necessary. He would be as brief as possible. At the last election of President, he had the honor to be a member of that House. While the certificates and lists of the votes were in the act of being read, it struck him that, in some of them, it did not appear the requisitions of the constitution had been complied with. The twelfth article, it would be borne in mind, provided that the election shall be by ballot, and the Electors shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and, on distinct ballots, the person voted for as Vice President. It had then appeared to him that the certificates from some of the States did not set forth, or, at least, did not explicitly set forth, a vote by ballot and by distinct ballots.

He did not mean to create a sensation here, or elsewhere. Nothing could be farther from his intention than to controvert the validity of that election. He rose not to lament over the past, nor to indulge gloomy forebodings for the future; but to state facts; to draw from events gone by, warning and security for the time to come. It was a grave question how far the vote of a State might be affected by a departure from the forms of voting prescribed by the constitution. It was also an interesting and delicate inquiry, worthy of much calm and serious thought, to whom the power and duty of determining the fact of such a departure belonged. Into these questions he did not now propose to enter. He would not profess that his mind was made up. He intended studiously to avoid indicating any opinion at this time. They were, he considered, of some magnitude and difficulty, and he felt them to be so at the period alluded to, when they had first occurred to him. He did not then venture to take upon himself the responsibility of causing them to be agitated; neither his confidence nor his experience in public affairs warranted him in presenting a suggestion, the ultimate consequences of which it was difficult to foresee. He communicated his impressions, however, to two gentlemen near him, one of them, then his colleague, now the Governor of Georgia; the other—a friend he hoped he might call him, for he had found him such—for whose talents and character he had the highest respect; a gentleman who had since been translated to the Senate, (Mr. MOLLANE.) The probable results of such a suggestion were considered during the very short interval during which deliberation was possible. It was imagined that, if the difficulty were presented, a protracted discussion would arise; public feeling might become highly excited, and all the evils of a contested election for Chief Magistrate be felt throughout the Union. His uncertainty was increased, in consequence of some of the certificates having been already read before they had attracted his notice. These could not be obtained for inspection. The bearing of such a question upon the election, therefore, was, in every respect, matter of doubtful conjecture. Under all the circumstances, his friends did not encourage him to introduce the subject. He would not say they advised him against it. Whatever responsibility attached to his silence on that occasion, belonged to himself. He did not seek to conceal or to divide it. He admitted that he hesitated, doubted, and, in the interval, the event of the election was announced.

Had the objections apparent on these certificates been then urged—supposing them to be well founded, and this House to be the constitutional judge of their sufficiency, and the validity of the votes, the issue of that election might have been different. He had not, in this instance, framed a theory, and then sought out facts to support it. He had collected facts, and if he was not mistaken, they were worthy of a passing notice, and might lead to something practical. Since the commencement of the present session, he had examined these certificates with as much attention as his other duties would allow; and if the House should indulge him in calling for them, they would be believed to be found, although exhibiting almost every variety of form, to agree substantially with the abridged statement which he should present.

The return from Delaware did not certify that the Electors voted by ballot, but specified the vote of each Elector thus:

"A. B. votes for C. D. as President, E. F. votes for G. H. as President," &c.

fairly authorizing the inference, as he apprehended, that the vote was viva voce.

The return of New York specifies that the Electors voted by ballot, and named, in distinct ballots, the persons voted for as President and Vice President.

The return of Rhode Island agrees, in effect, with that of New York.

The return of Missouri did not, Mr. W. believed, certify that the Electors voted by ballot, or by distinct ballots.

That of Vermont, he conceived, did not exhibit a vote by ballot, and by distinct ballots.

That of Tennessee presented distinct ballots, and so also of Connecticut, New Hampshire, Maine, and Maryland.

The Electors of Mississippi seemed to have voted by ballot; but it did not appear that they gave distinct ballots for each office.

From the returns of Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Kentucky, enough appeared to warrant the inference that they voted by ballot, and by distinct ballots.

Illinois seemed to have voted by ballot, but not by distinct ballots.

The return of South Carolina does not state explicitly that the Electors voted by ballot, and by distinct ballots, but it shows a separate vote, and the ballots themselves are forwarded.

Indiana seems to have voted by ballot, but the return does not allege distinct ballotings.

The return of Alabama says, the Electors proceeded to vote pursuant to the law and constitution, but does not specify the mode of voting in direct terms, whether by distinct ballotings, or otherwise.

That of Massachusetts appears to be strictly correct and formal. It says, the Electors voted by ballot for President and Vice President, having named in distinct ballots the person voted for as President, and the person voted for as Vice President.

The return of Virginia did not specify that the Electors voted by ballot; separate returns were made of the votes for President and Vice President, but it did not appear in terms, that either vote was by ballot.

The return of Georgia was similar to that of Virginia, except that the Electors used the word ballot.

The Electors of North Carolina seemed to have voted by ballot; but did not aver that it was by distinct ballots, and perhaps the fairest inference from the language of the return was, that only one balloting was had.

The return of Louisiana was, in effect, like that of North Carolina.

Mr. W. did not wish to be understood as asserting, that the notes he had taken from these documents to assist his memory, were free from error, nor that the construction he put upon the language used in them was the correct one. The phraseology was so different as to admit of a great variety of interpretation. He protested, likewise that he did not intend to say, or to insinuate any thing against the mode in which the Electors had endeavored to discharge their duty. They had, doubtless, acted according to established usage in their respective States. Many, perhaps all of them, were much his superiors in sagacity and experience, and he was among the last who could be capable of treating them with any disrespect. He did not mean to intimate that the votes thus given were in fact invalid by the constitution, or that any tribunal had been created having power to declare them so. Upon that subject he forbore expressing an opinion. What he wished to say, was this: a great diversity among the certificates existed. Some of them were open to exception. When the constitution prescribed a particular mode of doing an act, he took it for granted that mode ought to be followed. If it was departed from, there might be room to impugn the act done: and the mere discussion of such a question, in particular cases, might disturb the public tranquillity, and lead to tumult and confusion.

If, upon the occasion referred to, the votes of those States which, as he supposed, were liable to exception, had, in fact, been objected to, and this House had undertaken to pronounce them null, the votes of Delaware, Mississippi, Vermont, Missouri, Virginia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Indiana, and Illinois, might, by possibility, have been lost. In that event, if a hasty calculation of his were not incorrect, the result would have been to take from one candidate twenty-eight votes, leaving him with seventy-one; to take from another candidate eleven votes, leaving him with seventy-three; to deprive a third candidate of twenty-six votes, leaving him only fifteen, and thus excluding him from the House, while the fourth candidate, losing on three, and being left with thirty-four votes, would have been brought into it as one of the three from whom the choice was to be made. It was impossible to reflect an instant, without perceiving how momentous, at that time, must have been the investigation of such questions. He desired, if possible, to prevent, in future, the occurrence of such a state of things. He was, he trusted, no political agitator. He desired not to disturb men's minds as to the past, but to seek a preventive against prospective, and, he hoped, distant, but not improbable evils. How it was to be sought, he might not then be prepared to say. The wisdom of that House would, no doubt, find it, if they thought proper to commence the search. The first step was to obtain the information those certificates would afford. He asked for them by a resolution, which gentlemen of skill and experience in parliamentary precedent had kindly enabled him to place in what he conceived to be the established and respectful form of asking for papers in the possession of the Senate. He regretted, even on this subject, having so long occupied the floor. Other gentlemen might not, perhaps, attach to it the same importance he did, but he should not feel justified in withholding this information any longer, and unless he deceived himself, the people of the United States, and future Electors, would find in it matter of sufficient pith and moment to secure him from the imputation of wasting any portion of that invaluable time, so much of which had been devoted to Presidential questions of another character. This was no party measure. He intended to provoke no discussion. It was at least doubtful whether any act of legislation was necessary or expedient. But the information might be at once curious and useful, and gentlemen would vote to obtain or to refuse it as they thought proper. Without the warning it would afford, such returns might be made again, and some wiser or bolder politician be found to challenge them exactly at the right moment of a crisis decisive of the fate of men, and deeply affecting even the destinies of the Republic.

Mr. LITTLE thought there was no need of agitating this subject, particularly at so late a period in the session. The elections in the States were not subject to the revision of Congress, and if the certificates stated truly the result of such elections, it was to be inferred that they were held according to the law and constitution, unless the contrary were made to appear. He therefore moved that the resolution be laid upon the table; which motion prevailed—ayes 80, noes 37.

MONDAY, May 12.

The Case of William Morgan, supposed to have been put to Death by Free Masons.

Mr. TRACY offered the following memorial, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Hon. Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the subscribers, delegates assembled at Le Roy, in the county of Genesee, and State of New York, respectfully sheweth, that your memorialists have been delegated by the people of the several counties which they represent, to meet in convention at this place, to take into consideration the kidnapping and final disposal of William Morgan, late of Batavia, in the county aforesaid, a citizen of the United States, who was forcibly taken in the month of September, 1826. Your memorialists are informed, and verily believe, that the said Morgan was carried to Fort Niagara, and there imprisoned for a length of time, without legal authority. Your memorialists conceive it proper, inasmuch as Fort Niagara was then in charge of an officer or agent of the United States, and under the jurisdiction of the General Government, to apply to Congress for aid in the premises; and your memorialists, therefore, humbly pray that an inquiry be instituted, to ascertain whether the said William Morgan was or was not received and imprisoned within the walls of Fort Niagara, in the month of September, 1826; and if so, by whom, and by what authority, he was so received and imprisoned, and to whom he was delivered from thence—the inquiry to be made in such way and manner, and under such restrictions and limitations, as your honorable body may think most expedient. And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Dated at Le Roy, this 7th March, 1828.

The reading of the memorial being called for by several members, the Chair directed that it should be read for information; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, the allegation of the memorial is, that an officer of the United States at Fort Niagara, received and imprisoned a man without legal authority; and if that case be made out, it is a proper subject for investigation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, believing that the subject did not come at all within the jurisdiction of Congress, moved that the petition be referred to the President of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, expressed a doubt whether the House had a right to make such a reference of a matter not within their own jurisdiction.

Mr. McDUFFIE disclaimed the least doubt on that subject, and said there were many cases where the House had referred matters to the President, not merely, but to the Heads of Departments.

Mr. LITTLE now moved that the petition be referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, said, that this matter appeared to him to lie within the narrowest possible compass. He was of opinion that Congress had nothing whatever to do with the subject of the petition. If an officer of the United States had been guilty of any act subjecting him to punishment, under the existing laws of the country, the proper resort was to the Judiciary; but if he had committed some act, not forbidden by law, but in violation of his duty as an officer, then he is responsible to the President of the United States; and the Executive officer of the Government will in the discharge of his duty take the necessary steps to bring him to punishment. Is it intended to refer this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to any legislative action in the case? It was out of the question. He hoped, therefore, the subject would not be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Case of William Morgan.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. STORRS said, that he hoped his colleague (Mr. TRACY) would consent that the memorial be referred to the President. Mr. S. could state, for the information of the House, that an order had issued from the War Department for arresting the officer commanding at Cantonment Towson, in the Arkansas Territory, on a charge of refusing obedience to the instructions of the Department, to aid in the arrest of Colonel King, and the delivery of him to the messengers sent from the State of New York. The Department had ordered this officer to New York on his arrest, that the inquiry might be had without the inconvenience of requiring the witnesses from that State to attend at a distant post, and where the civil authorities of the State could be at hand, to co-operate efficiently in any measures necessary to be pursued for a fair and full investigation of the charges. Mr. S. said, that he had full confidence that the Government would promptly investigate any complaint made, by so respectable a body of citizens, against any officer of the United States; and, as an investigation growing out of the failure to arrest Colonel King, was now in progress, he thought this memorial, also, should be referred to the Executive or the War Department. Prompt measures had been taken on the application of the late Executive of New York, in relation to the arrest of Colonel King; and he did not doubt, that, if it should appear that any officer of the United States had been concerned in the alleged abuses which had been charged to have taken place at Fort Niagara, the Government would interpose its authority to bring them to a serious and prompt investigation. He hoped therefore, that the House would agree to refer the papers to the Executive Department.

Mr. TRACY replied, that it was immaterial to him which direction the petition took; if it was thought that the Executive would be the more appropriate Department to consider it, he would acquiesce with cheerfulness. The only reason he had moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, was, an apprehension of some difficulty on the question of jurisdiction, inasmuch as Fort Niagara was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State of New York, never having been ceded to the United States. He consented to withdraw his motion for referring the petition to that committee; and the question being on its going to the President of the United States,

Mr. DRAYTON insisted that this was a case in which the House ought not to interfere. He thought it had been too much the practice, of late, for Congress to interfere in matters not strictly within its cognizance, to the delay and injury of that which legitimately pertained to it. If there was no remedy provided by existing laws for the case to which this petition related, there might be some reason for applying for the legislation of Congress; but nothing was more plain than that the law did furnish a full and easy remedy. Under the 88d rule of the articles of war, it was provided, that, if an injury is committed by any officer in the service of the United States against the laws of any of the States, he shall, on demand, be surrendered to the civil authority, to be tried and punished accordingly. It did not appear that, in the present case, this course had been tried without effect. Until that was the case, there could be no ground for the interference of Congress in the matter. Redress was easy; the way to obtain it plain and obvious; and no consequences would result from special legislation, which were not already as well attained without it.

Mr. GILMER rose to state the fact, that it had been solemnly determined on argument, in court, that Fort Niagara was within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, and that all offences committed therein were to be tried by the laws of that State alone. This fact was, of itself, sufficient to show, that the subject of this petition could not come within the purview of Congressional jurisdiction; and this fact must have been known to those who signed the petition. They could not be ignorant that the abduction of Morgan was a civil offence, punishable exclusively by the laws of their own State. He concluded by moving to lay the petition upon the table.

Mr. GILMER, however, consented to withdraw the motion at the request of

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, who, on rising, observed—that, with a view to a few remarks, he would request Mr. GILMER to withdraw his motion to lay the memorial on the table; which, being complied with, Mr. STEVENSON said he hoped the motion to refer the memorial to the President of the United States would prevail. The memorialists alleged, that William Morgan was forcibly taken, in the month of September, 1826, to Fort Niagara, in the State of New York, and there held in secret captivity by an officer of the Army of the United States commanding at that post. The President of the United States is, in virtue of his office, the Commander-in-Chief of our Army. The kidnapping and confinement of Morgan is alleged to have taken place in 1826—consequently, during the time of the present President. If, then, any officer, under the command of, and subject to the control of the President, has been at all accessory to the alleged offence against Wm. Morgan, let the investigation be made by the superior officer, of the act of those under him, and let him see that the proper punishment be extended to his offending subaltern. This is the true course. The President possesses due power, and if those subject to his control are allowed to escape due punishment, let the responsibility rest where it ought.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, allowed the truth of the statement, that Fort Niagara was within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; but this was a complaint urged against a military officer in his official character, and it had been settled, on a former occasion, that such a complaint did belong to the notice of Government, but should first be subjected to the decision of a Court Martial. The petition was entitled to all respect, and he hoped it would be referred to the President.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said he agreed in opinion with several gentlemen who had so expressed themselves that this memorial ought to go to the Executive. But, while he declared his concurrence with gentlemen on this point, it did not follow, in his opinion, that it should be transmitted to the President through this House, or by the exertion of its power. He conceived it to be very clear, that the House had nothing to do with the subject, or with the memorial. It made a case, if truly set forth, of ordinary infraction of the law, and should be left to the ordinary tribunals of justice, or the ordinary exercise of Executive power. He was unwilling to lend the aid of the House to facilitate, in any other way than by legislation, either investigations in Courts of Justice, or by the President. He was wholly opposed to making this House the conduit through which to pass complaints, either to the President, or other officer, or to the courts. If true, as had been stated, that the jurisdiction of the State of New York had never been withdrawn from Fort Niagara, then the question belonged to the Judicial officers of that State, and complaint should be made in the usual way; and if that jurisdiction had been withdrawn, and vested in the General Government, then similar proceedings should be instituted and prosecuted before the Judicial officers of the Union. No complaint is made, that any officer of this Government has refused any proper application to do his duty; if that were the case, the House might proceed—it would then have jurisdiction. He said, it was clearly his opinion, that the House had nothing to do with the matter. His view was, and he felt confident it was correct, that the House had jurisdiction for the purpose of its own action, or not at all. It had no jurisdiction of any subject, for the mere purpose of transmitting it to the President or any other branch of Government. He desired to keep the House free from any proposition got up for effect here, or elsewhere.

If in order, he said, he would move that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition, that they may send it to the President through some other channel of conveyance; if not in order, he hoped the reference to the President would be rejected, and he would then make that motion.

The chair said, that a motion for leave to withdraw the petition, did not take precedence of a motion to refer.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped that the House were not about to be seized with the Morgan fever. We should treat this petition, as we do all others, which come from respectable citizens. The petitioners allege, that a Military Officer of this Government—whilst in the command of Fort Niagara—in violation of the laws of the State of New York, imprisoned and detained within that fort a citizen of the United States; and they ask us to institute an inquiry, for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of this allegation.

Mr. B. admitted there was some force in the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WRIGHT.) The petitioners may not have applied to the proper tribunal for redress; but we should ever remember, that the right of petition was a sacred right. If they have mistaken their remedy, this is not a good reason why we should refuse to consider their petition. In such cases it had ever been the practice of the House, so far as he was acquainted with it, to consider the petition, and refer it to the most appropriate Standing Committee. Upon the present occasion, the proper committee would be that of Military Affairs. Their report would, without doubt, recommend that the House should refer this petition to the President of the United States. There can then be no objection against sending it to him immediately, when we know such would be the effect of its reference to that committee.

Sir, said Mr. B., I dissent entirely from the opinion expressed by my friend from Georgia, (Mr. GILMER,) that this is not a proper subject of reference to the President. If a criminal offence has been committed within Fort Niagara, it may be true, that its trial and its punishment belong exclusively to the jurisdiction of the State of New York. But what is the inference to be drawn from this position? Does it follow, that, if an officer of your army were to violate the liberty of a citizen, and imprison him within that fort, that this would not also be an offence against the United States? Certainly not. He ought not only to be punished under the laws of the State, but he ought to be dismissed from the service of the United States. I would ask that gentleman, if one of our military officers, in the command of troops of the United States, abusing his power, were lawlessly, by their agency, to imprison a citizen of Georgia, in a place under the exclusive jurisdiction of that State, if he would not consider this to be a high crime committed against the whole American people? Would he be willing that a man guilty of such an outrage against a citizen of the State, should continue to be a Military Officer of the United States? It is true he might be punished under the laws of Georgia; but it is equally true, that, in addition to that punishment, he ought to be removed from the army. Should the petitioners be able to establish the guilt of this officer, whoever he may be, the President should not hesitate a moment in dismissing him from the service. The reference of this petition to the President is rendered peculiarly proper, in consequence of the circumstance which has been disclosed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) that the subject is already before the Secretary of War. Mr. B. trusted that the reference would be made without further debate, and that the subject would be dismissed, without occupying more of the time of the House.

Mr. HAILE reminded the House that they were about to adjourn on the 26th. The present discussion seemed likely to occupy a considerable time, and, in his opinion, it was a matter of little consequence whether this Morgan was dead or alive. He, therefore, demanded the yeas and nays. The demand was sustained—ayes 80, noes 66.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question on referring the petition to the President of the United States being stated, Mr. TRACY demanded that it be taken by yeas and nays. They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows—yeas 143, nays 70.

Revolutionary Officers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole. The motion prevailing, Mr. CONDIOT was called to the chair.

The committee proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, for the relief of the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary War; and the question recurring on the following amendment, moved on Wednesday last by Mr. GILMER, viz: to amend the first section of the bill, by restricting payment to those officers whose commissions bear date prior to the commencement of the year 1778—

Mr. CULPEPER stated, that he was in favor of this bill, and as he was persuaded that it could only pass in its present form, he conjured all its friends to refuse every amendment, and to offer none.

Mr. GILMER's amendment was negatived.

Mr. WOLF moved to strike out the second section, and insert a substitute, which he offered.

Mr. W. defended the amendment he had offered, on the ground that the bill, as it at present stood, would favor the richer officers, who had not been under the necessity of accepting any pension, by giving them the full allowance, while it oppressed the poorer class, whose want had compelled them to petition, in ferme pauperie, and to accept a pension.

Mr. GILMER offered an amendment to the amendment of Mr. WOLF, which went to exclude all who had received a pension.

The amendments were opposed by Messrs. TAYLOR, DRAYTON, ANDERSON of Maine, SERGEANT, BUCHANAN, WEEMS, and TRACY, and advocated by Messrs. GILMER and WOLF.

TUESDAY, May 18.

Revolutionary Officers.

The bill for the relief of the Revolutionary officers having come into the House by the discharge of the Committee of the Whole from the farther consideration of it, and the question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—

Mr. STERIGEE moved the previous question (the effect of which is to preclude all farther amendment and debate); it was decided in the negative—ayes 64, noes 75.

Mr. LITTLE renewed the amendment, which had, yesterday, been moved by Mr. BARRINGER, when the bill was in committee, going to include those who had served during two years. Mr. BARRINGER modified the resolution by adding the words, "and honorably discharged."

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. MARVIN and TAYLOR, not on the principle, but from the danger to the whole bill, from any further delay at the present late period of the season.

Mr. LITTLE disavowed all hostility to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the previous question. The motion was sustained, ayes 82, noes 75: and the previous question being put, "Shall the main question now be put?"

Mr. BARRINGER moved that the question be taken by yeas and nays. It was then decided by—yeas 100, nays 82.

The main question being then put, on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was decided by—yeas 124, nays 64. The bill was then read a third time; and the question being, "Shall it pass?"

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, after some severe remarks on what he denominated the indecent solicitude of the friends of the bill to force it upon the House, (and which were declared by the Chair not to be in order,) moved an amendment, going to include the medical staff of the army.

The Chair decided that the amendment could not be received in the present stage of the bill, unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BASSETT expressed his dissent, not, however, out of any friendship to the bill, to which he expressed himself entirely opposed.

Mr. CLARK then resumed the floor, and delivered a speech at great length in opposition to the bill generally, the provisions of which he considered as partial and unjust in the extreme. He denied the doctrine of contract, insisted upon the propriety of including the militia, and deprecated the effect of the bill upon the Treasury, as going to add not less than six thousand to the existing list of pensioners.

Mr. PEARCE demanded the previous question, which was sustained—ayes 74, noes 47. The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question having been stated: "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. CONDIOT demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The final question was taken as follows:

WEDNESDAY, May 14.

Office of Major General.

On motion of Mr. SMYTH, the House proceeded (ayes 75, noes 69) to consider the bill abolishing the office of Major General.

Mr. VANCE moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which was in the following words:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all officers serving by commission from the authority of any State, shall, on all detachments, court-martial, or other duty, wherein they may be employed in conjunction with the regular forces of the United States, take rank next after all officers of the like grade, either by brevet commission or otherwise, in said regular forces: notwithstanding the commissions of such militia, or State officers, may be older than the commissions of the officers of the regular forces of the United States."

In support of his motion, Mr. V. said, that he considered this bill as going further than any bill had ever gone before. He sent to the table a letter from the Department of War, which he desired to have read. He then stated, that one of the greatest difficulties a commanding General had to encounter, was to preserve a state of harmonious feeling among his troops. He did not, therefore, wish to place it in the power of unqualified individuals to fill that responsible station.

Mr. DWIGHT hoped this motion would prevail. The effect of the amendment is to make a distinction between the officers of the army and the militia, so that they shall not come in conflict with each other. He referred to the equality of rank between General Jackson and General Brown, and asked the House to reflect on what might have been the effect upon these distinguished men, if they had been placed under the command of a militia officer.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should not have said a word upon this bill, had not his attention been drawn to the second section of it, by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE.) He would have contended himself with a silent vote in favor of its passage. But, said Mr. B., I belong to the militia myself—I have a fellow-feeling for them, and I never shall consent to degrade them; for after all, they are the great bulwark of our defence. The second section of this bill will produce that effect. A Captain in the regular army, after he has continued in the service for ten years, is breveted a Major, and in ten years more he becomes a Colonel by brevet. The mere lapse of twenty years transforms a captain into a colonel by brevet, and gives him this honorary rank; although he may still remain but a captain in the line, and be entitled to command but a single company. Brevet rank is therefore acquired, in our army, without any extraordinary merit. Under this section, such a captain would be entitled to rank a colonel of volunteers or militia who had led his regiment into the field, and to assume the command. I ask, will not any law, which would operate in this manner, tend to destroy the spirit of the militia, and to degrade them both in their own eyes and those of the nation? The past history of this country proves that they do not deserve such treatment at our hands. During the last war, the militia purchased glory both for themselves and for their country, upon the field of battle; and our most brilliant victories were those achieved under the command of men, who had been militia Generals, and who were transferred to the same rank, in the regular army.

It has been objected, against the passage of this bill, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DRAYTON,) that if the office of Major General should be abolished, a militia Major General would then command an officer of the highest rank in our army, should regular troops and militia be called into service together. Even if we should admit this construction of the law to be correct, the inconvenience which that gentleman apprehends, would never occur in point of fact. The army is now on a peace establishment. When war shall threaten us, it must immediately be reorganized. We must then call into existence a new head to the army, and confer upon him a rank which will entitle him to command a Major General of militia. It is scarcely possible, therefore, that the case supposed by the gentleman can ever exist.

If this bill should pass, it will afford the President of the United States an opportunity of placing at the head of the army, in the event of war, an able and an efficient man, and relieve the country from the danger of having that station pre-occupied by a superannuated officer. In the mean time, no inconvenience can be experienced. The President is Commander-in-Chief of the army; and it is his duty to decide the question of rank, which has so long existed, between the two Brigadier Generals. The one or the other of them will then be the chief officer of the army. But it was not my intention to discuss the main question; I rose merely to defend the militia, and I shall proceed no further.

Mr. SMYTH made a few observations in reply; and asked if it would be considered a degradation that General Scott should take command of any of the Major Generals who have probably seats on this floor. He was about to proceed in some general observations on the bill, when he was reminded by the Chair that the question was on the amendment—and he sat down.

Mr. VANCE said, that officers who had received brevet rank as the reward of distinguished services, were placed on a different footing with those who obtained brevet rank in consequence of a certain term of service. He stated, that as the militia have no brevet rank, a Lieutenant of the army, having brevet rank, might go and take a Colonel's regiment from him.

The amendment was agreed to.

And the question occurring on engrossing the bill for a third reading—

Mr. McDUFFIE said he rose to say a word or two in opposition to this bill, and he would take leave to say, at the commencement, that, so far as he was capable of forming a judgment on this matter, this was one of the most unwise measures that could possibly be submitted to a deliberative assembly. I take it for granted, said he, that it is the object of this bill to accomplish one of these two objects: either to improve the organization of the Army, or to effect a retrenchment of the expenses of the Military Establishment. Now, sir, I presume no Military man will undertake to say, that it will improve the organization of the Army, to deprive it of a military head. I say no military man, sir, because I am aware that the gentleman from Pennsylvania—who, like myself, is not a military man—has made a grand discovery on the subject of organizing a peace establishment, which may prove to be one of the greatest improvements in the art of modern warfare. The plan of the gentleman is to have no Major General or Commander-in-Chief in time of peace, lest he should become superannuated before the occurrence of a war. By keeping the chief command of the Army vacant in time of peace, the gentleman says the President will have it in his power to place a young and vigorous man at the head of the Army in the event of a war. My only surprise in this matter is, sir, that the gentleman has not extended his principle a little further. The same reason will certainly apply with equal force to the Brigadiers, the Colonels, the Captains; and, in a word, to the whole rank and file of the Army. It would be certainly desirable to get rid of superannuated soldiers, and have those that are young and vigorous. Indeed, I think the principle of the gentleman applies with greater force to the subordinate officers, who rise by seniority, than it does to the office of Commander-in-Chief, in relation to which the Executive has an unlimited discretion. Thus, sir, we should make short work of re-organizing the Army. We should get rid of it altogether. There would be at least something like retrenchment in this.

But this proposition to dispense with the Commander-in-Chief, has nothing to recommend it, either on the score of improving the organization of the Army, or of curtailing its expenses. In the former regard, it is absolute disorganization, as far as it goes. In the latter it is the very worst possible retrenchment conceivable. There is no part of the Army, where you might not save an equal sum of money with less injury to the public service. Out off the legs or the arms, but I pray you spare the head. We were informed by my friend and colleague, the Chairman of the Military Committee, the other day, that the proposed change would save annually not more than two or three thousand dollars. Now, sir, if the object is to save this sum, cut off some three or four Colonels, some six or eight Captains, or some twenty or thirty common soldiers. These would be curtailments to be sure; but they would not materially injure the public service: for they would not destroy or impair the organization of the Army. Upon the whole, sir, I regard this bill as being positively injurious on the score of organization; and wholly unworthy of consideration on the score of retrenchment and economy.

Mr. RAMSEY then offered the following amendment; which was negatived:

"Be it further enacted, That, as soon as the two commissioned Brigadier Generals shall resign, die, or be dismissed from the military service of the United States, no appointment shall be made to supply such vacancy."

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, said, that he could not assent to the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE), that the abolition of the office of General-in-Chief would be injurious to the organization of the Army. The President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. If the President and Secretary of War perform their duties as regards the Army, there can be no occasion for a Commanding General residing at the Seat of Government. There ought to be no other Commander-in-Chief than the President, either in war or peace. The Commanding General stationed at the Seat of Government can have no duties assigned to him, but such as properly belong to the President, the Secretary of War, the Adjutant General, or an Inspector General.

Does experience prove that any such General-in-Chief, is necessary? The Romans had no Commander-in-Chief except the Dictator, or the Emperor. Neither during the Republic, nor during the reign of their most unmilitary Emperors, was there a Commander-in-Chief at the Seat of Government. The French, during the war of the Revolution, had no Commander-in-Chief at the Seat of Government, when Bonaparte was in Italy, and Moreau in Germany. We had no General-in-Chief residing at the Seat of Government in 1814 and '15 when Jackson and Brown were achieving the triumphs of the late war. We had no General-in-Chief from 1815 until 1821. This proves that the office is not necessary, neither in peace nor in war. The country was divided into two divisions, and a Major General commanded the troops in each division, receiving his orders from the War Department.

I will refer the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) to the plan of Mr. Calhoun, for the reduction of the Army. In his report on that subject, made in December, 1820, he said: "It is believed that the true principle of organization is, that every distinct branch of the staff should terminate in a chief, to be stationed, at least in peace, near the Seat of Government, and to be made responsible for its condition. It is thus the Government may at all times obtain correct knowledge of the condition of the army, in each particular, and be enabled to introduce method, order, and economy, in its disbursements." It is at present, with slight exceptions, thus organized, &c. His plan was to retain two Major Generals, four Aids-de-Camp, four Brigadier Generals, four Aids-de-Camp, &c. It thus appears not to have been the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, that a General-in-Chief, residing at the Seat of Government, was essential to the proper organization of the army. It was the Staff Department, as the Quartermaster's Department, the Purchasing Department, the Subsistence Department, the Medical Department, that he believed should terminate in a chief, to be stationed at the Seat of Government.

Where shall we find precedents to recommend this organization of the army, which requires a Cabinet Commander-in-Chief residing at the Seat of Government? Is it in the example of the Duke of York, who held the command of the British army, and all its patronage? Or is it the example of the Duke of Wellington, who is Prime Minister, commander of 110,000 men, and the real sovereign of Great Britain? Sir, I have some reason for being of opinion that the Executive, during the late war, wanted no such office as that of General-in-Chief. It is safest that the command of the army should be divided among the Generals, and that it should have no head except the President, who is also the civil head of the Government. I hope if we ever shall find a Cæsar in the army, we shall also find a Pompey.

It has been urged that there is a Navy Board to assist the Secretary of the Navy in the performance of his duties, and that, therefore, there should be a General-in-Chief. It may be a question whether the law establishing the Navy Board has not too much circumscribed the powers of the Secretary of the Navy; but the essential aid which is rendered to the Secretary of the Navy by the Navy Commissioners, is rendered to the Secretary of War by the heads of the Army Departments, as the Quartermaster General, the Commissary General, the Surgeon General, and by the Commander of Engineers, and by the Commander of Ordnance—all stationed at the Seat of Government. The Adjutant General, under the direction of the Secretary, will order troops from one division to another, as circumstances may require, and will subscribe the orders "By the President," instead of "By the Commanding General." There can be no occasion for an order to pass through grades of Generals before it arrives at the post where it is to be carried into execution.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) has said that we will save only 8,000 dollars by abolishing the office of Major General. How does he prove this? The document laid on our table shows that the pay and allowances to this officer, and the extra allowances to his aids, may amount to about 11,700 dollars per annum. He supposes that the senior Brigadier General will be ordered to the Seat of Government, to perform those services which were rendered by General Brown; that a Colonel will be ordered to fill the place of that Brigadier General, and command a division, and so on. I will not suppose it. We cannot interfere with the President's authority to command the army; but if the office of General-in-Chief shall be abolished by law, I presume the President will understand that it is not expected he will continue it in fact. I presume that he will adopt the arrangement which existed from 1815 until 1821.

As to the military advice which the Secretary of War requires, he has near him General Macomb, the Chief Engineer, whose utility would not be increased by his elevation to the office of Major General. And the advice of the Chief of the Engineers is, in the present state of our military preparations, precisely the military advice which will be most important to the Secretary of War and the President.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he felt himself bound to reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) That gentleman has been pleased to say that I had made a grand discovery when I found out that the army of the United States ought to be left without a head in time of peace. He has also endeavored to prove that the principles which I advocated would result in abolishing all the offices in the army. Indeed, from the tenor of his observations, it might be supposed that I had expressed a desire to destroy the whole military establishment of the country—horse, foot, and dragoons.

That gentleman has not only done me injustice in the manner he has stated the proposition which I advocated, but he has drawn the most unnatural and the most illogical inferences from my argument.

It is well known that, up to the rank of Colonel, the officers have a right to be regularly promoted. Beyond that rank, no such right exists. At that point regular promotions, according to seniority, cease. Within this limit, I trust I should be one of the last men in this House who would attempt to interfere. I shall ever hold all existing rights of the officers sacred. But what is the case above the rank of Colonel? It has been the uniform practice of this Government to leave the discretion of the President unfettered, and to allow him to select general officers from the mass of the American people. Why has this practice prevailed? Is it not to enable the President to select such men to fill the high offices of the army as may be best able to serve their country? Our present army is emphatically a peace establishment. Its present organization never was intended for a state of war. I wish, therefore, to leave every avenue open, which I can do with a proper regard to the existing state of things, for the purpose of enabling the President, in the day of danger, to fill the high offices of the army with efficient commanders. And yet the gentleman from South Carolina has contended that my argument, which was specially confined to the office of Major General, would equally apply to officers of every grade, and lead to the destruction of the whole army.

The case of General Brown will strikingly illustrate the truth of the proposition for which I contended. He was a great military man. Nature had made him a commander. He commenced his career in the militia, and then was appointed a General in the service of the United States. During the last war, he not only distinguished himself, but he distinguished his country. But I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina, whether General Brown, for years before his death, would have been fit to take the command of the army, and go into active service? Time and disease had laid their heavy hands upon him, and had rendered him wholly unable to take the field against an enemy. In considering this subject, we should never forget that the present army is emphatically upon a peace establishment; and that, by abolishing the office of Major General, when danger shall threaten, and when it becomes necessary to organize our military establishment for a state of war, the field of competition for the highest office in it will be left entirely open. The President may then select the most capable man in the country for that arduous station, whether he be found in the militia, the regular army, or among the private citizens of our country. It is certain he ought to be an efficient man, capable of rendering his country service, and not a superannuated officer.

Sir, I propose to take a view of the organization of our army, and the powers of the different departments of command, in order to show that this office is not what its name implies to our vague and uninformed notions of it—the supreme head of our peace establishment; that it is, in truth, a useless station. We have a regular force of 6,186 strong—544 of which are commissioned officers—constituting about the 11th part of the whole. This force is distributed among 89 or 40 posts, at no one of which is there an assemblage large enough to constitute a full Brigadier's command. These posts are arranged, and the army divided into two general commands, which are designated as Geographical Departments, and placed under the two Brigadiers, Scott and Gaines—to whom (laying out of view, for the present, the General-in-Chief) the Secretary of War is the common head, the supreme source of authority. The Secretary of War bears the same relation of command to the two Geographical Departments, which the General bears to the several regiments within his department, which the Colonel holds towards the several companies of his regiment, and which the captain maintains towards the several files that compose his company. This succinct view of the lineal command of the whole army, and of its divisions and subdivisions, shows that (independent of the office of Major General) there is provided in the person of the Secretary of War the same common head for the whole, that its several parts possess in their respective chiefs. Does not this exhibit, in those respects, a complete organization? But it is said, that the Secretary of War is not the authority suitable for, and adequate to the control and superintendence of, the Government and well-being of the army; and that, therefore, it is necessary to place between him and the army, this office of General-in-Chief, for the purpose of regulating, in the language of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) "its details, the distribution of its parts, its discipline, and improvements."

With the view of showing that this estimate of the Secretary of War is a mistaken one, permit me to turn your attention to the nature and scope of his functions. By the constitution, the President is the Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the United States. In the distribution of the powers of the Executive through the several Departments of the Cabinet, his military attributes are placed in the hands of the Secretary of War. The act creating the Department of War, declares, that its Secretary "shall perform and execute such duties as shall, from time to time, be enjoined on, or entrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeably to the constitution, relative to military commissions, or to the land forces, or warlike stores of the United States, or to such other matters respecting military affairs, as the President of the United States shall assign," &c. Does not this furnish a range of powers ample enough to embrace "the details, distribution, discipline, and improvements of the army," or any thing that can fall within the supervision of supreme authority over a peace establishment? Why, sir, the laws created and placed in immediate subservency and responsibility to him, a corps of staff officers, called the administrative departments of the army, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of War to discharge that very class of duties which the advocates of this office deny him the possession of. There is one, an Adjutant General, who is at the head of the Bureau of official correspondence. 2. A Quartermaster General, with Commissariats, for the purpose of administering all the supplies of clothing, subsistence, quarters, transportation—in fine, all the facilities in the progress and conveniences in the location of troops. 3. A Paymaster General, whose duties are too obviously explained by the title, without requiring a further definition. 4. A Surgeon General, having charge of whatever pertains to the conservation of the health of the army. 5. A chief of ordnance, for the construction, procurement, distribution, and preservation, of all ordnance and ordnance stores. 6. A chief of Engineers, to conduct all works and operations requiring scientific knowledge and skill, and to superintend the institutions established by the munificence of our Government, for instruction in military science and art. And in describing these administrative departments, by their respective chiefs, I mean to include, in the same chain of dependence on the Secretary of War, their numerous subordinates. It is also important to add, that this control over them by the Secretary is exclusive—that the law keeps them aloof from the authority of the General-in-Chief.

I am confident that this general aspect of our military organization is insufficient to show that the Secretary of War has abundant power in the contemplation of law, by his own act, and through the agency of his staff, to administer to all the wants, interests, and concerns of the army, in a time of peace—from the construction and equipment of fortifications—from the inculcation of the love and practice of the most scientific abstrusities of the military art, to the supplying of the humblest private with the just weight and measure of his daily ration—to the Secretary's sign manual on a staff subaltern's furlough, or a sutler's license.

Now, sir, let us look at the office of General-in-Chief, let us examine his duties; and I venture to affirm, that they will be found, in a time of peace, so slight in number and importance, that they may be easily transferred to other departments of command, without marring the symmetry of our military system, or disturbing the harmony of its operations, which the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) so much deprecates.

1st. In the distribution or arrangement of troops to stations. The issuing of orders for this purpose devolves on the General-in-Chief. But there are these exceptions: the President is to designate the limits of the geographical or department commands. The assent of the Secretary of War is necessary to enable the General-in-Chief to fix the customary Head Quarters of the Department Generals. Troops are not to garrison a fort until its completion and inspection, but by order of the Secretary of War; and the assignment of subaltern officers to ordnance or subsistence service, is only to be made by order of the Secretary of War. I conceive, sir, that the Secretary is as well qualified to perform that class of duties under this head, which now belongs to the General-in-Chief, as those which devolve upon himself. What is requisite to enable him to do so? A knowledge of the country—its resources for supply—its avenues of communication—its defences—its proximity to points of hostility—its climate—the character of the troops—their adaptation to the region in which they are to be stationed, on the score of health, habits, efficiency—and the fitness of the corps for the peculiar service of the station. And all the necessary facts and considerations on these topics are furnished to the Department periodically, and especially, if required, in the inspection returns of the Department and Inspector Generals, and in the returns and remarks of the Quartermaster and Surgeon Generals and the Engineers. Assuredly, the Secretary of War must be supposed, though destitute of tactical skill and experience in the field, abundantly competent, under all this advice and instruction, under the consummate skill, science, and experience of his staff, to determine the station of 6,000 men, on the American soil, in a time of peace. Why, sir, it is on the same sources and means of information that the General-in-Chief himself is to depend, in the performance of the same duty. I will add, that, when the posts become fixed, (as they are at present,) the General-in-Chief has but little or nothing to do with the arrangement of troops, as the distribution of the recruits devolves upon the Adjutant General, who, under advice with the superintendent of recruits, arranges all those enlisted at a principal depot to the various regimental and other commands.

2d. The inspection of troops. This is done—1. By the Department Generals once in two years. 2. By the Inspector Generals, as the General-in-Chief shall direct. 3. And extra inspections shall be taken by the Department Generals, whenever the Secretary of War, or the General-in-Chief, shall order. The power of the General-in-Chief, under this head, is to control the Inspector Generals, as to time, &c., and co-ordinately with the Secretary of War, order special department inspections. I presume that the Inspector Generals have reduced their duties to a system; they are at least susceptible of it. In that case the power of the Major General to direct him is purely nominal, and of course it will not be denied, can be changed into the hands of the Secretary of War, without increasing materially, the labors of the latter, or lessening, in the slightest degree, the amount of professional ability employed. Surely the Inspector General can examine with as much fidelity and skill, and point out defects with as much truth and precision, when placed like the Quartermaster General in immediate dependence on the Secretary of War, as when standing in the inferior relation of an attaché to the General-in-Chief. As to special inspections by the Department Generals, under the order of the General-in-Chief or Secretary of War, they are seldom, if ever, resorted to. A partnership in a prerogative, whose exercise is barely problematical, is an inadequate inducement, surely, for retaining this office. Why not leave it exclusively where it is placed co-ordinately, in the hands of the Secretary of War?

3d. Recruiting troops. The General-in-Chief designates the recruiting grounds. He appoints the recruiting officers, and the superintendent, to whom those officers are to report and be responsible; and his express order is requisite for the purpose of enlisting any one prohibited by the general regulations of the army, as drunkards, persons diseased, and foreigners. According to the authority on which I principally rely, the army regulations, there seems to be allotted to this humble branch of the service more of the acts of the General-in-Chief, than to any other of the peace establishment. And no one will deny that it stands less in need of the high qualities of the military art. Is it not preposterous to retain this exalted and expensive rank to do that which, on a just scale of comparative importance between the agent and the object, could be much better given to the humblest command in the army? But let these duties be performed by the Adjutant General. To him it now belongs to distribute the recruits to the several commands, and the residue of this species of service may, with peculiar fitness and congruity, be placed in the same hands.

4th. Supplying the Army. 1, with arms, &c. 2, with clothing, subsistence, quarters, transportation, &c.

5th. Paying the army.

6th. The Medical Department. In relation to all these, it is sufficient to say, that the General-in-Chief has no specific authority. True, there is a general regulation that requires his approbation to a requisition for ordnance. But it is also true that it is dispensed with, if attended with such delay as will produce inconvenience or danger. And the Secretary of War can authorize a General, or field officer, having a command, to draw on the Ordnance Department at his discretion.

7th. The instructions and scientific operations of the army. With these the General-in-Chief has as little to do as with the supplies. The engineers proper and topographical, and the military academy at West Point, are exempted from the general army command; and through the chief of engineers fall directly under the control of the War Department. The school of artillery practice at Fortress Monroe has a like privilege. It is under the direction of the Secretary of War, with whom its correspondence is carried on, through the Adjutant General. And the eminence of his station places the General-in-Chief at as great a distance from the supervision of the drill of the camp, as those regulations I have mentioned do from the higher branches of military erudition. The drill and discipline of the camp falls under the charge of those subalterns who are qualified for the task, by a complete and splendid professional education, bestowed upon them at the national expense. They are otherwise provided for by the War Department, in the general dissemination and frequent revisions of the system of tactics. So that circumstances do not require that of our General-in-Chief, which, perhaps, they did of the celebrated and eccentric Souwaroff, who is described by a noble bard, as

"Standing in his shirt
Before a company of Calmucks, drilling,
Exclaiming, fooling, swearing, at the inert,
And lecturing on the noble art of killing."

Our army is regulated by a system, as every institution of corresponding size and complexity must be, to be well regulated—a system that prescribes to every functionary, every individual, his appropriate sphere of duty, and specifies the minutest detail with the utmost precision. In peace, when the affairs of the army are uniform and unchanging, rare indeed are the occasions that call upon its executive head for the exercise of discretionary powers. Hence the inutility of retaining the General-in-Chief as an adviser to the Secretary of War. In that capacity his usefulness has been advocated on this floor, on the ground that he must be a man, "who, by experience, understands the wants, and by sympathy, the feelings of the army." Sir, if the system is imperfect, let it be remodelled by the power that created it, the Department of War. If it is violated, let the offence be punished by the military judiciary. This will secure a more equal and just administration over the "wants" and interests of the army, than if left to the "experience and sympathies" of an officer, whose discretion is liable, at least, to degenerate into caprice or favoritism.

This review of the duties of General-in-Chief, Mr. Speaker, does not contemplate a state of war. In the field, I am aware, he becomes the source and regulator, the animating soul and informing head, of the most important operations; but those operations belong solely to a period of hostilities. In that sphere he revolves, a star of the first magnitude. But removed from it to the Seat of Government, thrown into overshadowing contiguity with that greater repository of power, the War Department, and he is "shorn of his beams"—he dwindles to a satellite.

But we are told that we must retain this office, so as to keep on hand, in readiness for the event of war, a General-in-Chief, possessing experience and skill. Whenever war occurs in this country, it must be after long intervals of peace, and the probability is, that these periods of official indolence will survive the prime of manhood, and the vigor of intellectual and physical powers, which the General-in-Chief may possess on his assuming this office—and that he will be found, at the moment of active duty, tottering on the crutch of decrepitude; or, what will be much worse for the service, not so far advanced in the imbecility of old age (for then he might be laid on the shelf, and his place supplied by another) but belonging to its “disastrous twilight,” when he is ambitious to act, but inadequate to perform, at the same time is not willing to resign, and not subject to be dismissed, disappointing the hopes and sullying the fame of his country, by spending campaign after campaign in the vain process of being about to do what he never accomplishes. This, sir, is a historical, not a fancy sketch. It points to incidents in our late war, that we should learn wisdom from, as from the warning lessons of experience. But, sir, I do not believe that the military qualifications of an officer are to be preserved by placing him in a station, where he has nothing to do of a military nature, where he is pampered with a salary inferior to but one in your Government—with his head-quarters fixed at the head-quarters of fashion and politics, and dancing attendance at court, until his nostrils forget the smell of “villainous saltpetre.” Such a state of things, sir, is more fatal to soldiership, than was Camillus to Hannibal and his army. Sir, let us leave this office to be created and filled when the occasion requires. Let us leave to the wisdom and resources of the crisis, the opportunity of operating upon its own destiny. Instead of appointing a General-in-Chief, at such an indefinite period beforehand, to be the commander, at all events, and under all hazards of infirmity and incapacity, that meanwhile he is liable to from time from disease, and habits of indolence; let us leave to the Government of that day, the inestimable privilege of selecting for the guardianship of the national glory and safety, the best talents that the army at the time can furnish, or, indeed, the country at large: for an individual may be found in the walks of civil life, (I need not tell the House there has been such an instance,) pre-eminently gifted by nature with the high qualities of military command, superior to all that the drill of the camp or the black board of your academy can confer.

Sir, it was my intention to have shown that too exclusive a dependence was placed on the army, whenever we contemplated a state of war; that, after our fortifications and other strongholds are garrisoned by regular troops, the most safe and compatible defence for a nation, possessed of free institutions, and adverse to conquest, is her militia; in the improvement of which, much of the treasure which we now lavish on the army and education acquired at the national expense, which is now buried in the camp, might be most profitably applied. The present wretched and inefficient state of our militia is a subject that calls, almost in the language of reproach, for the legislation of Congress. But I forbear; I have already extended this discussion beyond its proper limit. I will conclude with the opinion that this office is utterly useless; that its continuance is a violation of that fundamental principle on which all free and beneficent Governments are administered, that of rendering their benefits fully and effectually at the least avoidable expense; and that this limit transgressed, Government becomes, in that respect, in a greater or less degree, a burthen; its powers abused, its people oppressed.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, now demanded the previous question, and the demand was sustained by the House; and, on the main question, of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Addams, Alexander, Allen of Va., Alston, Anderson of Maine, Armstrong, Barber of Conn., P. P. Assault on the President's Secretary.

FRIDAY, May 16.

Assault on the President's Secretary.

Mr. McDUFFIE, from the Select Committee, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, relative to an assault committed on his Private Secretary, made the following report:

"Immediately after their appointment, the committee proceeded to the investigation of the subject referred to them. They ascertained, from the letter of Mr. Russel Jarvis, referred to them by the House, and from the statement of Mr. John Adams, the private secretary of the President, that an assault was committed by the former upon the person of the latter, in the rotundo of the Capitol, immediately after he had delivered a message from the President to the House of Representatives, and while he was proceeding, with another message, from the President, to the Senate. At this stage of the proceeding, a preliminary question arose with the committee whether they should report to the House simply the fact that the assault had been committed, with a view to an examination at the bar of the House of the party implicated, and all the witnesses for and against him, or whether the committee should take upon themselves the responsibility of going into a full examination of the whole case, and of recommending, as the result of their judgment, upon all the facts and circumstances, the final course which they might deem it expedient for the House to pursue. The former mode of proceeding would have been, perhaps, the more strictly conformable to Parliamentary usage and precedent; but the unavoidable interference with the discharge of its ordinary legislative duties, which would have resulted from an examination before the House, constituted, in the opinion of the committee, so strong an objection to that course of proceeding, that they unanimously determined to examine all the witnesses, and to report the facts to the House, with their opinion upon them, having first obtained the consent of Mr. Jarvis that this course should be pursued, and having granted him the privilege of appearing by counsel. It is here proper that the committee should say a few words in explanation of the delay which has occurred in this examination. After some considerable progress had been made in it, Mr. Jarvis made an application to the committee for leave to examine by commission, certain persons in the city of Boston. The committee did not feel themselves warranted, under existing circumstances, to refuse this request. A commission was accordingly transmitted to take the examination by written interrogatories, which was not returned until very recently.

"The committee will now proceed to exhibit a brief summary of the evidence, the whole of which, in detail, is annexed to this report.

"The material fact, that Mr. Jarvis committed an assault upon the private secretary of the President, in the rotundo of the Capitol, immediately after he had delivered a message from the President to the House of Representatives, is clearly established. Indeed, it is distinctly admitted by Mr. Jarvis. It is also established to the satisfaction of the committee, that Mr. Jarvis knew that the private secretary of the President had delivered a message to the House of Representatives immediately before the assault was committed. Mr. Jarvis, it appears, was in the House when the message was delivered, and immediately followed after Mr. Adams, as he retired from the House. There is some discrepancy in the testimony as to the nature of the assault; but, in the view taken by the committee, it is wholly immaterial to the question which grows out of the transaction, touching the dignity and privileges of the House.

"In the letter of Mr. Jarvis, he stated, as the provocation by which he had been prompted to commit the assault upon Mr. Adams, certain offensive and insulting language used by the latter, in the house of the President, at a levee, in the presence and hearing of the wife of Mr. Jarvis and other female friends and relatives, who attended the levee under his protection.

"Mr. Adams submitted a counter-statement, differing in several particulars from that contained in the letter of Mr. Jarvis, and several witnesses were therefore examined with a view of ascertaining the true character of the occurrences at the levee of the President. The committee believe it is not difficult to reconcile the apparent contradictions in the testimony of the several witnesses relative to this branch of the case. The material facts can be satisfactorily made out without involving any imputation upon the veracity of any of the witnesses. It is proved by those on both sides, and, indeed, by the admission of Mr. Adams, that he did use language calculated, if overheard, to insult Mr. Jarvis. It is also proved, to the satisfaction of the committee, that Mrs. Cordis, the mother of Mrs. Jarvis, was very near to Mr. Adams when he made use of the offensive language, and that she, as well as other persons of the party who accompanied Mr. Jarvis, heard it with some distinctness. It also appears that the ladies who accompanied Mr. Jarvis interpreted the language of Mr. Adams as an insult offered to the whole party, and it seems that Mr. Jarvis acted throughout the whole of the transaction under the same impression. On the contrary, it is stated by Mr. Adams and Mr. Stetson, that Mr. Adams did not use the offensive language relative to Mr. Jarvis, with a view of injuring the feelings of the ladies who accompanied him, nor, indeed, with a knowledge that it was overheard by them. The fact, however, appears to be indisputable, that so much of that language was heard by Mrs. Cordis and Mr. Dexter as induced the party, and particularly the female friends who accompanied Mr. Jarvis, to leave the President's House as soon as possible, under the idea that they had been insulted.

"Upon a view of all the circumstances, the committee are of the opinion that the assault committed by Mr. Jarvis upon the private Secretary of the President, whatever may have been the causes of provocation, was an act done in contempt of the authority and dignity of this House, involving not only a violation of its own peculiar privileges, but of the immunity which it is bound, upon every principle, to guaranty to the person selected by the President as the organ of his official communications to Congress. It is of the utmost importance that the official intercourse between the President and the Legislative department should not be liable to interruption. The proceedings of Congress could not be more effectually arrested by preventing the members of either House from going to the Hall of their deliberations than they might be by preventing the President from making official communications essentially connected with the legislation of the country.

"In the case under consideration, the Private Secretary, after having delivered a message from the President, was in the act of retiring, and almost within the very verge of this Hall, when the assault was committed upon him. The House was in session, and the person who committed the assault went immediately from the hall in which it was deliberating, where he was in the enjoyment of a privilege conceded to him in common with others who are engaged in reporting the proceedings of the House. If the Representatives of the people have not the power to punish an assault committed under these circumstances, then are they destitute of a power which belongs to the most inferior judicial tribunal in the country. The power of punishing for contempts is not peculiar to the common law of England. It belongs essentially to every judicial tribunal and every legislative body. The English law of contempts, as such, has not, surely, the slightest authority in the Supreme Court of the United States; yet the power of that court to vindicate its dignity and preserve its officers from outrage during its session, will scarcely be questioned. In like manner, though the parliamentary law of England, as such, can have no authority here; yet all the legislative bodies in the Union habitually act upon its rules.

"The power in question grows out of the great law of self-preservation. It is no doubt very liable to abuse, and ought always to be exercised with great moderation. In its very nature it is not susceptible either of precise definition or precise limitation. Each particular instance of its exercise must be adapted to the emergency which calls for it. While, therefore, the committee deem it a matter of great importance to maintain the existence of this power, as an essential means of vindicating the dignity and privileges of the House, they are clearly of the opinion that it ought never to be exercised, except in cases of strong necessity; and that the punishment inflicted under it ought never to be carried farther than shall be absolutely and imperiously required by the existing emergency.

"In the present case, though they think the conduct of Mr. Jarvis obnoxious to the censure of the House, yet they can hardly suppose that he was conscious at the time of committing the assault that he was offering a contempt to its authority. He disclaims, indeed, any such intention. And as the committee are aware that many persons, for whose opinions they have very great respect, entertain the belief that the assault in question was not a violation of any privilege of the House, they think they are required by the spirit of moderation and indulgence in which this power should always be exercised, to give Mr. Jarvis the benefit of the most favorable presumption, as to his views and intentions, touching the rights and privileges in question.

"They therefore recommend to the adoption of the House the following resolutions. It is proper, however, to remark, by way of explanation, that there was but a bare majority of the committee in favor of the first resolution, the minority entertaining the belief that the House possess no power touching the premises; and that there was but a bare majority of the committee in favor of the second resolution, the minority believing that it was expedient to vindicate the dignity of the House by inflicting some punishment for the violation of its privileges:

"Resolved, That the assault committed by Russel Jarvis on the person of John Adams, the private secretary of the President, in the rotundo of the Capitol, immediately after the said John Adams had delivered a message from the President to the House of Representatives, and while he was in the act of retiring from it, was a violation of privilege which merits the censure of this House.

"Resolved, That it is not expedient to have any further proceedings in this case."

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, from the same committee, made the following report:

"The minority of the Select Committee, to which was referred the message of the President in relation to an assault committed by Russel Jarvis upon his private secretary, whilst they concur with the majority in the results which they report of the evidence, and also in the expression of their disapprobation of the assault, in reference to the time when, and the place where, it was committed, beg leave to state their decided and unqualified dissent from that resolution of the report which affirms the power of this House to punish the assault in question as being a breach of privilege and a contempt, and to present a condensed view of the reasons which have conducted them to this conclusion. This power, if it exist, must rest for its support upon that doctrine of privilege which is said to be established by the law and custom of Parliament, a doctrine which, in their estimation, is as incompatible with the genius of our people and the principles of our Government as it is dangerous to the individual rights of the citizen. In proof of this, they propose to take a brief review of its origin and progress, as also of its practical application, in that deliberative assembly, which is generally regarded by those who assert the power, as the source whence precedents are to be derived illustrative of the proper occasion for its exercise. It is said by a celebrated writer upon the subject that the law of Parliament is to be sought after by all, is unknown only to a few; that it is to be learned out of the rolls of Parliament and other records, and by precedents and continual experience; 'that the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in the breast of Parliament itself, and are not defined and ascertained by any particular stated law'; and again, that the dignity and independence of the two houses are, in a great measure, preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite. Thus it appears, from the nature of this Parliamentary law and these Parliamentary privileges, that they are incompatible with the principles of our Government and against the dictates of justice; nothing can, without a solecism in language, be called a law, but some rule of action which is published to those who are to be affected by it, whilst it is seen that the law of Parliament, so misnamed, is locked up in their own bosoms; and nothing can be more unjust than to punish an individual for any offence against those privileges, the nature and character of which, being indefinite, are utterly unknown, and which only become known as particular cases occur, thus making the infliction of punishment the first evidence of the existence of the rule under which it is inflicted. The impropriety of such a course, which is apparent, upon the great principles of right and wrong, is strongly enforced by a reference to the 9th section of the 1st article of the constitution, which prohibits the passage of ex post facto laws. The reason for this prohibition is, the injustice of punishing as a crime an act indifferent in itself at the time when it was committed; but, in the eye of reason, there is no real difference between punishing an act which, at the time of its commission, was not criminal, and punishing one which, at the time of its commission, was not known to be criminal; and, by a singular coincidence, such ex post facto laws, amongst the Romans, were called Privilegia, a most apt name for Parliamentary privileges. The minority of the committee, before quoting some examples of the application of this unknown law and indefinite privilege, will avail themselves of the sentiments of a very sagacious writer for the purpose of showing their danger and injustice. "Suppose (says he) a man had personally offended a majority of the individuals who happen to compose a jury that is to try him. But suppose twelve men to commence a prosecution against one, and that those very individuals are immediately, in the very rage of their resentment, enclosed to pass a verdict and determine of a punishment for an offence against themselves. Would this have the smallest semblance of justice? On the contrary, is it not the very design of law to take out of the hands of the offended the trial and punishment of the offenders, and put it into those of indifferent persons?"

Assault on the President's Secretary.

"The same writer asks, why does not the House of Commons let the people know their privileges? Why are not those privileges established by law? When they think themselves offended, why do they not prosecute the offender in a legal and constitutional way, which would stop all reflection upon them? The king's causes are tried in the courts of justice, by judges and jury, who are indifferent persons; why is any individual; or any assembly of men whatever, to be judge, jury, and executioners, in their own cause? Again, he says, it may be affirmed that the people of England will never, while a spark of the fire of liberty remains, be reconciled to an assumed power in Representatives to imprison their constituents without trial by jury.

"It would be difficult to add to the force of the argument in these quotations. It has been said that the union of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers in the same body of men, is the very definition of tyranny. This union exists in all its force in the case of punishment for a legislative contempt; the same persons are the accusers, the triers, and the executioners; thus, not only violating the principle of immutable justice, that no man ought to be a judge of his cause, but performing the office of judge under feelings of excitement the most unpropitious to a calm and dispassionate investigation of the case. This general reasoning would of itself be sufficient to justify the declaration that the doctrine of privilege and punishment for Parliamentary contempt is of dangerous tendency, and incompatible with the principles of our Government; but if this conclusion be deducible from general reasoning, how greatly it is strengthened by reference to that series of precedents from which it is said that the law and custom of Parliament must be learned. From a few of the most prominent, which will now be quoted, it will be seen that, instead of the stream of justice flowing in a smooth and equable current, it has been thrown into constant agitation, sometimes by caprice, sometimes by the violence of angry excitement. A man named Cranfield was fined £500 each, to four members whom he had slandered. Lord Saville was committed to the tower for refusing to name the person who had written a letter to him, which Parliament had thought treacherous. In 1647, an order was made for several members of the House to take some of the deputies of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and to break open doors and seize trunks and papers of one Captain Vernon.

"In 1654, a schoolmaster was examined for an Arian book; the book was burnt by the hands of the hangman. He was confined in Newgate and then banished to the Isle of Scilly. There is a case which is remarkable for the caprice which dictated the punishment: two persons were placed back to back upon a horse, and, with a label specifying the offence, made to ride in this manner round Charing Cross; and that, too, for arresting a member's servant, in violation of a privilege not now claimed. As, however, it may be objected to some of these precedents that they occurred in bad times, that is, during the period of the long Parliament, some more modern ones will now be quoted. In the case of Shirley vs. Fagg, in the 27th of Charles II., the House of Commons maintained that an appeal taken from the Court of Chancery to the House of Lords, by Shirley against Fagg, who was one of their members, was a breach of their privileges. In another case, which was an appeal taken by Crispe against Valmahoy, who was a member, they imprisoned the sergeants and barristers who had pleaded for Crispe, contrary to an order of the House, as for a breach of privilege. In the case of Admiral Griffith, a member, certain persons who had trespassed on his fisheries were found guilty of a breach of privilege, and were ordered to stand committed, and were afterwards discharged, after being reprimanded on their knees, paying the costs. And, even as late as about the year 1811, Sir Francis Burdett was committed to the Tower of London for a breach of privilege, in writing, or publishing, a libel, as it was deemed by the House of Commons. In times more remote, judges were put in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and, in one instance, Judge Berkley was taken off his bench in Westminster Hall by the Usher of the Black Rod, to the great terror of his brethren; but the instances quoted of counsel being imprisoned for arguing a cause, and persons ordered to be committed for an alleged trespass, are strong illustrations of the position. That no man, or set of men, can be safely trusted with the unrestrained power of judging and punishing in their own case, it is not sufficient to say that the House will not follow such absurd precedents. Once let it be settled that it depends upon their discretion alone to decide whether there is a contempt or breach of privilege, and to decide both the kind and measure of punishment, without the power of any other tribunal to relieve, then the citizen's claim to liberty is not matter of right but of sufferance. Besides this view of the case, upon general principles, the minority of the committee are satisfied that the House does not possess the power in question, by force of various provisions of the constitution, to which they will now refer. In the 6th section of the 1st Article, the privileges of the members are precisely defined, and are made to consist in exemption from arrest, except in treason, &c., and from being questioned elsewhere for any speech in the House. These are privileges in the true meaning of that term; they are immunities or exemptions, and are personal to the members, and, as has been justly remarked, by the author of the Manual, they were probably defined with a view to arrest the encroaching character of privilege, whose characteristic feature has been, that claims have been advanced from time to time, and repeated, till some example of their admission enabled them to build law on that example. It is believed that no one will contend, since this provision, that there are any other privileges; when, therefore, the question arises about the right of punishing for contempt, it is really a question, not of privilege, but of power. It will now be attempted briefly to inquire into the powers of the House; they are to be found in several sections of the first article; they are, 1st. To choose their own Speaker and other officers; 2dly. To originate all bills for raising revenue; 3dly. The sole power of impeachment; 4thly. To determine the rules of its own proceedings, punishing its members for disorderly behavior, and expelling a member, with the concurrence of two-thirds; 5thly. The power to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. If the proposition be true, that the enumeration of two distinct personal privileges to the members be evidence that the framers of the constitution designed them to have no more, it would seem to follow, by parity of reason, that the enumeration of certain powers, as being given to the House, was evidence that the House should have no more powers. It is sometimes contended that, from the nature of things, the House must have certain inherent powers, and, amongst others, the power of protecting itself from insult. The provisions of the constitution above referred to seem to furnish an answer to this argument; for, if we are to impute to the House of Representatives any inherent power, what could more emphatically fall within that class than the following: a power to choose its own Speaker, without which it could not even be organized; a power to determine the elections, qualifications, &c., of its members, without which it could not know who were constitutionally elected; a power to punish its own members for disorderly behavior, without which there would be danger, at some period, of an utter prostration of all order. The guarded caution which thought it necessary to impart to the House power to give itself organization and action within itself, surely did not mean to leave the same House at liberty to range in the boundless field of wild and capricious precedent, in search of power to punish their fellow-citizens, whensoever and howsoever it pleased, without any chart or compass to guide its course, or limitation to restrain it, save only its own mere discretion, in acting on maxims and modes of proceeding, locked up in its own bosom, until applied in individual cases. The correctness of this idea may be strongly enforced by reference to the provision as to punishment in cases of impeachment; thus it is declared that punishment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification, &c. Now it would be strange that, in those cases in which the accusation was preferred by the House and tried by the Senate, the accusing and trying bodies being thus distinct, and in which, too, the Senators are required to be on oath, there should be a strict limitation of power, and yet, in the cases of contempt, in which the accusing and trying body are the same, and they are not upon oath for that purpose, there should be an unlimited power of punishment, both as to kind and amount.

"But there are other provisions of the constitution which bear upon this question. Thus, in the second section of the third article, it is declared that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. Now, a crime has been defined to be the omission of something commanded, or the commission of something prohibited, by law. Unless the act in question shall correspond with one or the other branch of this definition, it is not the subject of punishment at all; and if it be, then it is a crime, and, as such, ought to be tried by a jury. But there is a provision in the fifth amendment of the constitution, which is deemed to be conclusive—it is this: that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. The phrase, due process of law, is believed, ex vi termini, to imply that it must be before a judicial court or magistrate; but all the judicial power of the United States, except that stated in the first article, is vested in the courts of the Union. An application will now be made of this reasoning. The House of Commons consider it equally a breach of privilege, for which they punish, to assault or slander a member. Now, is it supposed that, if one of our members were slandered or libelled in a newspaper, we should not have the power of punishing, (if we exercised that power we should cease to legislate,) and why? Because the first amendment prohibits the passage of any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; so, when the fifth amendment prohibits the deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but by due course of law, it follows that, as commitment would be a privation of liberty, that cannot be done without due course of law; that is, in a regular proceeding before a judicial tribunal. It may be useful to pursue this idea further. It has been seen that, in one case, the Commons banished a man to the Isle of Scilly; if, without trial by due course of law, the House of Representatives can commit, in like manner may they banish; and, carrying the process one step further, and the last, they might, if ever they should be wild enough, take the life of a citizen; for life and liberty are only guarded in the same words; and if they can take the last by their own judgment, in their own case, so they might take the first. This provision in the fifth amendment is substantially the same with one in Magna Charta. It is true that, in the great case of Sir Francis Burdett against Mr. Abbott, the Speaker of the House of Commons, when this provision of Magna Charta was urged in argument, the Court attempted to parry its force by declaring that the law and custom of Parliament are a part of the law of the land, in its large sense, and that the expressions, according to the law of the land, and by due process of law, are, in effect, the same. The first answer to this is, that when the House of Commons imprisoned the counsel for appearing in an appeal at their bar, against a member of the Commons, the Lords voted this imprisonment to be a transcendent invasion on the right and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of right, and many other laws, which have provided that no freeman shall be imprisoned or otherwise restrained of his liberty, but by due process of law. Again: Those maxims which are locked up in the bosom of Parliament, unknown to the people, and proclaimed only as particular occasions occur, can with no propriety be considered as a part of the law of the land, the characteristics of which are, in every point, the contrast of this law and custom of Parliament. The law of the land, instead of being locked up in the bosom of the legislator, is made known to the people; and, instead of consisting of a set of hasty fragments or sentences, pronounced as the cases occur, it consists of general rules of action, not spending their force in individual cases, but applying to the whole community. But there is yet another answer to this idea, which is deemed conclusive: If it were for argument sake admitted that this law of Parliament was a part of the law of the land in England, it would be part of the common law. Now, it is not pretended that the common law belongs to the United States, as such; nay, the contrary has been solemnly adjudged, particularly in reference to the penal part of that system. This power is sometimes attempted to be supported by comparing it to that exercised by courts and State Legislatures; as it regards the courts of the States, although it is an anomaly, it is claimed upon the ground just discussed, as a part of the common law, which, it has been seen, does not belong to the United States, as such. As it regards the State Legislatures, they are the depositories of all the power of the people, which are not otherwise granted or prohibited to them; whilst, as respects Congress, it is apparent, from the constitution, that it was intended to define the particular powers which together they should possess as the Federal Legislature, and also those powers which should belong to each House separately. The example of the United States courts is against the argument; for Congress have, by express enactment, given those courts power to fine and imprison for contempt, which would have been wholly nugatory if they possessed it before.

"If it should be asked whether the two Houses of Congress are to sit at the mercy of every intruder who chooses to insult them without power to punish him, the answer is a ready one. In the first place, there is no reasonable probability of such a violent breach of decorum being wantonly committed; but as it is a possible, though extreme, case, it will be met by showing a very simple and obvious remedy. The chambers in which the two houses sit are under their exclusive control. They are authorized to establish the rules of their proceedings, and to appoint their officers; it is competent, then, for them to declare by their rules who shall and who shall not be admitted within their chambers. It is equally within their power to put out any person who may conduct himself indecorously; accordingly, by one of the rules of the House of Representatives, it is provided that, in case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the galleries or lobby, the Speaker or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole shall have power to order the same to be cleared. For that purpose we are furnished with officers, such as a sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, &c., whose duty it is to execute the warrants and orders of the House, and to preserve order when necessary. This, then, is a plain and adequate remedy for the removal of such interruption as obstructs the progress of business; as to any thing else, let the offending party be prosecuted in the judicial tribunals; or it is competent to Congress to make legislative provision if it were thought necessary.

"The same sagacious writer from whom quotations have already been made, holds this language: 'We now question the doctrine of a power in the Commons of imprisoning for any thing but what stops proceedings of the House, and is done in the House.' Such is the doubt expressed, even in relation to the omnipotent British Parliament. The minority of the committee hold the true principle, in reference to the two Houses of Congress to be this: They may remove any disorder or disturbance within their respective chambers, so as to prevent any obstruction to the progress of their business, but they have not the power of imprisoning for contempt. But if they had this power, still it could not be extended to embrace any case beyond their own chambers; for if it were, where would be the limits? The court, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn, give the answer: they say that they know no bounds to the process of this House for contempt but those of the United States. This principle they cannot admit to be correct. Tremendous would be that power which could drag before it any citizen, from Maine to Florida, and punish him for a contempt, of which the sole criterion would be the discretion of the power punishing. They would further state that, to maintain the power in this case would be to assume a stronger ground than that even claimed by courts; for, suppose that a witness had been summoned to attend a court, and after having deposed, should be assaulted upon the court ground, but so as not to disturb the court, and not in relation to his evidence; nay, suppose that a judge himself, after the adjournment of his court, should be assaulted, not in relation to his official conduct, but upon some personal quarrel, would it be contended that the process of contempt would lie in either of these cases? It is believed that it would not; if so, the power in question cannot be maintained, even by analogy to that of courts.

"The minority have felt that they owed it to themselves to state the grounds of their opinion upon a great question of constitutional law, which, to-day, is the case of Russel Jarvis, but which may be the case of any citizen in the Union.

"Under the influence of these considerations, they recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is not competent to the House of Representatives to punish Russel Jarvis for the assault upon the private secretary of the President, as for a contempt to the House."

[Both of the above reports were ordered to lie upon the table.]

Land Claims in Florida.

A bill from the Senate, supplementary to the several acts for the settlement of Private Land Claims in Florida, was read, and considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE said, it had been his duty, some years since, when he held the office of Commissioner, under the Florida Treaty, to devote considerable attention to the various laws of the United States providing for the adjustment of private land claims, as well as to the validity of Spanish land titles. He felt it due to himself, and to the House, to make some explanation, more in detail than he had done when the bill was under consideration before. This bill, he said, was reported in the Senate, and received the sanction of the committee of public and private land claims—was amended on the motion of two members of the Judiciary Committee, justly distinguished for their legal learning, and finally passed that body, after a discussion of three days. That enlightened branch of the National Legislature, and those eminent lawyers, supposed that the interest and rights of the United States were cautiously guarded, and amply protected, by its provisions. Two bills, less oppressive to the claimants, at the two last sessions of Congress, passed the House of Representatives. I could not, therefore, anticipate any objection to this bill, when, by the indulgence of the House, it was called up before; and time was not then afforded to reply to the arguments and insinuations that the Government was not sufficiently protected, in the mode of trial provided by the sections which referred a particular class of claims to the Judiciary for adjudication. Sir, I never have asked, nor wished any thing but a fair and impartial examination and decision of those claims. I have never sought any thing but an honest fulfilment of the stipulations of the Treaty between Spain and the United States. The only interest I have, or feel, is that of a Representative, solicitous for the honor and good faith of this Government, and the security of the rights of property of the inhabitants transferred to us. I appeal to the members of the committees, who have been charged with the consideration of these claims, to say whether I have not always urged such a bill as would exclude all fraudulent titles, and provide for the confirmation of those founded on equity, and embraced by the treaty. If this bill does more for the Spanish grantees than we are morally and legally bound to do, let it be so modified as to accomplish the object.

The eighth article of the treaty in substance stipulates that the United States shall confirm to the claimants their titles to the same extent that Spain would have ratified them, if the provinces had not been ceded to us. The obligation imposed by this treaty cannot be denied or evaded. The quo modo of executing it is left to the wisdom of this Government. It must be by legislation, or a tribunal must be organized to decide what is public and what private property. To make the decision final and conclusive, an appeal must be given to the Supreme Court. A legislative act to divert a right secured by treaty would be unconstitutional. Any adjudication which an act of Congress would declare final, without an appeal to the Supreme Court, would be as unjust as it would be ineffectual. Whenever the United States, or any one claiming under them, takes possession, the claimant can assert his right in court, and have his title judicially investigated. To decide these claims, Boards of Commissioners have been organized, with limited powers, and all titles to the extent of 3,500 acres have been confirmed, which were decided by them to be valid. That there are valid grants to a larger quantity of land, no one can deny. That the obligation to ratify large as well as small grants is imposed on the United States, is a proposition too obvious to be questioned. The grants, submitted to the Judiciary by this bill, have been, with a few exceptions, favorably reported by the Commissioners. Six years have elapsed since the surrender of the Floridas, and nothing has been done.

These titles, as I before had occasion to remark, depend on the local ordinances of a foreign Government, whose civil jurisprudence in its origin and present conformation, is entirely different from our own, and whose land system is sui generis. Can this House or its committees understand these titles? Sir, we might as well dismiss all our Auditors, Comptrollers, and Judges, and undertake to give opinions seriatim upon all the accounts arising out of the various and complex relations of this Government. Congress would be truly the Aula Regis of the nation; we should have a consolidation of all the divisions of power, and the idea of checks in the different departments would be exploded. What figure would a committee of Congress make in the decision of land titles in Kentucky under the compact with Virginia, and the numerous statutes of both States? They must, of course, find themselves more embarrassed in relation to titles, the origin, progress, and completion of which are entirely different from our own. I consider that a bad title has almost as good a chance as a good one. Since I have had the honor of a seat here, I have seen favorable reports on claims neither supported by law nor equity, and unfavorable upon those sustained by both. The United States have confirmed nearly a million of acres of land held under British titles in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to which I think it can be demonstrated that there is no color of title. These grants, if they had been referred to the Supreme Court, would have been all rejected. There are titles of the same description to at least a million of acres in the Territory I represent. The commissioners of West Florida made such a report upon them that no one who ever read it has advocated these claims. They were endeavored to be supported by flimsy and unsatisfactory expositions of national law, wholly inapplicable to them. Notwithstanding these errors, we are told we ought to go on in the same course, because it is unbecoming our dignity to be sued! Sir, I think it more consonant with our dignity to discharge our treaty of obligation, and save the public domain by a speedy, impartial decision, than to display this affectation of sovereign consequence when just claimants are postponed in their rights, and the public lands wasted by improvident legislation. Sir, I do not concur either in the fact or the inference from it. This bill does not authorize a suit against the State; it only proposes the means of ascertaining the validity of a grant in a court of the United States. The settlement of every account at the Treasury is as much a suit against the United States as this bill authorizes. The accounting officers are required to adjust and pay the claims against the Government, provided for by law. This bill refers claims under a treaty, which is the supreme law, to a different tribunal for settlement. In the one case, auditors, comptrollers, and secretaries, pronounce, and in the other, judges make the decisions. There is no distinction in reason or in fact—a Government must act through the agency of its officers, judicial or ministerial. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. GURLEY) has argued that no act of legislation is necessary to enable the claimants to institute suits for the trial of their titles. Without stopping to inquire how far an action against a mere trespasser, without pretence of right, would bind the United States, it appears to me, if his argument be correct, it is more forcible than any I could employ, why this bill should pass. The United States to be bound by an ex parte judicial decision, against a nominal defendant, to the amount of a million of acres of land! This would be strange, indeed, sir. How much better is it to have a fair issue taken by the Government and the claimant; the one contending it is public, the other private property; before a tribunal competent to decide, and both represented by counsel.

If the grant is not such as this Government stipulated to confirm under the treaty, it is a part of the public domain ceded by it. The Government will neither survey and sell, nor permit the claimants to do so. If a sale were made by them, the title would of course be subject to litigation before the judicial tribunals of the country. The United States would sell to a claimant, who would calculate the issue of a protracted lawsuit, and give a corresponding diminution in price, and they would be subject to the imputation of having been faithless in the execution of their treaty, in not having provided for a decision before they asserted the right of disposing of the land.

It may not be unprofitable to take a review of the history of our legislation on this subject. The treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, imposed on our Government the duty of ratifying all claims derived from the French and Spanish Governments. To fulfil this stipulation, this Government organized a local commission, with limited powers, and confirmed their reports on small grants. The larger concessions and grants were referred to Congress. The Secretary of the Treasury made a report assuming one league square as the limit of the power of a Governor, and Congress confirmed to that extent. It was very soon ascertained that this was an arbitrary limit fixed upon by him, and unsupported by any ordinance of either Government, unless it was an antiquated and exploded one of the French Government, under which few of the titles were held. In fact, it was ascertained that the Secretary did not, and could not understand the subject, from the very limited means of information before him. The claims over this arbitrary quantity have remained unadjusted for twenty years, with the exception of a few which occasionally find favor in this House, by the favorable report of a committee, who construe civil law titles by common law rules, and recommend a confirmation. The remainder have suffered all the anguish of hope deferred, and worn out the greater part of their lives in unproductive petitions and unavailing supplication. The claimants have petitioned, the Legislature has memorialized, the Governor has denounced the injustice, and the President has called on Congress to execute in good faith our treaties. Notwithstanding this formidable array, the claims of Louisiana remain unadjusted. If this simple question is put to any honest man, if this claim be good, ought it not to be confirmed? he would answer yes. If it be bad, ought it not to be rejected? the answer would be in the affirmative. Now, sir, who is so competent to decide whether these claims are good or bad, valid or invalid, as a court learned in the laws under which it was derived and consummated, familiar from long practice with such questions, and having access to the records and books necessary to give the information? But, say some gentlemen, we cannot trust questions of such magnitude to the courts. Sir, this intimation is as derogatory to our national character, as it is unjust to that pure and enlightened department of our Government. The judiciary, the depository of the power that protects life, liberty, and property, the constitutional arbiter of the powers of the co-ordinate departments, not to be trusted with a decision of meum and tuum for a few thousand acres of land! The idea is unworthy of serious refutation. The suggestion is not only disreputable and absurd, but it is ineffectual as a pretence for opposing this bill. Suppose the United States refuse to confirm or to pass a law authorizing the trial of such a claim as that of the Baron de Bastrop, in Louisiana, or John Forbes & Co. in Florida. So long as they do not act, the claimants are kept off, or rather I should say, cannot find a place on which to put their lever. If the United States survey or sell ten, twenty, or fifty thousand acres of this land, is there any power in this Government to prevent those claimants from bringing suits to try the validity of their titles against the purchasers under the United States? There is not. It is only by a failure to act that those claimants are prejudiced.

A suit is then instituted against a purchaser, who does not care for the result, because, having the patent of the Government, he has a claim for indemnity if he loses. A collusion might take place between the claimants and this purchaser, by which the interest of the Government might be compromised. It is manifest, from this view of the subject, that the United States make a great sacrifice by selling, when there is an unadjusted title to the same land. When the sale is effected, a suit, under most unpropitious circumstances, will be carried on against their purchaser, by which they are bound. How much better is it, whether we consult policy, principle, or good faith, to have the investigation fairly made, the right judicially determined, before we place a country and claimants in such a situation. But, to proceed with the history of our legislation. The Florida treaty contains a stipulation which is not to be found in any other; it provides for a confirmation to the same extent that the Spanish Government would have ratified the titles. In relation to these, we have also organized a Board of Commissioners with limited powers, and required them to report their opinions, upon all over their jurisdiction, to Congress. This has been done in part. When I came here, two years ago, I asked a confirmation of all claims which had received the favorable recommendation of the Commissioners. This was denied. There was no precedent. I then solicited an examination and confirmation of such as should be approved. This could not be done for want of time. I then petitioned a reference of them to the courts. This was agreed to in the House of Representatives, and refused in the Senate. I then endeavored to find out what would meet the views of the Senate, and learned that they preferred a great commission to sit here at Washington, under our supervision, to decide all the claims. I agreed, so far as my constituents were concerned, to submit their rights to this Board. The subject was discussed, various objections started, "Chimeras and gorgons dire" conjured up. The commission would not do, but the courts would. The Judiciary, that could not be trusted last year, can be at this time, and what they resolved last year in the Senate, has been reversed this, and they send this bill. We are now called upon to reject it; although we passed it two years ago. If I may be permitted to borrow an illustration from a fable we have all read—it may be play to some, but death to my constituents. It is not so much a matter of importance how the decisions are made, as it is that they shall be made. The general effect is the same upon the country. If the land is decreed to belong to the United States, the Government will sell it; if it belong to individual grantees, they will sell or cultivate it. So long as it is suspended in this way, it is like the miser's treasure, useless to himself and the world. I did not rise to go into this debate so fully. I have not time to go into it at length, at this late period of the session. I entreat the friends of the bill not to discuss it further. The House, I am sure, understand it fully. I will only express my surprise that the gentleman from Louisiana opposes this bill with so much zeal. I hold in my hand a memorial of the Legislature of his State, I believe unanimously adopted, urging the necessity of a reference of their claims to the Judiciary.

[Here Mr. WHITE read two extracts from the memorial.]

The diversity of opinion between that gentleman and the Legislature of his State may arise from the fact, that there are in his district a number of these unsettled claims, covered by occupants, who have neither titles from the grantees nor the United States. The longer they keep out the claimants, the stronger their right of prescription becomes, and neither the Government nor the grantees derive any benefit from the land.

I know that some of my constituents have lands within that gentleman's district, which must come to trial at some day. It is in vain that hopes are entertained that the time is to be procrastinated much longer. It is better now to have a decision, by which all uncertainty will be removed, and permanent improvements be begun. The gentleman is opposed to a decision by the courts, but has done me the honor to say he would be willing to submit the claims to my decision. I thank him for the flattering estimate he has been pleased to place upon my character and competency; but if I have, in the office I filled under this Government, or in any other capacity, been so fortunate as to propitiate the good opinion of this House, or any portion of it, I beg to make that character useful to my constituents by a solemn assurance to it that this bill contains every protection for the interests of the Government, and is the only satisfactory mode in which these claims can be settled. I will only make one further remark, which is personal to myself. It has been insinuated out of doors, that I am largely interested in the claims to be adjudicated in the courts under this act, if it should become a law. Whether this has been invented here, or sent in insidious letters to members of this House, I do not know; I here pronounce, in my place, the insinuation or charge wholly destitute of foundation. I am neither directly nor indirectly, privately nor professionally, interested in a single claim. If I were interested in every one, it is no objection to the bill; we ask an impartial trial, and not a confirmation. Whether I shall or shall not be counsel for any of these claimants, is a matter for them and myself, and certainly has no bearing on the intrinsic merits of the bill, which I trust will pass.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[Mr. GURLEY opposed the bill in the form in which it was ordered to be engrossed, and earnestly endeavored to have it amended in such a manner as to leave the settlement of the claims to Congress, and not to the Judiciary, but without success.]

MONDAY, May 19.

Retrenchment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the committee on the subject of a retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government, reported, in part, a joint resolution, in relation to the manner of executing the printing ordered by either House of Congress; which was twice read.

In support of it, he made a few remarks, and exhibited a printed document to show the saving that would result to the United States from having it printed in a more compact form. He referred to the inconvenience of searching through a number of volumes of Executive communications to find a particular report from one of the Departments.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, observing that this resolution proposes effecting almost a total change in the present mode of executing the public printing, and wishing further time for considering it, moved to lay it upon the table.

The motion prevailed, and the resolution was laid upon the table accordingly.

Franking Privilege to Charles Carroll, of Carrollton.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House took up the joint resolution granting to Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, sole surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, the privilege of receiving and franking letters and packages, and ordered the same to a third reading; and it was subsequently read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Delaware Breakwater.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill from the Senate making appropriations to commence the erection of a breakwater in Delaware Bay.

Mr. SUTHERLAND declared his readiness to give any necessary explanations, when the bill should come into the House.

Mr. GILMER called for the reading of the report of the committee in this case.

Mr. SERGEANT, in reply to this call, said, that the report, documents, and, in general, all the information on the subject of this important national work, had been collected and published in a pamphlet, intended to be placed in the hands of all the members. He had hoped that a copy had been furnished to the member from Georgia, (Mr. GILMER.) If that was not the case he (Mr. S.) would give him his copy, where he would find the report. He submitted to him (Mr. GILMER) whether, under these circumstances, he would occupy the time of the committee in having the report read?

Mr. GILMER thereupon withdrew his call for the reading of the report, and the bill was laid aside.

Canal Land Grant to Ohio.

The committee, on motion of Mr. ISAACKS, took up the bill granting a quantity of land to the State of Ohio, to aid in the construction of the canals authorized by laws of that State.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the bill by striking out "500,000 acres," and inserting "1,200,000," and defended the amendment by referring to similar grants made to the State of Indiana. The amendment was negatived.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, the committee then proceeded to consider the bill to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami Canal from Dayton to Lake Erie.

Mr. MERCER urged the propriety of passing this bill. It was then laid aside.

Land Grant to Alabama.

The committee then proceeded to consider the bill granting certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahawba, and Black Warrior Rivers.

Mr. MERCER moved the following amendment, which he had been directed to offer by the Committee of Roads and Canals:

To strike out the word "and" from the last line of the 6th section, and add the following clause:

"And be calculated for the use of steamboats, according to such plan of construction as the United States Engineers, appointed to survey and report thereon, may recommend, and the President of the United States approve, provided that such plan shall embrace, if practicable, a connection of the navigation of Elk River with the said improvements."

Mr. GILMER inquired what relief had been granted to settlers on vacant lands in Alabama.

Mr. MERCER answered the inquiry, but reminded the gentleman from Georgia that this bill proposed to give them no additional relief, and only referred to what had been done, as being necessary to a description of the lands referred to. A steamboat navigation existed both above and below the Muscle Shoals. The canal necessary to avoid that obstruction would be thirty miles in length, and all the committee wished to secure was, that it should be of such dimensions as would admit the steamboat navigation to continue.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill laid aside.

Relief to Railroads.

The committee took up the bill "to admit iron and machinery for railroads free of duty."

Mr. MILLER having no idea that the House could ever pass this bill, with a view to save the time that might be wasted in debate, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BARNEY opposed the motion with great warmth, attributing it, in part, at least, to a feeling of jealousy existing in Philadelphia, in relation to the rapid rise of Baltimore.

Mr. SERGEANT replied, disclaiming all such motives and feelings on the part of Philadelphia; stated the various railroads already commenced in Pennsylvania, and inferred the interests which that State had in the bill, but stated the universal sentiment prevalent in that State, as to the ability of the ironmasters to furnish whatever would be required by the railroad companies. He referred, by way of illustration, to what had been done in making cast-iron pipes, for the conveyance of water to Philadelphia. Speaking of the allusion which had been made to the Breakwater, he said he saw no reason why these two things should be brought, as it were, into opposition with each other. There was no natural hostility between them. Each must stand upon its own merits. As to the Breakwater, he calculated upon the support of a great majority of the House, and, especially, of the gentleman from Baltimore. Baltimore was almost as much interested in it as Philadelphia. It was a work completely national, to all intents and purposes. There was not a port in the United States, from New Orleans to the most northeasterly port in the Union, not a point on the seaboard, that was not interested in it. The interior, too, universally, had an interest in it. Scarcely a spot could be named, that might not be shown to be concerned in the protection to be afforded by the proposed harbor. Why, then, should it be connected with any other question?

Mr. DRAYTON advocated the bill at considerable length, and replied to the arguments of Mr. SERGEANT. The ironmasters had themselves admitted their incapacity to supply the iron required, and the continual importations from abroad were evidence of the fact. Of the 90,000 tons annually consumed, only 80,000 were furnished by our own factories. The construction of this railroad would be a great benefit to the ironmasters of Pennsylvania, and the remission of the duty would injure nobody.

Mr. STEWART yielded to no one in zeal for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; he considered it not a local, but a national object, uniting the Atlantic and Western States. He was willing to aid the company to the full extent of the national interest involved in its accomplishment. He would vote for a direct appropriation of double the amount of the duties on iron. But, to this bill, he was decidedly opposed; it was at war with all his principles; it was, in effect, offering a bounty on the importation of foreign iron; it was a virtual repeal of the tariff, just passed, as to iron. He suggested an amendment, to pay the same bounty on the use of American iron. This would leave the American and foreign manufacturers on equal footing; as it now stood, it was granting a bounty to the foreigner, to the prejudice of the American, which he could never sanction by his vote. He made some remarks in reply to Mr. DRAYTON.

Mr. BURGESS defended the bill, contending that no duty laid on the importation could materially benefit the ironmasters in the interior. Of that which was made in Pennsylvania, only one-third went to Philadelphia, and two-thirds of it to the West, which was a proof that foreign iron did not control the price. He denied that either Pennsylvania or Maryland would suffer any injury, while all who were concerned in railroads received an immediate benefit.

On motion of Mr. GORHAM, the committee then rose, and reported the bills, and they were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Delaware Breakwater.

On the question of ordering the bill making appropriations for the Breakwater, to its third reading,

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and stood—

YEAS.—Messrs. Addams, Anderson of Maine, Anderson of Pa., Armstrong, Baldwin, Barker, Barlow, Barney, Bartlett, Bartley, Bates of Massachusetts, Beecher, Blake, Brent, Bryan, Burges, Butman, Carson, Condict, Coulter, Creighton, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Davenport of Ohio, Dickinson, Dorsey, Everett, Findlay, Forward, Fry, Gale, Gorham, Gurley, Hunt, Ingersoll, Isaacs, Johns, Keese, Kerr, King, Lawrence, Leffler, Little, Livingston, Mallary, McDuffie, McIntire, McKean, McLean, Mercer, Miller, Miner, Mitchell of Pa., Moore of Kentucky, Moore of Alabama, Newton, O'Brien, Orr, Owen, Pearce, Piereson, Plant, Ramsey, Reed, Richardson, Ripley, Russell, Sergeant, Shepperd, Sloane, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Stanberry, Stevenson of Pa., Sterigere, Strong, Swann, Swift, Sutherland, Taylor, Thompson of New Jersey, Tracy, Tucker of New Jersey, Vance, Varnum, Vinton, Washington, Whipple, Whittlesey, Wilson of Pa., Woodcock, Wolf, Wright of Ohio, Yancey—95.

Canal Land Grant to Ohio.

The bill authorizing the continuation of the Dayton Canal having come into the House,

Mr. McLEAN made a full explanation of the circumstances on which it was founded.

Mr. S. WOOD inquired how far this canal run through the public lands.

Mr. McLEAN replied, between 70 and 80 miles.

Mr. BURGESS supported the bill, on the principle that the State of Ohio having greatly benefited the public lands, by commencing this canal, it was fair that the United States should render her an equivalent, to aid her in its completion.

The bill was ordered to its third reading, by yeas 95, nays 60.

Mr. McCOR moved an adjournment, but the motion was negatived—ayes 78, noes 81.

Further Canal Land Grant to Ohio.

The question being on ordering the bill granting lands to Ohio, to aid in constructing the canals, ordered by the State,

MAY, 1838.]

Ohio Canal.

Mr. BASSETT objected to it, and asked its friends if they had no conscience. He thought the House had done quite enough for one day. They had just given away 1,400,000 acres of land to the State of Ohio, and here was another bill for as much more.

Mr. STANBERRY explained the object of the bill, which was to aid the State of Ohio in refunding the capital which she had borrowed for the construction of the two canals in that State; one from Portland to Lake Erie, by way of the Licking and Portage summits, and the other from Cincinnati to Lake Erie, through Dayton. He referred to the pressure of direct taxes, laid by the State, to carry on this great improvement; he stated that they were, on that account, beginning to grow unpopular, and expressed his apprehension, should this bill fail, that one of them might be suspended the next season.

Mr. ISAACS said, that the grant of land, in both these bills, taken together, was less than that made last Congress to the State of Indiana.

Mr. VINTON went into a full statement of the condition of the Ohio lands, and insisted on the propriety of the amendment he had offered in committee.

To obviate a difficulty started by Mr. SPRAGUE, Mr. MERRICK moved the following proviso:

"Provided, That, in the lands hereby granted, no lands shall be comprehended, which have been reserved for the use of the United States, as alternate sections in the grants hitherto made, or which may be made, during the present session of Congress, of land within the said State, for roads and canals:" which was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE briefly advocated the bill, stating that Ohio had paid into the public Treasury many millions of dollars, and the United States ought not to be scrupulous in granting her a few thousand acres of land to aid a great national improvement.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved the previous question, which being sustained, put, and carried.

Mr. LUMPKIN, on the main question, asked the yeas and nays, and being taken, they stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Baldwin, John S. Barbour, Barlow, Barney, Bartley, Beecher, Bell, Blake, Brent, Cambreleng, Chilton, Condict, Coulter, Creighton, Daniel, Davenport of Ohio, Desha, Dorsey, Duncan, Everett, Findlay, Gorham, Gurley, Hunt, Isaacs, Johns, Lawrence, Lecompte, Lea, Leflier, Letcher, Little, Lyon, Mallary, Marable, Martindale, McDuffie, McHatton, McKean, McKee, McLean, Mercer, Metcalf, Miller, Mitchell of Pa., Mitchell of Tennessee, Moore of Ky., Moore of Alabama, Newton, Orr, Owen, Pierson, Polk, Ramsey, Richardson, Russell, Sergeant, Shepperd, Sloane, Smith of Indiana, Stanberry, Swann, Sutherland, Taylor, Vance, Vinton, Washington, Whipple, Whittlesey, Wolf, Wright of Ohio, Yancey—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Addams, Alexander, Allen of Va., Anderson of Maine, Armstrong, Bailey, P. P. Barbour, Barker, Barnard, Barringer, Bartlett, Bassett, Belden, Blair, Brown, Bryan, Buckner, Burges, Chase, Claiborne, Clark of New York, Clark of Ky., Conner, Culpeper, Davenport of Virginia, Davis of Mass., Dickinson, Drayton, Earll, Floyd of Georgia, Fort, Forward, Fry, Gilmer, Hall, Harvey, Healy, Hobbie, Hoffman, Keese, Kremer, Locke, Long, Lumpkin, Markell, Martin, Marvin, McCoy, McIntire, Mitchell of S. J. Wood, S. Wood, Woodcock, Wright of New York—75.

Mr. STANBERRY, referring to the fact, that the bill just rejected had, in Committee of the Whole, been considered before the bill for the Dayton Canal, suggested, that the order had been changed in the House by some management of one of the officers of the House.*

Mr. STANBERRY was called to order, but insisted on inquiring whether this had taken place from management, or by accident only. He said he was induced to make the inquiry, because the result agreed so exactly with the views of a certain party in this House.

Mr. STANBERRY was here again called to order;

When, on motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 20.

Ohio Canal.

After the reading of the Journal of the preceding day, Mr. CLARK, of New York, rose and said:

Mr. Speaker: On the question of engrossing the bill granting lands to the State of Ohio, to aid in the completion of one of her canals, (that from Cleveland to the Ohio River,) I voted in the negative. I intend, before resuming my seat, to move a reconsideration of the question. It is due to the friends of this important work, that they should have a fair hearing; that its merits should be fairly discussed; that the question should be met openly and manfully; and, if the bill is to be defeated, that they should know on what grounds; whether it is to fall a sacrifice to party management, or be rejected on principle. When the vote was taken yesterday, the House was not usually full, and I have yielded to the request of the friends of the bill, to move the reconsideration, to enable gentlemen who were absent to record their votes. Though, myself, opposed to the bill, for reasons other than those of policy and expediency, I feel no disposition to insist on the accidental advantage, which the lean majority of three gives, to the opponents of the measure. I wish the will of the majority of this House, when fairly expressed, to take effect; and, whether that will may accord or conflict with my own, I shall cheerfully submit to its mandate, and lend my aid to its expression.

* Mr Stanberry, before the subject was done with, fully exonerated, in open session, the officers of the House from the imputation of having transposed the bills, though the fact of the transposition remained as stated, and the consequent loss, in the House, of the bill that lost its place on the calendar, and which Mr. Stanberry particularly favored.

The House will recollect, that the bill authorizing the donation of lands for the benefit of the Dayton Canal, passed to be engrossed by a majority of thirty-five. It is not my purpose to speak of the comparative merits of the two canals, any farther than to show the inconsistency of gentlemen who advocated the one and opposed the other. Sir, I did not admire the manner in which this bill was yesterday defeated. The bill for the benefit of the Dayton Canal, one of less importance than the Cleveland Canal, and one, I am informed, of doubtful practicability, owing to a supposed insufficient supply of water on the summit level, passed in silence; all was calm and tranquil; but, the moment this bill was called up—a bill depending on the same principles as the former, but dispensing the public bounty to a more meritorious object—all the political elements were in agitation, and the waves of party were dashing it to destruction. Such anxiety, such shuffling, such bolting, such changing of votes, I have at no time witnessed. The confusion has not been equalled since the tumultuous and disastrous retreat of the army of Xerxes, after the battle of Salamis; certainly not since the memorable "races of Bladensburg."

Sir, I concede the right to gentlemen to change their votes at pleasure, neither do I, in this case, impeach the motives of any one. Those gentlemen who voted for one of these bills, and against the other, may have had good and weighty reasons for so doing, which they did not think proper to communicate to the House. But it so happens, that some fourteen or sixteen gentlemen who thus changed their votes, belong to the same political side of the House; and some eight or ten who happened to leave their places, immediately preceding the vote, belong to the same side. Sir, the gentleman from Ohio, who moved this bill, (Mr. STANBERRY,) has good reason to exclaim, "Save me from my" Internal Improvement "friends, I can take care of my enemies." Why did the gentleman from Ohio, not now in his place, (Mr. VINTON,) deem it necessary to attack his colleague (Mr. STANBERRY) in relation to a statement made by the latter? Here we see two gentlemen, professing to be embarked in the same cause, and anxious to attain the same object, at odds about trifles, and cavilling about straws. The mover of this bill, in the course of his remarks to the House, had stated in round numbers, that about eight millions of acres of land, in the State of Ohio, now belonged to the United States. Here, then, was presented to the gentleman (Mr. VINTON) a fine opportunity to show his stern regard to truth, and passionate fondness for the Cleveland Canal! He made a speech; gave a history of the Ohio lands; how many acres the United States originally owned; how many sold; and, by the complex rule of subtraction, ascertained, that the Government still owns seven and a half millions of acres, and not the enormous quantity of eight millions, as asserted by his colleague, (Mr. STANBERRY.) And why all this? Was it for the purpose of furnishing a veil to throw over the votes of gentlemen who had made up their minds to go against the bill? Or was it merely for the purpose of putting the House in possession of this important information? As the gentleman voted for the bill, I am bound, in charity, to believe the former. I impeach not his motives, but I must be permitted to remark, that his course was illy calculated to propitiate a friendly feeling for the bill.

The gentleman, sir, was not content with this manifestation of his devotion to the interests of this canal. He took the bill to his fond embrace, and gave it a warm fraternal hug. (I thought it looked blue in the face at the time.) In the abundance of his zeal, in the overflowing of his kindness, he proposed an amendment to increase the donation from one-half million to twelve hundred thousand acres of land. Was this intended as an evidence of his friendship for the bill, or was it to excite a spirit of distrust and alarm? Disclaiming all intention to impugn the motives of the gentleman, I must again crave the indulgence of the House, while I am permitted to say, that the effect of such a proposition was well calculated to defeat the bill.

Then, sir, follows a farce, got up between two friends of the measure, brethren of the same political household—an amicable warfare, a mock battle, is fought between these co-workers in the cause of internal improvement. The gentleman from Ohio, on my left, (Mr. VANCE,) somewhat cavalierly, and in ironic mood, said, in substance, that a gift, by the United States to Ohio, of a few hundred thousand acres of land, might well be made—it was of no consequence—a mere trifle! "O no," says the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY,) "though I am friendly to the canal, I can never consent to vote away the public domain as a gift. I support the bill on the ground that the Government has already received an equivalent in the enhanced value of its lands." Thus ends the friendly strife. By this time the victim is prepared for the immolation; the ceremony is performed, and the bill is handed over to its executioners. Sir, if it was right to pass the first bill, the second deserved a better destiny. Whatever merits belong to one are common to both—they involve the same principles, and should go hand in hand to their fate.

Ohio Canal.

Mr. BLAKE rose and said, that he was not a little astonished at the remarks which had just fallen from the gentleman from New York. Sir, said he, I was in the House yesterday, when the bill was under consideration, to which the gentleman has alluded—the bill granting lands to the State of Ohio, to aid in making canals authorized by that State. I was in the House just before the vote was taken, and at the time the vote was taken, and I saw nothing of the confusion and excitement which the gentleman states to have then occurred. The gentleman's remarks are calculated to induce a belief that the bill was rejected in consequence of an understanding among some of the members of this House, who are avowedly friendly to the policy of internal improvements; but surely such cannot be the fact, for there never was a transaction in any legislative body, more susceptible of explanation, than the vote thus given. There is not, on this occasion, the slightest necessity for implicating the character and honor of this House. As the gentleman's remarks have a tendency to make an improper impression, not only here, but on the public mind elsewhere—for it is well known they will not be confined to these walls—I will state what I consider to be the reason which influenced many of the members, in the majority of the House, to vote as they did. I had examined both bills on this subject before I was called on to vote—both the bill rejected, and the bill to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami Canal from Dayton to Lake Erie; for I then felt, and still feel, a lively interest in behalf of both. The bill rejected is not, as the gentleman has stated, based upon the same principles of the other bill: for the other bill grants land to Ohio, along the route of the canal, reserving alternate sections to the General Government; but the former proposes a grant of land generally, without confining it to the route, and without any alternate reservation. And in consequence of this difference, which comparatively precluded an accruing benefit to the General Government, many of those in the majority of the House, I presume, sir, deemed it proper that they should vote against it. Indeed, such was the reason assigned to me by some of the members.

Sir, in the State of Ohio, there are at present two canals contemplated, one crossing the State from the Scioto to Cleveland, and the other from Cincinnati, by Dayton and the Miami, to Lake Erie. The grant of lands made to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, covers a portion of the territory within the chartered limits of Ohio, and the bill granting lands to construct the Dayton Canal, as it is called, and which was ordered to a third reading yesterday, authorized the State of Indiana to convey that portion to the State of Ohio on such terms as they may agree on as being mutually proper. It was, therefore, important to the two States that this latter bill should have passed, as it prevents the difficulties which might have arisen, and what is at least equally important, it will produce a unity of interest. The gentleman has, however, stated that this contemplated canal route by Dayton and the Miami to Lake Erie, as he is informed, is impracticable; that the scheme is a visionary one. But I must say to that gentleman that this is not the fact: for the country has been thoroughly examined by skilful engineers, and they have given the fullest assurances that it is practicable, and that, too, with great facility. The statement of the gentleman, in this particular, might, in some degree, prejudice the character of this important work, which is deeply interesting to Indiana and Illinois, and it was not only proper, but indispensable, that I should rebut the statement with the fact.

[Mr. BLAKE having observed that Mr. CLARK had alluded to the fact of the Ohio bills being taken up in a different order in the House, from what was observed in committee,

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, called him to order, denying that Mr. CLARK had made any such remark, and appealing to the Chair whether the gentleman from Indiana was in order.

The SPEAKER replied that he had heard no such remark from the gentleman from New York, and that, therefore, any thing purporting to be in reply to it was out of order.

Mr. CLARK disclaimed having made the remark imputed to him.

Mr. BLAKE said, that, if that was the case, he must have greatly misunderstood the gentleman. He had certainly thought that such a remark had been made by the gentleman; and he was persuaded that the misplacing of the bills must have happened, if at all, through accident only.

Here Mr. MOORE again called Mr. BLAKE to order, and the SPEAKER said that the bills had not been misplaced; that the one had no preference over the other, both being bills from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that the Clerk had done nothing improper, in relation to them, of which he had any knowledge.]

Mr. STANBERRY said, that he rose for the purpose of making reparation to the wounded feelings of the Clerk of the House. He had not been correctly understood when he addressed the House yesterday; and if he had been permitted to finish his remarks, that officer would have found that he had no reason to be offended. It did, indeed, appear to him very extraordinary, that the bills should not have been taken up in the House in the same order as they had been considered in committee, and he had known, perfectly well, that it would be death and destruction to the bill, in which he felt most interested, to have the other first considered. He had seen, however, a feeling manifested on the occasion which he did not anticipate. All his colleagues, he was persuaded, must have known the importance of that bill to the State of Ohio, and must have had its passage greatly at heart. They, no doubt, felt so still, and he expected them to come out and aid him on the present occasion. He repeated that the accident appeared to him most extraordinary, but he was confident the Clerk had nothing to do in the matter; and all he had wished, was, that an investigation might take place, to see if there had been any collusion, and management, in producing the result which had actually happened.

Mr. VANCE said he believed there was no man of any party who did not know that he was in favor of both the bills, as tending to promote interests in which Ohio was deeply concerned; but if one of them was to be preferred before the other, he felt entirely satisfied that the preference ought to be given to the bill which did pass—all the gentleman's knowledge of the geography of Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding. The Dayton Canal runs from 80 to 90 miles through the public lands, whereas, the Scioto Canal did not run within 60 miles of the lands of the United States. The gentleman from New York had signified a doubt whether there would be any water for the Dayton Canal. He would take the liberty to tell that gentleman that the region through which that canal runs was the best watered portion of the State of Ohio, and he would state another fact, which was, that the Scioto Canal would have been originally located in that vicinity, had not the population of the State required it to be run through a more thickly settled portion of the country. Besides, the bill for the Dayton Canal did not, in effect, give the State a single dollar, because the alternate sections reserved to the United States were, by its provisions, set at just double the ordinary price, whereas, the other bill allows the State to go into these reserved sections, and select lands in one section of Ohio for the benefit of another section of the same State. He would add one word as to the reflections cast out by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLARK,) of a want of sincerity on the part of himself and a portion of his colleagues.

[The SPEAKER here interposed, and said that he had heard no such accusation uttered by the gentleman from New York.]

Mr. VANCE replied, and reminded the Speaker that the gentleman had said, that when a colleague of his (Mr. VINTON) got hold of the bill, he grasped it till he made it blue in the face; and, if that gentleman meant to accuse him, or such of his colleagues as acted with him, of acting a double part, he repelled the insinuation as calumnious. Sincerer friends to the interests of internal improvements were nowhere to be found.

The debate was further continued by Mr. ISACKS, who advocated the reconsideration, apologized for not having more fully explained the facts to which this bill related when it was yesterday before the committee, and pledged himself to satisfy the House of its importance and utility.

Mr. VINTON commenced a statement in explanation of the remark he had made yesterday, the purport of which was to show that he had proposed nothing in the House in relation to this bill, which he had not previously proposed in the Committee on the Public Lands: but the Speaker pronounced any reference to the proceedings in committee, not to be in order.

Mr. V. then disavowed any purpose of hostility to the bill, in the amendment which he had offered, and referred to the fact, that the amendment had been sustained by the very gentlemen who now seem to think that it made the bill "blue in the face."

Mr. MERZER now delivered a speech of some extent, which went to show that there was no necessary collision between the two bills. He attributed the fate of the second bill to the effect of a statement made yesterday by his colleague, (Mr. BASSETT,) founded, as he understood, upon a calculation of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MITCHELL,) that the first bill granted in effect not less than 1,400,000 acres of land to the State of Ohio.

Mr. M. then went into a calculation to show that this was a very great mistake indeed, and that the bill granted, in reality, less than 800,000. The canal would cost the State of Ohio 800,000 dollars, and the grant was therefore a good bargain. In relation to the second bill, he had voted with much less information, but had been led to support it chiefly from the consideration, that, out of the forty million acres in the State of Ohio, the United States owned eight millions, which was one-fifth of the whole State. The General Government had, therefore, a large interest in whatever promoted the value of the land in that part of the country.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, now moved the previous question, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. BRECHER, who went at large into an explanation of the circumstances and prospects of the State of Ohio, in relation to the Scioto Canal. He described, very minutely, the course of that canal, enumerating the various tracts of land through which it passed, and drew from this statement an argument to show that the United States, as a landholder, had a great and manifest interest in promoting the success of that canal. He disclaimed all personal and party feelings in the course he pursued, enlarged upon the benefits that would result from this line of communication, expressed his confident hope that it would be successfully completed, and hoped that the bill would pass, as its operations would give a quietus to a few noisy demagogues, who were opposing the design with a view to their own aggrandizement.

Mr. MOORE again moved the previous question, and the motion was sustained by the House—ayes 80, noes 64, and carried.

The main question recurring on the reconsideration of the vote which refused to order the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, the House resolved to reconsider—yeas 104, nays 69.

Assault on the President's Secretary.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WARD now moved to re-commit the bill with instructions.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved the previous question. It was sustained—yeas 102, nays 78.

The main question being then put on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was decided in the negative, by yeas 86, nays 87.

So the bill was again rejected.

Alabama Land Bill.

The bill granting land to Alabama, to aid in a canal round the Muscle Shoals, having been reported by the Committee of the Whole, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, went into an extended explanation of the geographical situation of the country, both above and below the Muscle Shoals, stated the advantages that would be derived from the contemplated improvement, and warmly advocated the passage of the bill, whether considered in reference to the military, commercial or political effects that would result from it.

The bill was also advocated by Messrs. McDUFFIE, ISAACS, and MOORE of Alabama, and ordered to its third reading, by yeas 94, nays 61.

An engrossed bill to abolish the Agency of the United States on the coast of Africa, and to provide other means for carrying into effect the laws prohibiting the slave trade, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and the title having been amended, was passed.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton.

The SPEAKER informed the House that, in execution of the order of yesterday, he had addressed the following letter to CHARLES CARROLL of Carrollton:

WASHINGTON, May 22d, 1828.

Sir: I have the honor to communicate to you, by direction of the House of Representatives, the enclosed joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, extending to you, as the only surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, the privilege of franking. You will be pleased, sir, to receive it as a token of the distinguished respect and veneration which Congress entertain towards an early and devoted friend to liberty, and one who stood pre-eminently forward, in the purest and noblest band of patriots that the world has ever seen.

I cannot resist the gratification which this opportunity affords, of publicly testifying the strong sentiments of esteem and veneration which, individually, I entertain for your character and services, and expressing an earnest hope, that the evening of your long life may be as peaceful and happy as it has been active and useful.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

A. STEVENSON,
Speaker of the House of Reps. of the U. S.

To CHARLES CARROLL of Carrollton, Esq., Maryland
Vol. X.—18

Assault on the President's Secretary.

Mr. McDUFFIE gave notice that he would, to-morrow, move the consideration of the resolution reported by him from the Select Committee on the subject of an assault committed by Russel Jarvis on the person of the President's private Secretary.

Mr. GORHAM gave notice that he should move, by way of amendment to that report, the following:

Resolved, That Russel Jarvis, having been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this House, the Speaker do forthwith issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-arms, to take said Jarvis into custody, and bring him to the bar of the House, and that said Jarvis be there reprimanded by the Speaker for said offence, and be then discharged.

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to withhold from said Jarvis, during this and the next session of Congress, the courtesy usually extended to Editors of Newspapers, of an admission to the floor of this House.

Mr. GORHAM asked that this paper might be printed.

Mr. P. P. BAEBOUR wished to know whether it was the understanding that this subject should be discussed during the present session? Because, if so, he should press to have it taken up to-day, being under the most urgent necessity of leaving the city to-morrow.

Mr. OLARK, of N. Y., said, that he had considered this as a small matter, and as being got up only for political purposes; he repeated, that it was a small affair from first to last—that it had evidently been got up for political effect—to produce a certain effect upon the people, and therefore—

[Here Mr. OLARK was called to order by Mr. BRENT on the ground that it was not in order now to discuss the subject, or thus to speak of the motives and intentions of a Committee of the House.]

The SPEAKER said he had not understood the gentleman as meaning to reflect upon the committee.

Mr. CAMBERLENG inquired whether, after the hour of morning business had expired, any resolution or report could be received unless by consent of the House?

The SPEAKER replied, that the gentleman from Massachusetts had expressly asked the permission of the House to have the paper printed. This could only be done by consent, and it was for the House to determine whether they would consent to the request or not.

Mr. CAMBERLENG farther supported his objection, and insisted that the paper could not be received.

Mr. OLARK again rose, and inquired whether, as this paper appeared to have for its object no public good, but merely to produce political excitement—

[Here Mr. OLARK was called to order by Mr. VINTON. The gentleman was imputing motives of an improper kind to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. GORHAM).]

The SPEAKER said it was certainly out of order to do so; but he had understood the gentleman from New York as applying his remarks only to what would be the effect of this paper.

Mr. CLARK said he had not imputed any improper motives to the member from Massachusetts, or to the committee, but had spoken only of what he thought would be the probable effect of printing this report, and inquired whether the House ought to lend its aid in producing any such effect. They had, already, upon the table, two able reports from the majority and minority of the Select Committee, which reports differed essentially on principle.

The SPEAKER here reminded Mr. CLARK, that it was not in order to discuss reports, which were not now before the House, they having been ordered to be printed, and not yet having been laid upon the tables of members.

Mr. COULTER said, that though he doubted the propriety of receiving such a paper as that just read, in that stage of the business in which it had been presented, yet, this having been presented (as it seemed to be understood) by the tacit consent of the House, and the paper having been received, he hoped that it would be printed, and that all opposition to the printing of it would be withdrawn; for, he would ask, if the House should refuse to order the printing of this paper, what favorable effect would ensue to the cause of those gentlemen who opposed the printing? The refusal to print it would not conceal the matter from the country, as it would immediately go into the public prints; nor would it prevent the presentation of it at the proper time. He repeated his hope, that the paper having been received, it would be allowed to be printed.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here interrupted Mr. COULTER, to observe, that the paper had not yet been received, and he hoped it would not be.]

The SPEAKER said, that the gentleman from Massachusetts having obtained the floor by consent of the House, had asked that the paper should be received and printed, but this was at the discretion of the House.

Mr. COULTER replied, that, in that aspect of the subject, he should have no greater objection to receive this paper, than he should to the receiving of any other paper in the like circumstances; but he still thought that this was not a proper stage of the business for the House to receive it at all.

The question was divided accordingly, and recurring first on the receiving of the paper offered by Mr. GORHAM,

The SPEAKER explained that it had been the practice of the House to permit such requests to be made, and frequently to comply with them, by ordering the papers to be printed in anticipation, before the subject to which it related was actually before the House.

Mr. COULTER said, that he had before objected to the receiving of this paper, not on account of its particular tenor, but upon general principles. He hoped it would come before the House in the proper time, and that the subject would be decided upon with calmness and deliberation. He should be as willing that this paper should be printed as any other, presented under like circumstances; and, as it appeared, from the statement of the Chair, that other papers have been, in like manner, allowed to be printed, he saw no reason why this should not take the same course. On the subject to which it related, he had indeed a most decided opinion. He was as hostile to the purport of the paper itself, as any one possibly could be; but he hoped, nevertheless, that it would be received and printed.

Mr. GORHAM said he had been surprised at the objection urged by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLARK,) and at the avowed grounds of it. He had himself been in the minority of the Select Committee who had reported on this matter, which minority had reported on principles adverse to those avowed by the majority, and had concluded their report by an expression of their opinion that some punishment ought to be inflicted by the House, for the breach of its privileges. Yet now, when that minority wished to carry out the principles they had avowed in their report, by proposing a punishment as light as possible, that gentleman had had the hardihood to rise in his place and openly charge them with improper motives.

The SPEAKER here interposed, and said that he had not understood the gentleman from New York as intending to impugn the motives of the committee, or any member of it, but as merely stating the effect which he apprehended would follow from receiving and printing this paper.

Mr. GORHAM replied, that the gentleman had certainly said it was got up with a view to political effect; but such was not the fact. He had introduced it to the House, with the express purpose of showing the views of a portion of that committee, as to the course which ought to be pursued in this case. It was the only mode left to them of giving publicity to these views; because, being in a minority, they appeared to assent to what was done by a majority of the committee. But, Mr. G. said, he could never consent to have an impression go abroad, that he assented to the doctrines in the report. As to what should finally be done, he was entirely indifferent. It was not so much with a view to the action of the House, that he wished to present this amendment, as for the purpose of letting the sentiments of a portion of that committee be publicly known, and, as the chairman of the committee had given notice that he should call up the subject to-morrow, Mr. G. felt bound also to give notice, that, in that case, he should offer the proposed amendment.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR had no manner of objection to the printing of this paper, other than that which grew out of the peculiar personal situation which he had already stated to the House. The resolution which the gentleman had read, and which he intended to offer by way of amendment to the report of the committee, was one which had relation, not to fact, but merely to opinion: for, as to the facts of this case, there was no dispute. The majority and the minority of the committee agreed upon the facts, and differed only as to the principle involved. As, therefore, the paper gave no additional information to the House, as to facts, he saw no necessity of ordering it to be printed. It would, of course, find its way into the public prints, and would thus have all the publicity gentlemen could wish. In the meanwhile, he earnestly desired that the House, if it went into this subject at all, would take it up to-day; because, standing toward it in the relation he did, he felt as if he ought to be present when it was discussed; and yet it would put him to the most extreme degree of inconvenience to be obliged to remain in his seat another day. Mr. B. said he knew that the personal inconvenience of any individual formed but a slight reason for any determination of the House, yet, he could not but urge the consideration of this subject to-day. Should the printing of this paper be refused, he would move to postpone the orders of the day, with a view of going at once into the discussion of the report of the committee.

Mr. MEEBEE said his colleague had given what he considered as the strongest of reasons, why the printing of this paper should be ordered: for he had given notice, that, if it were not, he should move the postponement of all the business on the table of the House, for the purpose of going into a discussion of the principles involved in the report and counter report from the Select Committee. Now the House had but three juridical days remaining, and he could not believe, that the rule, which confined these days to the consideration of matters originating in one House, and to be acted on in the other, ever contemplated the spending of them in such a discussion as must necessarily grow out of that report. If it must be discussed, it would be best to reserve the subject until Monday, when this House could not, by the rules, act on any subject requiring the action of the other branch, and devote to-day and to-morrow to the consideration of Senate bills. As to the merits of the present question, he had never known an instance in which the minority of a committee had been refused the privilege of making known their views, in as open a manner as the majority; and he referred to the celebrated case of the Missouri question, as an instance in point. If this privilege were granted to one minority, he did not see how it could be withheld from another. But he declared his determination to vote against taking up the subject to-day.

Mr. HAMILTON said he was obliged to his friend from Virginia, for the suggestion which he had made, because he hoped that it would have some effect in tranquillizing an excitement, which he was sorry to witness. He was far from considering this subject as one of such vast importance as some gentlemen seemed to think. He thought the debate which had taken place, was something like a storm in a teapot. It had been the practice of the House—a very bad practice he thought—to receive the report of a minority of a committee, when they desired to present one, and to order it to be printed with that of the majority: but, in the present case, there seemed to be a sort of sub modo minority; the committee seemed to be moving in triangles. The House had one report from the majority of the committee, and another from the minority, and now it was presented with a new report, from what seemed to be a subdivision of that minority. He considered it a bad practice to receive the reports of minorities at all, but such had been the practice of the House on former occasions, and he saw no reason why it should be departed from in this particular instance. There seemed to him, on the contrary, to be a good reason why this whole subject should be postponed until Monday; and it was, that the members of the House had not had an opportunity of examining the reports of the committee: it had been ordered to be printed, but had not yet come from the office. He was, therefore, not informed upon the subject, and, therefore, not prepared to act upon it. He hoped, in the meanwhile, that the House would extend to the gentleman from Massachusetts the usual courtesy of allowing his amendment to be printed beforehand.

Mr. WEEMS said, that there appeared, in this case, to be a triune committee, a majority, a minority, and a sub-minority. As the House had received and printed reports from the majority and minority, he did not see why it should refuse to print the present paper, which he viewed in the light of a third report.

Mr. STERIGEE moved to lay the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the receiving of this paper, upon the table; decided by yeas 27, nays 145.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, opposed the reception of the paper offered by Mr. GORHAM, on the ground that no offence had been committed against the dignity of this House, nor any breach of privilege. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) had very properly reprobated the practice of receiving reports and protests from the minorities of committees; and would he now advocate extending this practice, by printing and receiving this report?

The SPEAKER said it was not a report from any committee, but merely a paper, which a member of the House asked leave to have printed; and it had been the practice of the House, on many occasions, to comply with requests of a similar kind.

Mr. CLARK said, it was, in substance, a report. The House had received one report from the majority of that committee, and another from the minority; now they were asked to receive a third report. He believed the case was without a parallel, unless it was to be received under the pretext of being an amendment. It was, to be sure, in parliamentary strictness, an amendment; but it was, in substance, a report. He was confident the gentleman from South Carolina must, on reflection, perceive that this would be extending a practice, which he professed to disapprove. Mr. C. disclaimed any reference to the personal motives of gentlemen, and insisted that he had spoken only of what would be the effect of the paper. He had no wish to stifle it, nor would such be the effect of refusing to print it. It would still go to the community with that refusal of the House, and gentlemen were at liberty to make what they could of it. The ground on which he opposed the reception of the paper was, that this House had no jurisdiction in the case to which it referred.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, now demanded the previous question, and the call was sustained and carried.

Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, now demanded that the main question should be divided, and put, first, on receiving the paper, and then upon printing it.

It was divided accordingly; and the question recurring on receiving the paper offered by Mr. GORHAM, it was decided as follows: yeas 122, nays 47.

The paper was then ordered to be printed.

SATURDAY, May 24.

The Retrenchment Report.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Retrenchment, laid on the table of the House a mass of documents, which had accumulated in the course of the investigations by that committee.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that, in reporting the papers and documents from the Committee on Retrenchment, to be placed on the files of the House, on which their recent report was grounded, he was directed by that committee to say, that, from the want of time, they had not been able, with sufficient consideration, to prepare and mature the bills and resolutions necessary to carry their several recommendations into effect, even if the House could have considered them: but as they had acted with perfect good faith to the House on the subject confided to them, and under an honest conviction that the reforms they had proposed were essential to a wise economy and strict accountability in the public expenditures, the majority of that committee had determined, on an early day of the next session, to move a recommitment of the report, with a view of reorganizing the committee, and reporting the bills, after full deliberation on their several provisions. And to this the House might consider such of the majority as pledged, who might be destined to return at the next session.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, in the report from the minority of that committee certain matters were stated as facts, which were not facts. That report had never been submitted to the committee; and he could not but say that he considered it as having been introduced into the House in an unparliamentary manner. Mr. C. here quoted from the report the following passages:

"In conclusion, the minority of the committee would remark, that, from the manner in which the report of the majority was prepared, it has been impossible for the minority to examine its contents and present their observations upon them, as fully as they could have wished, or as the importance of many of the topics would require. The different subjects of investigation were, at an early period, referred to sub-committees, of each of which, one of the minority was a member. Towards the close of their labors, sketches of their reports (generally brief) were exhibited by the chairman of the sub-committees, to the individual forming the minority. In most cases, these sketches were in the hands of that individual but a few days, and in one case, at least, but a few hours. These sketches being then returned to the chairman of the committee, were, by him, made the basis of a general report, in which, however, new matters were introduced, of which the minority, having no previous notice of them, will be found to have prepared no explanation. It has, of course, been impossible for them to explain what they did not know to have been objected to. This is now mentioned, not as matter of complaint, but as matter of fact, relative to the mode in which the minority of the committee have discharged their duty."

Now, sir, said Mr. C., I rose merely to say, as one of the members who was appointed to prepare one of these sub-reports, (here called "sketches,") that they were in the possession of the gentlemen for a considerable time before they were adopted in committee. The greater part of the matter they contained, was, indeed, submitted to them ten days before the committee reported. If, afterwards, any thing was added, it was not such, either in quantity or importance, as would warrant the assertion contained in the minority's report. My own sub-report was certainly presented to one, at least, of the minority in time for it to be examined; and I am bound to say, on behalf of the committee, that the minority were, throughout the whole investigation, indulged in every form in which it was possible; they had all the opportunity that could reasonably be desired to examine the report before it was brought into the House. At last, when that report was finally prepared, and submitted to the committee, I moved that it should, on the same day, be reported to the House, which I was induced to do, from the lateness of the session, and with a desire that it might come into the House in time to be acted upon.

Mr. SERGEANT said, that, as one of the minority of that committee, he must take the liberty of saying that they did not consider the member from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) as having any authority to declare to them what it was right for them to say in their report, and what it was not. He did not know on what ground that member held the right to tell other members how to do their duty. Every gentleman must, on that point, judge and act for himself, and do his duty with such ability as he might possess, be it greater or less. But, in reply to the gentleman he would say, that the statement which the gentleman had quoted from the report of the minority, had not been made with any unkind intention toward the majority of the committee, and he begged to say, generally, that the minority had made no complaint of the conduct of the committee, nor did they feel that they had any cause to do so. If they had, they would have stated it, and made the complaint. All who were present during the whole of the time when the committee held its last meeting, (the gentleman from New York had been present only part of the time,) must know what the course of the minority had been. The papers from the other members, which the gentleman calls sub-reports, were put into the hands of the chairman, at a very late period, and he had been obliged to work very hard to digest them into a report in the time he did so. All the members of the committee gave him credit for his industry, and for the motive which prompted it, viz., a desire to get the report into the House in time to have it acted upon with due deliberation. He did intend, as all the committee knew, to have presented it sooner, but found that to be impracticable. When the report was brought into the committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) moved that it should be reported to the House on that day. A member of the committee, from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) moved to defer its presentation till the day following, on the ground that the minority had not an opportunity of preparing a reply to any new matter it might contain; but his motion was overruled. The minority, thus situated, felt it incumbent on them to state the fact, as an excuse for omitting (if they should have omitted) to reply to all the matters in the report of the majority. The two portions of the committee differed in their views, from the beginning to the end of their proceedings, but all in good humor, and with mutual respect. The minority never meant to say, or insinuate, that they had any complaint against the rest of the committee: for, he repeated, that, if they had so felt, they would have made the complaint—as he would now do, if he thought he had any cause, which he did not.

SIX O'CLOCK, P. M.

Thanks to the Speaker.

Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, moved the following resolution.

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable ANDREW STEVENSON, Speaker, for the dignity, impartiality, promptitude, and ability, with which he has discharged the duties of the Chair, during the present session.

The SPEAKER now retired, and called Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, to the chair.

Mr. ARMSTRONG rose, and was prefacing a motion to lay the resolution upon the table with some remarks, disclaiming all personal want of respect toward the Speaker, when he was called to order by Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Mr. ARMSTRONG made his motion, and was again proceeding with some remarks, when he was pronounced to be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN now reminded Mr. ARMSTRONG that he might insist on his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. A. being then out of his seat, did not respond to the Chair; and the vote was about to be taken; when

Mr. ARMSTRONG rose, and commenced some prefatory remarks of the same general tenor as before.

He was again called to order by Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Many members now rose at once to address the Chair, but Mr. VINTON succeeded in obtaining the floor, contended that the former motion of Mr. ARMSTRONG, not having been withdrawn, was still in course before the House and did not need to be formally renewed.

The CHAIRMAN now explained; recapitulated the several stages of the debate, and decided that it would be in order for Mr. ARMSTRONG to renew his motion. He having renewed it, accordingly, Mr. WILDE demanded the yeas and nays, which, being taken, stood—yeas 51, nays 101.

The main question was taken, by yeas 111, nays 28.

So the resolution of thanks to the Speaker was adopted.

Ohio Canals.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill to aid the State of Ohio in extending the Miami Canal from Dayton to Lake Erie.

The amendments consist of two parts. The first is to grant to the State of Ohio 500,000 acres of land to aid in making the Scioto, or Grand Canal, in that State, in addition to the land granted by the bill itself, and is the same in substance as the bill rejected by the House some days ago.* The second part of the amend-

* And thus the State of Ohio received two grants of land in one day, and in one bill, (and one of them after it had been twice rejected in the House of Representatives,) to aid in making canals within the State—a most unusual degree of liberality, of which there had been no example, and has been no imitation. Was it the result of fair legislation? or was it the effect of contrivance for an unseen purpose? of which repeated innuendoes, and frequent palpable hints, gave broad intimation—always repressed by rules of order. What was said, was sufficient to show that “a most extraordinary accident” (in the language of one of the speakers) had happened! without showing what, and how; and as an elucidation of the enigma may throw a light—an instructive one—on the business of legislation in high party times, it may be profitable here to solve it. The author of this abridgment is ments to the bill provides for the confirmation of land claims in Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. MCCOY opposed the amendments; and they were warmly advocated by Mr. KREMER, and at considerable length by Mr. FINDLAY, who gave a full statement of the origin, state, and value, of the present canals in Ohio, and explained the necessity for the aid of the Government in completing them.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, said it was not his object to consume the time of the House in debate at this late hour, however much he might be disposed to object to the provisions of that part of the amendment just read, if they stood alone; yet, as the objections rested on matters of expediency only, not affecting principle, as they were connected with a subject of deep interest to the State he, in part, represented, his object was merely to express a hope that the entire amendment of the Senate would be agreed to, rather than to jeopard the bill, by returning it again to the Senate.

MONDAY, May 26.

National Paintings.

Mr. EVERETT submitted the following resolution:

able to do so. He was contemporary with the event, and a close observer of it, and even an actor in it, so far as assisting in the other branch of Congress, (the Senate,) in an attempt to "correct the procedure." He will give the solution—thus: The presidential election depending, and the friends of the two candidates, (General Jackson and Mr. Adams,) both anxious to gain the vote of Ohio for its favorite, conceived the same idea about the same time; namely, that a liberal grant of land to the State would be a help to the candidate whose supporters obtained it. So both parties (members of Ohio, of course) moved in the business, each bringing in a separate bill, and each for the full amount of land expected. But the friends of Jackson were a little the quickest, and got in their bill first, and secured it the first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, where it was agreed to; and then, being ahead and sanctioned in the committee, its passage was considered to be a matter of course when reported to the House. But here, that "most extraordinary accident" happened. The bill which had been before, got behind. The one below it on the calendar got above it in the file; and being taken up first, was passed before the "accident" was discovered. This was fatal to the other bill—"death and destruction to it"—as one of its friends declared, it being impossible to expect two bills, for two grants of land to one State, to pass at the same time. And so was the event. The bill of the Jackson party, coming on after the other had passed, was rejected! and remained so—a reconsideration being refused. Then the friends of the lost bill ran up to the Senate, told what had happened, and appealed to their friends there to checkmate the move by getting the lost bill added to the other, as an amendment, when it came up for concurrence. This was done, and the same bill being agreed to in the House as an amendment, which had been rejected there as a bill, the State of Ohio received the two grants, when neither party hoped for more than one in the beginning. Such was, and may be, national legislation in high party times! great public measures ostensibly debated as meritorious, and sinistrously passed or rejected upon a party calculation.

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings be, and he is hereby authorized to cause the proper measures to be taken to secure the paintings in the Rotundo from the effects of dampness, under the direction of John Trumbull, and to allow the said John Trumbull a reasonable compensation for the same.

Mr. HAYNES moved to amend the resolution by striking out that part of it which directed this work to be performed under the superintendence of Mr. Trumbull.

After some conversation between Messrs. EVERETT, HAYNES, WICKES, and S. WOOD, on the propriety of employing an experienced artist in this operation, the amendment was rejected. Ayes 52, noes 58.

The resolution was then adopted.

Retrenchment.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. WICKLIFFE, on the 23d instant, from the Committee on Retrenchment, directing an examination of the printing accounts of Gales and Seaton, with a view to the correction of errors in the same.

A motion was made by Mr. HAMILTON to amend the first resolution, by inserting, at the end of the same, these words: "And that he (the Clerk) report the same to this House at the next session of Congress." And further, by striking out the second resolution altogether.

Mr. BARTLETT inquired the reason for requiring an account of only a particular part of the printing executed by Gales and Seaton? Why was not the account to embrace the whole?

Mr. HAMILTON replied that the part designated was all of which the Committee on Retrenchment had to complain.

Mr. BARTLETT, after a few prefatory remarks, moved to strike out so much of the resolution as goes to classify the printing and to require the account only of a particular branch of it, so as to make the resolution embrace the whole.

Close of the Session.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate had passed a resolution for the appointment of a Joint Committee, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that Congress were about to adjourn, unless he had further communications to make.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio,

The House concurred in the resolution of the Senate, and Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, and Mr. DICKINSON were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, from the Joint Committee appointed for the purpose, reported that the committee waited on the President of the United States, and informed him that the two Houses were about to close the present Session, by adjournment, unless he had further communication to make to Congress; and that the committee received for answer, that he had no further communications to make.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House, nearly in the following words:

"GENTLEMEN: I avail myself of the moment of separation, to express my deep sense of gratitude and obligation to those who have kindly borne such distinguished testimony to my official conduct as the presiding officer of this House; and I should be unworthy of it, if I did not frankly acknowledge that I feel both gratified and flattered at the manner and circumstances under which it has been done. Next to the consciousness of an upright discharge of my official duties, and the confidence of my country, is the esteem and approbation of this House; and I hope I may be permitted to say, without vanity, that I have endeavored to merit it, by unwearied zeal and assiduity, and a devotion of my time and talents to its service. This station, high and exalted as it is, has, at no time, been without its embarrassments and trials. Throughout this long and protracted session, it has been one continued scene of severe responsibility and unexampled labor. Aware of the difficulty, perhaps of the temerity, of attempting to please every one, I determined to pursue, fearlessly, what I believed to be the path of duty, regardless of consequences.

"I came to this Chair to gratify no private friendships, to indulge no personal or political antipathies; and I feel proudly conscious, that its arduous duties have been discharged with a single eye to the interests of the nation, the character and dignity of the House, and my own honor. Your kind and flattering vote of approbation assures me, that my efforts have not been wholly unavailing; and candor requires me to say that, amidst all the difficulties and embarrassments of the Chair, it has experienced in an unexampled manner, your kindness, confidence, and support. If, gentlemen, in the course of this long and laborious session, the peace and harmony of our deliberations have been threatened, and our councils divided, under the influence of momentary excitements of passion or party, I trust they have now, happily, passed away, and that we shall separate in the spirit of peace and good will. Here, or elsewhere, it is to be hoped, that all have but one object at heart—the good of our common country. Let me admonish you, gentlemen, that that country now stands as a mighty land and sea mark in the map of the world. It is a beacon on the margin of the main, which serves as an example to other nations, whilst it denotes the proud pre-eminence of our own. Its future destinies, and the blessings we enjoy, must vitally depend on the character and deliberations of this House. The surest means of preserving these blessings and our union unimpaired, is in a sacred and inviolate regard to the charter of our liberties, and a system of legislation founded on the principles of an honest policy, and dictated by the spirit of an enlightened and diffusive patriotism. Let us do nothing, then, which shall shake these solid foundations of our union and liberty, or impair the confidence of the people in our free institutions; but let our proceedings be marked by mutual forbearance, moderation, and wisdom. You will carry with you, in your retirement, gentlemen, my best wishes for your health and happiness; and I ardently pray to Almighty God, that, when we again assemble, we may find our country flourishing, united, and happy.

"In performing the last act of duty, by declaring this House adjourned to the first Monday in December, I bid you all an affectionate farewell."

TWENTIETH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE

MONDAY, December 1, 1828.

At 12 o'clock M. the honorable SAMUEL SMITH, President of the Senate pro tempore, took the chair.

Thirty-two members appeared, and answered to their names.

The usual messages were interchanged between the two Houses relative to the formation of a quorum, &c., and a committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States.

TUESDAY, December 2.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, from the committee appointed yesterday to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, &c., reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President would make a communication to the two Houses to-day at 12 o'clock.

A Message was shortly afterwards received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, his Secretary, which was as follows:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

If the enjoyment in profusion of the bounties of Providence forms a suitable subject of mutual gratulation and grateful acknowledgment, we are admonished, at this return of the season when the Representatives of the nation are assembled to deliberate upon their concerns, to offer up the tribute of fervent and grateful hearts for the never-failing mercies of Him who ruleth over all. He has again favored us with healthful seasons and abundant harvests. He has sustained us in peace with foreign countries, and in tranquillity within our borders. He has preserved us in the quiet and undisturbed possession of civil and religious liberty. He has crowned the year with His goodness, imposing on us no other conditions than of improving, for our own happiness, the blessings bestowed by His hands, and, in the fruition of all His favors, of devoting the faculties with which we have been endowed by Him to His glory, and to our own temporal and eternal welfare.

In the relations of our Federal Union with our brethren of the human race, the changes which have occurred since the close of your last session have generally tended to the preservation of peace and to the cultivation of harmony. Before your last separation a war had unhappily been kindled between the Empire of Russia, one of those with which our intercourse has been no other than a constant exchange of good offices, and that of the Ottoman Porte, a nation from which geographical distance, religious opinions, and maxims of government, on their part, little suited to the formation of those bonds of mutual benevolence which result from the benefits of commerce, had kept us in a state, perhaps too much prolonged, of coldness and alienation. The extensive, fertile, and populous dominions of the Sultan belong rather to the Asiatic than the European division of the human family. They enter but partially into the system of Europe; nor have their wars with Russia and Austria, the European States upon which they border, for more than a century past disturbed the pacific relations of those States with the other great powers of Europe. Neither France, nor Prussia, nor Great Britain, has ever taken part in them; nor is it to be expected that they will at this time. The declaration of war by Russia has received the approbation or acquiescence of her allies, and we may indulge the hope that its progress and termination will be signalized by the moderation and forbearance, no less than by the energy of the Emperor Nicholas, and that it will afford the opportunity for such collateral agency in behalf of the suffering Greeks as will secure to them ultimately the triumph of humanity and of freedom.

The state of our particular relations with France has scarcely varied in the course of the present year. The commercial intercourse between the two countries has continued to increase for the mutual benefit of both. The claims of indemnity to numbers of our fellow-citizens for depredations upon their property heretofore committed, during the Revolutionary Governments, still remain unadjusted, and still form the subject of earnest representation and remonstrance. Recent advices from the Minister of the United States at Paris encourage the expectation that the appeal to the justice of the French Government will ere long receive a favorable consideration.

The last friendly expedient has been resorted to for the decision of the controversy with Great Brit-sin, relating to the Northeastern boundary of the United States. By an agreement with the British Government, carrying into effect the provisions of the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent, and the convention of 29th September, 1827, His Majesty the King of the Netherlands has, by common consent, been selected as the umpire between the parties. The proposal to him to accept the designation for the performance of this friendly office will be made at an early day, and the United States, relying upon the justice of their cause, will cheerfully commit the arbitrament of it to a Prince equally distinguished for the independence of his spirit, his indefatigable assiduity to the duties of his station, and his inflexible personal probity.

Our commercial relations with Great Britain will deserve the serious consideration of Congress, and the exercise of a conciliatory and forbearing spirit in the policy of both Governments. The state of them has been materially changed by the act of Congress passed at their last session, in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports, and by acts of more recent date of the British Parliament. The effect of the interdiction of direct trade, commenced by Great Britain and reciprocated by the United States, has been, as was to be foreseen, only to substitute different channels for an exchange of commodities indispensable to the colonies and profitable to a numerous class of our fellow-citizens. The exports, the revenue, the navigation, of the United States, have suffered no diminution by our exclusion from direct access to the British colonies. The colonies pay more dearly for the necessaries of life, which their government burdens with the charges of double voyages, freight, insurance, and commission, and the profits of our exports are somewhat impaired, and more injuriously transferred from one portion of our citizens to another. The resumption of this old and otherwise exploded system of colonial exclusion has not secured to the shipping interest of Great Britain the relief which, at the expense of the distant colonies and of the United States, it was expected to afford. Other measures have been resorted to more pointedly bearing upon the navigation of the United States, and which, unless modified by the construction given to the recent acts of Parliament, will be manifestly incompatible with the positive stipulations of the commercial convention existing between the two countries. That convention, however, may be terminated, with twelve months' notice, at the option of either party.

A treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce between the United States and His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, has been prepared for signature by the Secretary of State, and by the Baron de Lederer, instructed with full powers of the Austrian Government. Independently of the new and friendly relations which may be thus commenced with one of the most eminent and powerful nations of the earth, the occasion has been taken in it, as in other recent treaties concluded by the United States, to extend those principles of liberal intercourse and of fair reciprocity which intertwine with the exchange of commerce, the principles of justice, and the feelings of mutual benevolence. This system, first proclaimed to the world in the first commercial treaty ever concluded by the United States, that of 6th February, 1778, with France, has been invariably the cherished policy of our Union. It is by treaties of commerce alone that it can be made ultimately to prevail as the established system of all civilized nations. With this principle our fathers extended the hand of friendship to every nation of the globe, and to this policy our country has ever since adhered; whatever of regulation in our laws has ever been adopted unfavorable to the interest of any foreign nation, has been essentially defensive and counteracting to similar regulations of theirs operating against us.

Immediately after the close of the war of independence, commissioners were appointed by the Congress of the Confederation, authorized to conclude treaties with every nation of Europe disposed to adopt them. Before the wars of the French Revolution, such treaties had been consummated with the United Netherlands, Sweden, and Prussia. During those wars treaties with Great Britain and Spain had been effected, and those with Russia and France renewed. In all these, some concessions to the liberal principles of intercourse proposed by the United States had been obtained; but as, in all the negotiations, they came occasionally in collision with previous internal regulations, or exclusive and excluding compacts of monopoly, with which the other parties had been trammelled, the advances made in them towards the freedom of trade were partial and imperfect. Colonial establishments, chartered companies, and shipbuilding influence pervaded and encumbered the legislation of all the great commercial States; and the United States, in offering free trade and equal privilege to all, were compelled to acquiesce in many exceptions with each of the parties to their treaties, accommodated to their existing laws and anterior engagements.

The colonial system by which this whole hemisphere was bound has fallen into ruins; totally abolished by revolutions, converting colonies into independent nations throughout the two American continents, excepting a portion of territory chiefly at the northern extremity of our own, and confined to the remnants of dominion retained by Great Britain over the insular Archipelago, geographically the appendages of our part of the globe. With all the rest we have free trade, even with the insular colonies of all the European nations, except Great Britain. Her Government also had manifested approaches to the adoption of a free and liberal intercourse between her colonies and other nations, though, by a sudden and scarcely explained revulsion, the spirit of exclusion has been revived for operation upon the United States alone.

The conclusion of our last treaty of peace with Great Britain was shortly afterwards followed by a commercial convention, placing the direct intercourse between the two countries upon a footing of more equal reciprocity than had ever before been admitted. The same principle has since been much farther extended, by treaties with France, Sweden, Denmark, the Hanseatic cities, Prussia in Europe, and with the Republics of Colombia and of Central America, in this hemisphere. The mutual abolition of discriminating duties and charges upon the navigation and commercial intercourse between the parties is the general maxim which characterizes them all. There is reason to expect that it will, at no distant period, be adopted by other nations, both of Europe and America, and to hope that, by its universal prevalence, one of the fruitful sources of wars of commercial competition, will be extinguished.

Among the nations upon whose governments many of our fellow-citizens have had long-pending claims of indemnity for depredations upon their property during a period when the rights of neutral commerce were disregarded, was that of Denmark. They were, soon after the events occurred, the subject of a special mission from the United States, at the close of which the assurance was given by His Danish Majesty that, at a period of more tranquillity, and of less distress, they would be considered, examined, and decided upon, in a spirit of determined purpose for the dispensation of justice. I have much pleasure in informing Congress that the fulfilment of this honorable promise is now in progress; that a small portion of the claims has already been settled, to the satisfaction of the claimants; and that we have reason to hope that the remainder will shortly be placed in a train of equitable adjustment. This result has always been confidently expected, from the character of personal integrity and of benevolence which the Sovereign of the Danish dominions has, through every vicissitude of fortune, maintained.

The general aspect of the affairs of our neighboring American nations of the South has been rather of approaching than of settled tranquillity. Internal disturbances have been more frequent among them than their common friends would have desired. Our intercourse with all has continued to be that of friendship, and of mutual good will. Treaties of commerce and of boundaries with the United Mexican States have been negotiated, but, from various successive obstacles, not yet brought to a final conclusion. The civil war which unfortunately still prevails in the Republic of Central America has been unpropitious to the cultivation of our commercial relations with them; and the dissensions and revolutionary changes in the Republics of Colombia and of Peru have been seen with cordial regret by us, who would gladly contribute to the happiness of both. It is with great satisfaction, however, that we have witnessed the recent conclusion of a peace between the Governments of Buenos Ayres and of Brazil; and it is equally gratifying to observe that indemnity has been obtained for some of the injuries which our fellow-citizens had sustained in the latter of those countries. The rest are in a train of negotiation, which we hope may terminate to mutual satisfaction, and that it may be succeeded by a treaty of commerce and navigation upon liberal principles, propitious to a great and growing commerce, already important to the interests of our country.

The condition and prospects of the revenue are more favorable than our most sanguine expectations had anticipated. The balance in the Treasury on the first of January last, exclusive of the moneys received under the convention of 13th November, 1826, with Great Britain, was five millions eight hundred and sixty-one thousand nine hundred and seventy-two dollars and eighty-three cents. The receipts into the Treasury from the first of January to the 30th of September last, so far as they have been ascertained, to form the basis of an estimate, amount to eighteen millions six hundred and thirty-three thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-seven cents, which, with the receipts of the present quarter, estimated at five millions four hundred and sixty-one thousand two hundred and eighty-three dollars and forty cents, form an aggregate of receipts during the year of twenty-four millions and ninety four thousand eight hundred and sixty-three dollars and sixty-seven cents. The expenditures of the year may probably amount to twenty-five millions six hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and eleven dollars and sixty-three cents; and leave in the Treasury, on the first of January next, the sum of five millions one hundred and twenty-five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fourteen cents.

The receipts of the present year have amounted to near two millions more than was anticipated at the commencement of the last session of Congress.

The amount of duties secured on importations from the 1st of January to the 30th of September was about twenty-two millions nine hundred and ninety-seven thousand, and that of the estimated accruing revenue is five millions, leaving an aggregate for the year of near twenty-eight millions. This is one million more than the estimate made last December for the accruing revenue of the present year, which, with allowances for drawbacks and contingent deficiencies, was expected to produce an actual revenue of twenty-two millions three hundred thousand dollars. Had these only been realized, the expenditures of the year would have been also proportionally reduced. For, of these twenty-four millions received, upwards of nine millions have been applied to the extinction of public debt bearing an interest of six per cent. a year, and, of course, reducing the burthen of interest annually payable in future by the amount of more than half a million. The payments on account of interest during the current year exceed three millions of dollars,* presenting an aggregate of more than twelve millions applied during the year to the discharge of the public debt, the whole of which remaining due on the 1st of January next will amount only to fifty-eight millions three hundred and sixty-two thousand one hundred and thirty-five dollars and seventy-eight cents.

That the revenue of the ensuing year will not fall short of that received in the one now expiring there are indications which can scarcely prove deceptive. In our country a uniform experience of forty years has shown that, whatever the tariff of duties, upon articles imported from abroad, has been, the amount of importations has always borne an average value nearly approaching to that of the exports, though occasionally differing in the balance, sometimes being more, and sometimes less. It is, indeed, a general law of prosperous commerce that the real value of exports should, by a small, and only a small balance, exceed that of imports, that balance being a permanent addition to the wealth of the nation. The extent of the prosperous commerce of the nation must be regulated by the amount of its exports, and an important addition to the value of these will draw after it a corresponding increase of importations. It has happened, in the vicissitudes of the seasons, that the harvests of all Europe have, in the late summer and autumn, fallen short of their usual average. A relaxation of the interdict upon the importation of grain and flour from abroad, has ensued; a propitious market has been opened to the granaries of our country, and a new prospect of reward presented to the labors of the husbandman, which for several years has been denied. This accession to the profits of agriculture in the middle and western portions of our Union is accidental and temporary. It may continue for a single year. It may be, as has been often experienced in the revolutions of time, but the first of several scanty harvests in succession. We may consider it certain that, for the approaching year, it has added an item of large amount to the value of our exports, and that it will produce a corresponding increase of importations. It may therefore confidently be foreseen that the revenue of 1839 will equal, and probably exceed, that of 1838, and will afford the means of extinguishing ten millions more of the principal of the public debt.

This new element of prosperity to that part of our agricultural industry which is occupied in producing the first article of human subsistence, is of the most cheering character to the feelings of patriotism. Proceeding from a cause which humanity will view with concern, the sufferings of scarcity in distant lands, it yields a consolatory reflection that this scarcity is in no respect attributable to us; that it comes from the dispensation of Him who ordains all in wisdom and goodness, and who permits evil itself only as an instrument of good; that, far from contributing to this scarcity, our agency will be applied only to the alleviation of its severity; and that, in pouring forth from the abundance of our own garners the supplies which will partially restore plenty to those who are in need, we shall ourselves reduce our stores and add to the price of our own bread, so as, in some degree, to participate in the wants which it will be the good fortune of our country to relieve.

The great interests of an agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing nation are so linked in union together that no permanent cause of prosperity to one of them can operate without extending its influence to the others. All these interests are alike under the protecting power of the Legislative authority, and the duties of the representative bodies are to conciliate them in harmony together. So far as the object of taxation is to raise a revenue for discharging the debts and defraying the expenses of the community, it should, as much as possible, suit the burthen with equal hand upon all, in proportion to their ability of bearing it without oppression. But the legislation of one nation is sometimes intentionally made to bear heavily upon the interests of another. That legislation, adapted, as it is meant to be, to the special interests of its own people, will often press most unequally upon the several component interests of its neighbors. Thus, the legislation of Great Britain when, as has been recently avowed, adapted to the depression of a rival nation, will naturally abound with regulations of interdict upon the productions of the soil or industry of the other which come in competition with its own, and will present encouragement, perhaps even bounty, to the raw material of the other State which it cannot produce itself, and which is essential for the use of its manufactures, competitors, in the markets of the world, with those of its commercial rival. Such is the state of the commercial legislation of Great Britain, as it bears upon our interests. It excludes, with interdicting duties, all importation (except in time of approaching famine) of the great staple productions of our Middle and Western States; it proscribes, with equal rigor, the bulkier lumber and live stock of the same portion, and also of the northern and eastern part of our Union. It refuses even the rice of the South, unless aggravated with a charge of duty upon the northern carrier who brings it to them. But the cotton, indispensable for their looms, they will receive almost duty free, weave it into a fabric for our own wear, to the destruction of our own manufactures, which they are thus enabled to undersell. Is the self-protecting energy of this nation so helpless that there exists, in the political institutions of our country, no power to counteract the bias of this foreign legislation? that the growers of grain must submit to this exclusion from the foreign markets of their produce? that the shippers must dismantle their ships, the trade of the North must stagnate at the wharves, and the manufacturers starve at their looms, while the whole people shall pay tribute to foreign industry to be clad in a foreign garb? that the Congress of the Union are impotent to restore the balance in favor of native industry destroyed by the statutes of another realm? More just and more generous sentiments will, I trust, prevail. If the tariff adopted at the last session of Congress shall be found, by experience, to bear oppressively upon the interests of any one section of the Union, it ought to be, and I cannot doubt will be, so modified as to alleviate its burthen. To the voice of just complaint from any portion of their constituents, the Representatives of the States and people will never turn away their ears. But so long as the duty of the foreign shall operate only as a bounty upon the domestic article; while the planter, and the merchant, and the shepherd, and the husbandman shall be found thriving in their occupations under the duties imposed for the protection of domestic manufactures, they will not repine at the prosperity shared with themselves by their fellow-citizens of other professions, nor denounce as violations of the constitution the deliberate acts of Congress to shield from the wrongs of foreign laws the native industry of the Union. While the tariff of the last session of Congress was a subject of legislative deliberation, it was foretold by some of its opposers that one of its necessary consequences would be to impair the revenue. It is yet too soon to pronounce with confidence that this prediction was erroneous. The obstruction of one avenue of trade not unfrequently opens an issue to another. The consequence of the tariff will be to increase the exportation, and to diminish the importation, of some specific articles. But, by the general law of trade, the increase of exportation of one article will be followed by an increased importation of others, the duties upon which will supply the deficiencies which the diminished importation would otherwise occasion. The effect of taxation upon revenue can seldom be foreseen with certainty. It must abide the test of experience. As yet, no symptoms of diminution are perceptible in the receipts of the treasury. As yet, little addition of cost has even been experienced upon the articles burthened with heavier duties by the last tariff. The domestic manufacturer supplies the same or a kindred article at a diminished price, and the consumer pays the same tribute to the labor of his own countrymen which he must otherwise have paid to foreign industry and toil.

The tariff of the last session was, in its details, not acceptable to the great interests of any portion of the Union, not even to the interest which it was specially intended to subserve. Its object was to balance the burthens upon native industry imposed by the operation of foreign laws; but not to aggravate the burthens of one section of the Union by the relief afforded to another. To the great principle sanctioned by that act, one of those upon which the constitution itself was formed, I hope and trust the authorities of the Union will adhere. But if any of the duties imposed by the act only relieve the manufacturer by aggravating the burthen of the planter, let a careful revival of its provisions, enlightened by the practical experience of its effects, be directed to retain those which impart protection to native industry, and remove or supply the place of those which only alleviate one great national interest by the depression of another.

The United States of America, and the people of every State of which they are composed, are each of them sovereign powers. The legislative authority of the whole is exercised by Congress, under authority granted them in the common constitution. The legislative power of each State is exercised by assemblies deriving their authority from the constitution of the State. Each is sovereign within its own province. The distribution of power between them presupposes that these authorities will move in harmony with each other. The members of the State and General Governments are all under oath to support both, and allegiance is due to the one and to the other. The case of a conflict between these two powers has not been supposed; nor has any provision been made for it in our institutions—as a virtuous nation of ancient times existed more than five centuries without a law for the punishment of parricide.

More than once, however, in the progress of our history, have the people and Legislatures of one or more States, in moments of excitement, been instigated to this conflict; and the means of effecting this impulse have been allegations that the acts of Congress to be resisted were unconstitutional. The people of no one State have ever delegated to their Legislature the power of pronouncing an act of Congress unconstitutional; but they have delegated to them powers, by the exercise of which the execution of the laws of Congress within the State may be resisted. If we suppose the case of such conflicting legislation sustained by the corresponding Executive and Judicial authorities, patriotism and philanthropy turn their eyes from the condition in which the parties would be placed, and from that of the people of both, which must be its victims.

The reports from the Secretary of War and from the various subordinate offices of the resort of that Department, present an exposition of the public administration of affairs connected with them, through the course of the current year. The present state of the army, and the distribution of the force of which it is composed, will be seen from the report of the Major General. Several alterations in the disposal of the troops have been found expedient in the course of the year, and the discipline of the army, though not entirely free from exception, has been generally good.

The attention of Congress is particularly invited to that part of the report of the Secretary of War which concerns the existing system of our relations with the Indian tribes. At the establishment of the Federal Government, under the present Constitution of the United States, the principle was adopted of considering them as foreign and independent powers; and also as proprietors of lands. They were, moreover, considered as savages, whom it was our policy and our duty to use our influence in converting to Christianity, and in bringing within the pale of civilization.

As independent powers, we negotiated with them by treaties; as proprietors, we purchased of them all the lands which we could prevail upon them to sell; as brethren of the human race, rude and ignorant, we endeavored to bring them to the knowledge of religion and of letters. The ultimate design was to incorporate in our own institutions that portion of them which could be converted to the state of civilization. In the practice of European States, before our Revolution, they had been considered as children to be governed; as tenants at discretion, to be dispossessed as occasion might require; as hunters, to be indemnified by trifling concessions for removal from the grounds upon which their game was extirpated. In changing the system, it would seem as if a full contemplation of the consequences of the change had not been taken. We have been far more successful in the acquisition of their lands than in imparting to them the principles, or inspiring them with the spirit, of civilization. But in appropriating to ourselves their hunting-grounds, we have brought upon ourselves the obligation of providing them with subsistence; and when we have had the rare good fortune of teaching them the arts of civilization, and the doctrines of Christianity, we have unexpectedly found them forming, in the midst of ourselves, communities claiming to be independent of ours, and rivals of sovereignty, within the territories of the members of our Union. This state of things requires that a remedy should be provided—a remedy which, while it shall do justice to those unfortunate children of nature, may secure to the members of our confederation their rights of sovereignty and of soil. As the outline of a project to that effect, the views presented in the report of the Secretary of War are recommended to the consideration of Congress.

The report from the Engineer Department presents a comprehensive view of the progress which has been made in the great systems promotive of the public interest, commenced and organized under the authority of Congress, and the effects of which have already contributed to the security, as they will hereafter largely contribute to the honor and dignity of the nation.

The first of these great systems is that of fortifications, commenced immediately after the close of our last war, under the salutary experience which the events of that war had impressed upon our countrymen of its necessity. Introduced under the auspices of my immediate predecessor, it has been continued with the persevering and liberal encouragement of the Legislature; and combined with corresponding exertions for the gradual increase and improvement of the navy, prepares for our extensive country a condition of defence, adapted to any critical emergency, which the varying course of events may bring forth. Our advances in these concerted systems have for the last ten years been steady and progressive, and in a few years more will be so completed, as to leave no cause for apprehension that our seacoast will ever again offer a theatre of hostile invasion.

The next of these cardinal measures of policy is the preliminary to great and lasting works of public improvement, in the surveys of roads, examination for the course of canals, and labors for the removal of the obstructions of rivers and harbors, first commenced by the act of Congress of 30th April, 1824.

December, 1828.]

The President's Message.

[SENATE.]

The report exhibits in one table the funds appropriated at the last and preceding sessions of Congress, for all these fortifications, surveys, and works of public improvement: the manner in which these funds have been applied, the amount expended upon the several works under construction, and the further sums which may be necessary to complete them. In a second, the works projected by the Board of Engineers, which have not been commenced, and the estimate of their cost.

In a third, the report of the annual Board of Visitors at the Military Academy at West Point. For thirteen fortifications erecting on various points of our Atlantic coast, from Rhode Island to Louisiana, the aggregate expenditure of the year has fallen a little short of one million of dollars.

For the preparation of five additional reports of reconnaissances and surveys since the last session of Congress; for the civil constructions upon thirty-seven different public works commenced; eight others for which specific appropriations have been made by acts of Congress, and twenty other incipient surveys under the authority given by the act of 30th April, 1824, about one million more of dollars have been drawn from the treasury.

To these two millions of dollars are to be added the appropriation of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to commence the erection of a breakwater near the mouth of the Delaware River; the subscriptions to the Delaware and Chesapeake, the Louisville and Portland, the Dismal Swamp, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; the large donations of lands to the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, for objects of improvements within those States, and the sums appropriated for light houses, buoys, and piers, on the coast; and a full view will be taken of the munificence of the nation in the application of its resources to the improvement of its own condition.

Of these great national undertakings, the Academy at West Point is among the most important in itself, and the most comprehensive in its consequences. In that institution, a part of the revenue of the nation is applied to defray the expense of educating a competent portion of her youth, chiefly to the knowledge and the duties of military life. It is the living armory of the nation. While the other works of improvement enumerated in the reports now presented to the attention of Congress, are destined to ameliorate the face of nature; to multiply the facilities of communication between the different parts of the Union; to assist the labors, increase the comforts, and enhance the enjoyments of individuals—the instruction acquired at West Point enlarges the dominion and expands the capacities of the mind. Its beneficial results are already experienced in the composition of the army, and their influence is felt in the intellectual progress of society. The institution is susceptible still of great improvement from benefactions proposed by several successive Boards of Visitors, to whose earnest and repeated recommendations I cheerfully add my own.

With the usual annual reports from the Secretary of the Navy and the Board of Commissioners, will be exhibited to the view of Congress the execution of the laws relating to that department of the public service. The repression of piracy in the West Indian and in the Grecian seas has been effectually maintained with scarcely any exception. During the war between the Governments of Buenos Ayres and of Brazil, frequent collisions between belligerent acts of power and the rights of neutral commerce occurred. Licentious blockades, irregularly enlisted or impressed seamen, and the property of honest commerce seized with violence, and even plundered under legal pretences, are disorders never separable from the conflicts of war upon the ocean. With a portion of them, the correspondence of our commanders on the Eastern aspect of the South American coast, and among the Islands of Greece, discover how far we have been involved. In these, the honor of our country and the rights of our citizens have been asserted and vindicated. The appearance of new squadrons in the Mediterranean, and the blockade of the Dardanelles, indicate the danger of other obstacles to the freedom of commerce, and the necessity of keeping our naval force in those seas. To the suggestions repeated in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and tending to the permanent improvement of this institution, I invite the favorable consideration of Congress.

The resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting that one of our small public vessels should be sent to the Pacific Ocean and South Sea, to examine the coasts, islands, harbors, shoals, and reefs, in those seas, and to ascertain their true situation and description, has been put in a train of execution. The vessel is nearly ready to depart; the successful accomplishment of the expedition may be greatly facilitated by suitable legislative provisions; and particularly by an appropriation to defray its necessary expense. The addition of a second, and, perhaps, a third vessel, with a slight aggravation of the cost, would contribute much to the safety of the citizens embarked on this undertaking, the results of which may be of the deepest interest to our country.

With the report of the Secretary of the Navy will be submitted, in conformity to the act of Congress, of 3d March, 1827, for the gradual improvement of the navy of the United States, statements of the expenditures under that act, and of the measures taken for carrying the same into effect. Every section of that statute contains a distinct provision, looking to the great object of the whole—the gradual improvement of the navy. Under its salutary sanction, stores of ship-timber have been procured, and are in process of seasoning and preservation for the future uses of the navy. Arrangements have been made for the preservation of the live oak timber growing on the lands of the United States, and for its re-production, to supply, at future and distant days, the waste of that most valuable material for ship building, by the great consumption of it, yearly, for the commercial as well as for the military marine of our country. The construction of the two dry docks at Charlestown and at Norfolk, is making satisfactory progress towards a durable establishment. The examinations and inquiries to ascertain the practicability and expediency of a marine railway at Pensacola, though not yet accomplished, have been postponed but to be the more effectually made. The navy yards of the United States have been examined, and plans for their improvement, and the preservation of the public property therein, at Portsmouth, Charlestown, Philadelphia, Washington, and Gosport, and to which two others are to be added, have been prepared, and received my sanction; and no other portion of my public duties has been performed with a more intimate conviction of its importance to the future welfare and security of the Union.

With the report from the Postmaster General is exhibited a comparative view of the gradual increase of that establishment, from five to five years, since 1792, till this time, in the number of post offices, which has grown from less than two hundred to nearly eight thousand; in the revenue yielded by them, which, from sixty-seven thousand dollars, has swollen to upwards of a million and a half; and in the number of miles of post roads, which, from five thousand six hundred and forty-two, have multiplied to one hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and thirty-six. While, in the same period of time, the population of the Union has about thrice doubled, the rate of increase of these offices is nearly forty, and of the revenue, and of travelled miles, from twenty to twenty-five for one. The increase of revenue, within the last five years, has been nearly equal to the whole revenue of the department in 1812.

The expenditures of the department, during the year which ended on the first of July last, have exceeded the receipts by a sum of about twenty-five thousand dollars. The excess has been occasioned by the increase of mail conveyances and facilities, to the extent of near eight hundred thousand miles. It has been supplied by collections from the Postmasters, of the arrearages of preceding years. While the correct principle seems to be, that the income levied by the department should defray all its expenses, it has never been the policy of this Government to raise from this establishment any revenue to be applied to any other purposes. The suggestion of the Postmaster General, that the insurance of the safe transmission of moneys by the mail, might be assumed by the department, for a moderate and competent remuneration, will deserve the consideration of Congress.

A report from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings in this city exhibits the expenditures upon them in the course of the current year. It will be seen that the humane and benevolent intentions of Congress in providing, by the act of 20th May, 1826, for the erection of a Penitentiary in this District, have been accomplished. The authority of farther legislation is now required for the removal to this tenement of the offenders against the laws, sentenced to atone by personal confinement for their crimes, and to provide a code for their employment and government while thus confined.

The commissioners appointed conformably to the act of 2d March, 1827, to provide for the adjustment of claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and for the distribution among such claimants of the sum paid by the Government of Great Britain under the convention of 18th November, 1826, closed their labors on the 30th of August last, by awarding the claimants the sum of one million one hundred and ninety-seven thousand four hundred and twenty-two dollars and eighteen cents; leaving a balance of seven thousand five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and eighty-two cents, which was distributed ratably amongst all the claimants to whom awards had been made, according to the directions of the act.

The exhibits appended to the report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office present the actual condition of that common property of the Union. The amount paid into the treasury from the proceeds of lands, during the year 1827, and the first half of 1828, falls little short of two millions of dollars. The propriety of further extending the time for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of the public lands, limited, by the act of 21st March last, to the fourth of July next, will claim the consideration of Congress, to whose vigilance and careful attention, the regulation, disposal, and preservation, of this great national inheritance, has, by the people of the United States, been intrusted.

Among the important subjects to which the attention of the present Congress has already been invited, and which may occupy their further and deliberate discussion, will be the provision to be made for taking the fifth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. The Constitution of the United States requires that this enumeration should be made within every term of ten years, and the date from which the last enumeration commenced, was the first Monday of August, of the year 1820. The laws under which the former enumerations were taken, were enacted at the session of Congress immediately preceding the operation. But considerable inconveniences were experienced from the delay of legislation to so late a period. That law, like those of the preceding enumerations, directed that the census should be taken by the Marshals of the several Districts and Territories, under instructions from the Secretary of State. The preparation and transmission to the marshals of those instructions required more time than was then allowed between the passage of the law and the day when the enumeration was to commence. The term of six months, limited for the returns of the marshals, was also found even then too short, and must be more so now, when an additional population of at least three millions must be presented upon the returns. As they are to be made at the short session of Congress, it would, as well as from other considerations, be more convenient to commence the enumeration from an earlier period of the year than the first of August. The most favorable season would be the spring. On a review of the former enumerations, it will be found that the plan for taking every census has contained improvements upon that of its predecessor. The last is still susceptible of much improvement. The third census was the first at which any account was taken of the manufactures of the country. It was repeated at the last enumeration, but the returns in both cases were necessarily very imperfect. They must always be so, resting of course only on the communications voluntarily made by individuals interested in some of the manufacturing establishments. Yet they contained much valuable information, and may, by some supplementary provision of the law, be rendered more effective. The columns of age, commencing from infancy, have hitherto been confined to a few periods, all under the number of forty-five years. Important knowledge would be obtained by extending those columns, in intervals of ten years, to the utmost boundaries of human life. The labor of taking them would be a trifling addition to that already prescribed, and the result would exhibit comparative tables of longevity highly interesting to the country. I deem it my duty farther to observe, that much of the imperfections in the returns of the last and perhaps of preceding enumerations, proceeded from the inadequateness of the compensations allowed to the marshals and their assistants in taking them.

In closing this communication, it only remains for me to assure the legislature of my continued earnest wish for the adoption of measures recommended by me heretofore, and yet, to be acted on by them; and of the cordial concurrence on my part, in every constitutional provision which may receive their sanction during the session, tending to the general welfare.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, December 2, 1828.

The Message was read; and three thousand copies of the Message, and fifteen hundred of the documents accompanying it, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 9.

The Senate concluded the balloting for the remainder of their Standing Committees.

The President communicated the annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the Finances;* which was read, and * Extract from the report, Richard Rush, Esq., Secretary of the Treasury.

The actual receipts from all sources, during the year 1827, amounted, as will be seen in document No. 5 to twenty-two millions nine hundred and sixty-six thousand three hundred and sixty-three dollars and ninety-six cents; which, with the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January of that year, of six millions three hundred and fifty-eight thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars and eighteen cents, gives an aggregate of twenty-nine millions three hundred and twenty-five thousand and fifty dollars and fourteen cents. Of the sums received as above, during 1827, the customs yielded upwards of nineteen millions and a half, and the sales of public lands nearly one million and a half. The expenditures of the United States for the same year amounted to twenty-two millions six hundred and fifty-six thousand seven hundred and sixty-four dollars and four cents. The same document will supply a specification of the particulars, and show a balance in the Treasury, on the 1st January, 1828, of six millions six hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and eighty-six dollars and ten cents.

The actual receipts during the three first quarters of 1828, (doc. No. 3,) are supposed to have amounted to eighteen millions six hundred and thirty-three thousand five hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-seven cents; and those of the fourth quarter, it is supposed, will amount to five millions four hundred and sixty-one thousand two hundred and eighty-three dollars and forty cents; making the total receipts for 1828, twenty-four millions ninety-four thousand eight hundred and sixty-three dollars and sixty-seven cents; which, added to the balance in the Treasury on the first of January, as above stated, gives an aggregate of thirty millions seven hundred and sixty-three thousand one hundred and forty-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents. The expenditures of the three first quarters of the year [same document,] are supposed to have amounted to eighteen millions two hundred and forty-four thousand nine hundred and seven dollars and ninety-one cents; and those for the fourth quarter, it is supposed, will amount to seven millions three hundred and ninety-two thousand six hundred and three dollars and seventy-two cents; making for the whole year, twenty-five millions six hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and eleven dollars and sixty-three cents. This expenditure includes, as the items in the document will show, upwards of twelve millions on account of the debt, and will leave in the Treasury, on the first of January, 1829, an estimated balance of five millions one hundred and twenty-five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fourteen cents. This balance will be subject to the appropriations of moneys for the service of 1829, that have not, as yet, been called for—a sum estimated at three millions five hundred thousand dollars, and includes the one million of dollars in funds not now effective, as heretofore explained.

We have permanent acts of Congress requiring a certain amount, (formerly two millions, now six,) over and above the 1,500 extra copies ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Lead Mines in Missouri.

The bill for the sale of the lead mines in the State of Missouri, (introduced by Mr. BENTON,) was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANCH said he should like to hear the reasons assigned for the passage of the bill, as he did not see the necessity of disposing of the public property in this manner. They were already hurrying the property into market faster than there was any occasion for; and there was no reason, in his mind, why these mines should be exposed to sale.

Mr. BENTON said, the same subject had been frequently before the Senate, and had, during the last session, he believed, passed this body, and been sent to the other House. The facts had often been exposed to the consideration of the Senate, and of committees, and very elaborate reports had been made, filling several hundred pages, of their proceedings. This bill did not apply to the lead mines of the Upper Missouri, but was confined to those within the bounds of the State of Missouri. Those upon the Upper Missouri were first discovered about the year 1720, and had been worked from that time to the present; but the mines in Missouri had been, for a long time, unworked; the land had been but scratched over, or had been dug some fifteen or twenty feet. The mines in Missouri were very little profit to anybody, and reports from that section stated, that very little was received from them; they were neither profitable nor desirable property to the Federal Government. This bill barely authorized them to be offered for sale; it did not order their sale; there was no coercion—on the contrary, the notice of the sale was not of the ordinary kind. Public notice was to be given in every State in the Union, in some newspaper, six months before the sale. It was five and twenty years since Louisiana came into the possession of the United States, and it was five and appropriations, to be kept in the Treasury. It is mistaken legislation, always unnecessary, and always pernicious, in keeping up more revenue than needed. Both reason and experience show, that the whole of the appropriations cannot be expended in the year—that there always remains an excess, generally about one-fourth—which cannot be expended until the ensuing year; when its place, as it goes out, will be supplied by the incoming revenue. This has been the case from the beginning of the Government, as may be seen in all the annual finance reports, and forever will be the case; so that the operations of the Government may be carried on for considerably less, say one-fourth less, than the annual income. In the two years above mentioned, (1827 and '28,) in an income of about twenty-five millions, and corresponding appropriations, upwards of six millions and a half remained unexpended at the end of each year; and about the same excess was estimated for the ensuing year.

twenty years since these mines were discovered, an early law of Louisiana provided for the reservation of certain of these lands, so that they could not be sold. He thought it time to have them explored, and made productive. He did not see why the gentleman from North Carolina opposed the bill, and wished to stretch the sceptre of barrenness over the whole of the State of Missouri. The Government would be no loser by the sale, and, if no advantages were to accrue to the Government of the United States, or to any body else, by keeping the mineral country of Missouri in a state of barrenness, why should the bill be opposed?

Mr. BRANCH replied, that it was generally conceded, that, where authority was given to the President of the United States, or to any of the Departments, that it was equivalent to saying that the power might be exercised; and, although the authority given by this bill was discretionary only, he conceived that it would, in fact, be peremptory; for, if the President of the United States had liberty to dispose of these lands, he would be importuned by speculators until he had thrown the whole into the market. And why should they force the sale of what it was not necessary to sell, and why should the State of Missouri be so anxious to have them disposed of? Is not this the wealth of the country? Is not this the general treasure, purchased by the public money? Is Missouri alone interested in these lead mines? No, sir, this is the public property. He would ask the honorable senator, if the mines belonged to the State of Missouri, whether he would be so willing to throw them into the market now? Would he not keep them until there was a demand for them? Would he not wait until a more propitious period? He (Mr. B.) thought he would.

Mr. BARTON said, the Senate must be well acquainted with the fact, that, at the time the State of Louisiana was purchased, the Missouri mines were but little known, and that the general idea was, that they were immensely valuable. Among the first laws passed by the State of Louisiana, was one making large reservations of land, in the neighborhood of these mines. Since that time, much more was known of the mines than at that early period. It was now known, that almost the whole of the southern part of the State of Missouri, which was a broken and poor country, was a mineral country. It was also known, that the most valuable lead mines in the United States were north of the State of Missouri. The Spanish lead mine was there, and the whole of the valuable mineral country was in a triangle, made by the boundary line of Missouri and the Mississippi River. It was necessary for the United States to cover this country with tenantry, and their mines were almost inexhaustible. The whole of this other country had been examined, and people were anxious to work it. The mining business was known to be extremely uncertain, and it was also extremely fascinating; it was something like gambling, exciting high hopes, which were frequently not realized. Under the present United States laws, several cases had occurred in which lands had been sold to individuals, and lead ore afterwards being discovered upon the lands, the patents were withheld. Now the Government did not want these lands; they had already inexhaustible stores in the Spanish mine, the Fever River lead mines, in the State of Illinois, and upon the east and west sides of the Mississippi. The project of this bill was not to force the sale. The gentleman from North Carolina had supposed, that, because the Government could dispose of them, they must necessarily; but it did not follow; the President of the United States might have firmness enough to resist improper importunities. He would state a case of the difficulty of which he had complained. In the village of Belle Vue, a tract of land had been sold by the Government to an individual as long ago as the year 1806; lately, ore has been discovered not upon his tract, but in the neighborhood of it, in another part of the town, in consequence of which his patent has been withdrawn.

Under this state of things, in the course of time, almost the whole State of Missouri will be reserved, and withheld from sale, and subject to this system. The mines on the Upper Missouri, and north of the State, were so much more valuable, and, as they were worked, the settlers and laborers had left the State of Missouri and gone up to them. This bill only abolished the law of reservation and restriction, which had been found to be extremely injurious to that country, and which must ultimately be the ruin of it.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that, as the gentlemen from Missouri must know more of the subject than they who lived at a greater distance, he would ask them if this land had ever been surveyed by authority of the Government, and whether there were any reports upon the subject; if so, he should like to see them, that he might have some more information, and make up his mind—as it might be advisable to sell all these lands, or it might be better to sell only a part. There were always many speculators about a new country, and, as the gentleman from North Carolina very justly observed, if the President once had the liberty, he would be constantly importuned until he had thrown the whole of them into the market.

The President here read an amendment to the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, and stated that the question would be upon the amendment; which was explained by Mr. BARTON.

Mr. BENTON then replied, that very ample reports had been made, both by Government agents and others. The United States appointed an agent there, many years ago, with a salary of $1,500 per annum, who had examined the country; and reports had also been made by persons who had been a long time resident in that country. As it was early in the session, he was willing the bill should lie over, that the gentleman might examine the reports on the subject.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by the committee, it was adopted, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, December 22.

The Senate was principally occupied this day in discussing a bill for the relief of Susan Decatur et al.

TUESDAY, December 23.

Commerce of the West.

A bill, "allowing duties on foreign merchandise, imported into Louisville, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, to be secured and paid at those places," was taken up and considered.

Mr. WOODBURY (Chairman of the Committee on Commerce) said, this was the same bill which had been before that committee, and passed the Senate, at its last session, but was not acted upon in the House of Representatives. Full security was afforded to the public, by its provisions, that the duties would be paid; and, as the convenience of the merchants of the Western country would be promoted, and the public lose nothing by the proposed arrangement, he saw no obstacle to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MARKS said he recollected that, two sessions since, he had presented a memorial from the merchants of Pittsburg, praying that the place might be made a port of entry. Since that time, he had understood that the citizens of Pittsburg did not require the passage of a law on the subject; they were altogether indifferent to its passage, and he was not certain whether they would approve of it. He merely rose to give the Senate this information. It was altogether immaterial to him what order the Senate took upon the bill.

Mr. WOODBURY said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not, certainly, paid attention to the provisions of the bill. He would state, for his information, that the bill did not provide for the establishment of ports of entry: it was not the intention of the committee to make such a provision. It was at first contemplated; but, for himself, he was against it. The bill provides merely, that the duties on goods to be imported into Louisville, &c., shall be secured to be paid at those places: the bonds will then be sent to New Orleans, and paid at such places as the collector of that port might direct. While on the floor, he would state, that an amendment had been made to the bill, at the last session, which was not contained in it as introduced by the Senator from Missouri, viz., to include "Nashville in the State of Tennessee," as one of the places at which, also, duties on foreign merchandise might be secured to be paid. For the purpose of extending the same privilege to that place, he would move that the words he had named be inserted in the bill.

The motion of Mr. W. prevailed.

Mr. BENTON stated, that the object of the bill was to give facilities to those persons in the Western country who were engaged in foreign commerce. The bill was under the consideration of the Committee of Commerce, when a distinguished senator from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) was its Chairman. He approved of making the places named in the bill ports of entry. Since then, that committee had contemplated a different method, which was considered more safe. For years past, foreign goods had been imported into the Western country, consigned to merchants in the interior, from the port of Liverpool in particular. New Orleans was the port of delivery, and the consignees had to pay two or three per cent. to commission merchants to attend to the transshipment of their property, and the security of the duties upon it. This was one hardship. Another was, the great advance of money which it cost them to have the business attended to. It was a fact, that some of the interior towns were nearer to the Gulf of Mexico than New Orleans was fifteen years ago. These merchants can attend to their own business quite as well, if not better, than it is now attended to at New Orleans, and the Government be equally secured in the payment of the duties; while it would be a great accommodation to those merchants, if the bill should pass. As far as the change contemplated by the bill was known, it had given general satisfaction; it would be of great advantage to the commerce of the West, if it should become a law, and, certainly, would be of no material injury to the country. He, therefore, hoped it would pass.

The question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, was decided in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, December 30.

Drawback on Merchandise.

A bill "to extend the time within which merchandise may be exported with the benefit of drawback," was considered as in Committee of the Whole—the question being on striking out the second section.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he would give the Senate information of the course pursued in Great Britain on this subject. The practice in that country was, that, on a representation to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury of the necessity therefor, they had the power, and used their discretion, in extending the time in which merchandise might be exported for the benefit of drawback. The section proposed to be stricken out gives this power to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on Finance were of opinion that this was giving a Legislative power to an Executive officer, which was improper, and therefore had recommended that it be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SILSBEE said, that, as the amendment took away some of the advantages proposed by the bill, he would move for an extension of time in which merchandise might be exported for this benefit. Two years were allowed by the bill. Great Britain, France, &c., allowed a longer time; he thought our merchants ought to be put on as good a footing; and he would therefore move to amend the bill by striking out the word two in the seventh line of the first section, and inserting three.

This amendment was also agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was reported to the Senate, the amendments concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

A bill granting an extension of drawback on refined sugar, &c., was taken up in committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained the bill. The present law allowed four cents drawback on sugar refined within the United States. The object of the present bill was to allow five cents. It required two pounds of sugar, in its crude state, to make one pound of refined. The duty on brown sugar was three cents per pound; consequently, a drawback of six cents would be required in favor of the refiner. The treacle obtained from the sugar was, however, valued at one cent per pound, in favor of the refiner, and therefore five cents, the drawback fixed upon in the bill, would be a fair allowance, and would indemnify him for the amount of duties actually paid to Government. Should the bill pass, the American refiner of sugar would be enabled to enter into competition with the foreign manufacturer in foreign markets. There could be no possible disadvantage arise from passing the bill; it would not enhance the price of sugar to the consumers of the country, and would greatly tend to benefit the merchant in helping him to make up an assorted cargo for the South American, Chinese, and other markets. The only question was, what was the proper drawback to be allowed? The Secretary of the Treasury had fixed it at five cents. During the French Revolution, when all the markets of the world were open to us, he was himself engaged in the business of refining and exporting sugar; then it was done to advantage; for we were the only nation that enjoyed a free trade; now, times had changed, and some inducements must be held out, or competition on our part would cease altogether. Sugar raised in this country had never been, and could not be, refined; and the reason was, it was not strong enough. Batavia sugar was used for this purpose, and that of Cuba, which was superior, because much stronger. The Havana sugar, particularly, was of a proper quality for refining. A portion only of the sugar imported was used by the refiners, and this portion was generally confined to the white and clayed qualities. We carried on a great trade with the Havana; they received from us nearly all the articles consumed by them, with the exception of dry goods, and in return sent us sugar. In its refined state it was an article of commerce. On the whole, the extension of the drawback system would be beneficial to the agriculturist, the manufacturer, and the navigator, and he hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. BENTON observed, that whatever reasons might have existed for the drawback system in 1790, they no longer prevailed. Instead of increasing it, this system should be diminished, or repealed altogether. At the time referred to, no sugar was raised in the United States; frauds on the revenue were not so likely to take place; there were then no exports but of articles which had been brought into the country; and there was then a nominal drawback on domestic spirits, made from molasses. What was the proof on this subject at the last session of Congress? Why, that frauds were produced by this system, on the revenue; and that, instead of a drawback, we were paying four cents premium on foreign articles. In consequence, the nominal drawback was repealed entirely. The same should be done in this case. As to American sugar not being fitted for refining, this was but the reiteration of an old story. The same had been said of wool, hemp, and iron. The true reason was, however, that the refiner can procure the foreign material cheaper than the domestic, and, therefore, he preferred it. The duty on West India sugar was four cents; if this duty be taken off, as by the bill it will be, we shall discover the true difference between American and foreign sugar.

He could see no reason why New Orleans sugar might not be made as dry and as fit for refining as the Havana. He looked upon the proposed measure as in effect a tax upon the American people, for the benefit of foreigners. He had a regard for the South Americans, but he loved his own constituents better. He should be glad to see every branch of industry prosper, but he could not consent to the prostration of his constituents. The effect of the bill was to give a premium of one per cent. on every pound of sugar refined and exported, which was a greater profit than was obtained by the cultivators of the earth. Considerable quantities of refined sugar were exported, and the export was on the increase. If the refiners could export at present, the additional bounty (for he could look upon it in no other light) of one per cent. would cause immense shipments, and the country would be either unsupplied, of great and exorbitant profits exacted.

Mr. SILSBEE supported the bill. When before the committee at the last session, he had endeavored to inform himself upon the subject, and from all the information he could obtain, five cents would rather fall short of a proper allowance of drawback. He conceived the question to be, whether we would give encouragement to the refiners of this country, or to foreigners. He differed from the gentleman from

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

[SENATE.]

Missouri, as to the injurious effect upon American sugar, stated by him. He enlarged upon the benefits and advantages of the trade of this country with the Havana; stated that it had been the custom at the eastward to send refined sugar to Leghorn, and other parts of the Mediterranean; that more would have been sent, but that the article could be furnished cheaper from France. The cultivation of sugar in France, as he had been informed, was on the increase, and yet, they allowed the importation of the article, with a drawback of the whole of the duties, for the purpose of refining and exportation. The question was, whether we should allow a drawback to the whole amount of the duties or not?

Mr. WOODBURY, in reply to Mr. BENTON, said, that the original policy of the drawback system was to encourage manufactures and the carrying trade. There was no tax on sugar that did not go into the consumption of the country; and, to encourage the carrying trade, the sugar refined should be as free from tax now as heretofore. It was not the policy of the country to tax what was not consumed in the country; and from every pound of sugar exported, the tax should be drawn back. The duties would be deducted from iron, duck, hemp, and other articles used in the manufacture of ships, if they were not consumed in the country; but they are. Sugar, after it was refined, was not consumed in the country, but sent out of it. There was no fraud on the revenue; for the sugar could be, and was traced out of it. The refining of this article did not interfere with the manufacturers of sugar, but aided them. The gentleman from Missouri complained that it was an injury to agriculture; but, so far from its coming into competition with the manufacture of sugar, evidence before Congress satisfactorily showed that it did not: for the quality of American sugar would not answer—it was altogether unsuitable. This was a matter of fact, and he the more readily appealed to it. But, suppose it was suitable, every hundred weight used in refining would bring a hundred weight of foreign sugar into consumption. Where then was the difference? Neither the domestic sugar, nor the revenue was injured by a drawback on foreign sugar refined. The Treasury did not suffer—the debentures did not exceed $2,000 per annum, while the duties on sugar imported exceeded $2,000,000. Nothing therefore was lost to the Treasury unless the debentures exceeded the importation. The operation of the bill would certainly be beneficial to agriculture, because, in exchange for the sugar obtained, we sell our lumber, flour, corn, &c., &c. We must have a market abroad—and one of the mysteries and beauties of the trade was, that the purchase and sale of the sugar often gave double voyages. We do not send it to Italy, &c., as formerly, but to Brazil, China, &c. In England the whole duty had been withdrawn, because there was no consumption of the sugar in the country; in France it was the same; and, in consequence of these countries withholding all duty from the importation of sugar, we have no trade now in the article, but with our neighbors of this continent, and to them we must resort. He thought the bill ought to pass, and would not trouble the Senate any farther.

Mr. BENTON inquired what was the value of refined sugar, and was answered fourteen cents. He then commented on the report of the committee, and stated that those who petitioned for an increase of drawback complained of their large families, and that they must stop unless assisted by Congress. Yet it seems they are doing a profitable business, and it is proposed to allow them a premium of one per cent., while no part of the attention of the committee was turned to the consumers of the country. The people of South America were to be furnished with the article at a cheaper rate, while those of the United States were to receive it at an enhanced price.

Mr. SMITH alluded to the state of things in the year 1794. At that time an excise existed on whiskey, loaf sugar, &c., and Congress thought proper to draw back excise on these articles, and allowed three cents on the exportation of every pound of loaf sugar. The duty on brown sugar was then one and a half cents. The consequence was, the exportation of loaf sugar increased to a great extent. In 1818 a new law was passed on the subject (of which Mr. S. read the second section, guarding against frauds on the revenue, &c.) and the trade to Cuba became so extensive, that more sugar was imported than could be consumed in the country. What was to be done? A drawback on foreign sugars was allowed, and soon the country was cleared of its superfluity, and a market opened for the sugars of Louisiana. Where was there any difference in the sugar, in its raw and refined state, except the difference that resulted from the industry employed? The fact was, steam was now used in refining sugar, and a state of perfection had been arrived at greatly beneficial, and enabling us to compete successfully with foreigners.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, did not attribute so much importance to this bill, as some gentlemen who had spoken. The principle of allowing a drawback on the exportation of articles, equal to the duty on the importation, was a plain one, and essential to the navigation and commerce of a country; and the principle had been extended to articles which had undergone some modification by manufacture. And, if the effect is to diversify our labor and increase the navigation, there can be no objection, unless it operate injuriously upon some other interest. At present the export of refined sugar does not interfere with any other branch of industry. It is very limited, not exceeding $27,000, and not likely to be very greatly increased, while a duty is necessary to protect refined sugar in the home market. Mr. J. said he presumed the details of the bill had been attended to by the committee, and that they had allowed what in their judgment was a fair equivalent in drawback for the duty on the sugar. He could not enter into a minute calculation. If more was given than had been paid, it is a bounty which it is not the intention of Congress to allow. If less, it operates injuriously to the manufacturer. But, Mr. J. said, there was another view of this subject which had been adverted to, and which it became him to notice. It had been said by the advocates of the bill, that, if the country produced the raw material, it would accord with the principles of protection of domestic industry, to make the refined sugar, both for home consumption and for export, from that material. Mr. J. said it was true, that, at this moment, we did not make sugar equal to the consumption, and therefore it was not now necessary to guard the domestic article. But the period was approaching when we should be fully supplied; and when it was found that the country could furnish the raw material, he presumed the gentlemen, on their own principles, would protect the domestic article, by withholding the drawback on foreign sugar refined. He believed that in five years the production would equal the consumption; and, if the export of refined sugar should then be an object of any value, it would be proper to give the preference to our own material. He therefore proposed to limit the act to five years.

Mr. J. then moved to amend the bill by adding a proviso that it should expire at the end of five years.

Mr. BENTON said the amendment was perfectly parliamentary—were the effects of any proposed measure dubious, it was usual to fix a duration to its existence, that the Legislature may act again upon the subject in due time. The amendment lessened, but did not remove his objections. As to the fitness of Louisiana sugar, he considered it as likely to answer the purposes of the refiner, as the sugar of the West India Islands, where the atmosphere was as humid as in Louisiana. Perhaps the true reason was, that at present the sugar made in that State was all consumed in so short a period that it had not time to dry; but this will not always be the case. If a bounty was to be given on sugar, give it to the domestic and not the foreign; not that he thought more protection was needed, but he would prefer that course. While cut off from the competition of foreigners, by a duty of twelve cents on the pound, the sugar refiner exorbitantly demands a drawback of five cents the pound additional. This was a bold attempt at monopoly, and would soon operate as a direct bounty. He trusted the amendment would be adopted, and then that the bill would be rejected.

Mr. JOHNSTON modified his amendment to read, "Provided, That this act shall continue and be in force for five years."

Mr. SMITH, of Md., opposed the amendment, and stated that not one pound of sugar would be used if it was adopted. They had better prohibit the importation of foreign sugar at once. Clayed and dry white sugar, he reiterated, were the proper materials for the refiner, and gentlemen might rely upon it he would never use the domestic article—it was unsuitable. Mr. S. replied to Mr. BENTON as to the 12 cents duty on imported sugar, and again rallied him on the provisions of the tariff law respecting lead, &c.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON was rejected, yeas 16, noes 22.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that, for one, he had not canvassed the subject, and was not prepared to vote on the bill. He did, some years since, look into it, and he stated, to the best of his recollection, the quantity of brown sugar used in the manufacture. He was then of opinion that five cents was a fraction beyond the duty on the raw material. That was the case formerly, but he knew matters had changed since—the duty on sugar was somewhat higher. After the sugar was refined, however, there was a residue left, called treacle, or sugar-house molasses, which was of the very best kind, and paid no duty. It therefore required a nice calculation to know how much the refiner did pay for his raw material. Five cents, under his present impressions, was too much to return to him as drawback—it served as a bounty to use foreign materials. As we had gone into the system, he was willing to give back all that the refiner paid; but as at present informed, he should feel it his duty to vote against the bill, unless farther time was granted to obtain the necessary information.

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

The bill extending the drawback on sugar refined within the United States came up—the question being on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. DICKERSON rose in opposition to the bill. He said he had had little time to examine its provisions—but he had had enough to convince himself that five cents was too great an amount of drawback to be allowed. Mr. D. then proceeded to canvass the report of a committee, made at the last session of Congress, and entered into a minute calculation respecting the cost of the raw material used in refining of sugar, and the amount of drawback proposed to be allowed, and what he thought ought to be allowed, as sufficient. He was of opinion that Congress had legislated upon the subject without the proper data to go upon, being governed by estimates of the refiners, made twenty years ago. An allowance of five cents drawback on the pound of refined sugar would leave a large balance in favor of the refiner, and the Government would be the loser to that amount—an amount averaging from 15 to 47 per cent. The improvements made in the manufacture were certainly worthy of notice; because a greater amount of refined sugar could be made now, from the same quantity of raw material, than formerly—perhaps one pound of refined sugar from one and a half pounds of the raw material; and he thought a strict inquiry ought to be instituted into the subject, that it might be known what quantity of the raw material was actually used in the manufacture. The officers of the customs were certainly entitled to a compensation for their trouble in attending to the duties required of them by the drawback system, which duties were various and complicated; and in his opinion four cents drawback was amply sufficient for the refiner, leaving a sum in the hands of the Government to defray the expenses to which he had referred. He was among those who were disposed to favor domestic manufactures; but when they were encouraged to a proper extent, he was not willing to go farther. He never could consent to the payment of a bounty to enable them to send the proceeds of their industry abroad. As the allowance of a drawback on sugar refined was a system long established, he was willing to make a fair allowance to the refiner; but, if the system were now to be originated, he doubted if Congress would establish the policy: for himself, he was free to say, he should be diametrically opposed to it. There was certainly danger of fraud in the system, and he instanced the article of snuff to show that the Government had heretofore been imposed upon. He believed he might say the same of spirits, though not to so great an extent. He believed there was less danger of fraud on the exportation of refined sugar than any other article on which a drawback was allowed—but yet there was fraud. He believed, too, that, so long as the system was continued, the consumption of the domestic material in the manufacture would never take place; it was, in his opinion, quite as good as the foreign: for he knew of no law of nature that operated against it. Domestic hemp would never be used in the manufacture of cordage, if there was a drawback on the foreign article when exported; he might say the same of nails. If there was no sugar produced in the country, then it would be proper to encourage the importation of the foreign article, and give a drawback on its exportation, to the amount of the duty on importation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, gave great credit to the gentleman from New Jersey for the attention he had paid to the subject; he had certainly been at great pains to inform himself, though the case was a very plain one. He had hoped more from the intelligence of his friend, however, than the assertion that a pound of refined sugar could be made from a pound and a half of the raw material. What was the object of refining? Why, to take away all the impurities from the article to be refined; and it was beyond his comprehension how the thing could be done, unless a good portion of the impurities were suffered to remain. The fact was, however, that the allowance of the gentleman to the pound of refined sugar was not enough—it could not be made of so small a quantity. With regard to the expenses of the drawback system, the officer was entitled to such fees for his trouble as sufficiently compensated him, without taking from the Government. He well recollected the fraud on snuff; but when it was discovered, the drawback was withheld. There might be some fraud so far as related to spirits; but the laws were very strict; and he who committed fraud, must commit perjury also. The gentleman from New Jersey admitted there was less fraud, and less chance of fraud, on the article of refined sugar; and in this admission, he overthrew the whole of his argument. Mr. S. then rebutted the arguments advanced by Mr. DICKERSON relative to hemp, cordage, iron, &c., and observed that the tax on hemp was most abominable; that it tended greatly to the injury of navigation, destroying a very considerable trade formerly carried on with Cuba, &c., and then proceeded, with great vehemence, to defend the bill. He stated what had formerly been the practice of Congress; that it was to encourage navigation and commerce, and to prepare a hardy race of men to fight the battles of the country. The present policy of the country tended to enfeeble it; and the great object of the statesmen of the present day, seemed to be to compete with England in the manufacture of shovels, nails, &c. The gentleman had been a day and a night making his calculations; he showed that the refiner had a profit of 15½ cents on the Muscovado sugar, and 47 on the clayed; and this was the amount of his calculations. He would not have taken the trouble to make them for the whole of the profit. He considered it trifling with the Senate. And how had the gentleman been able to arrive at his conclusions? Why, by denying the statements of the refiners, though he knew no more of the subject than he (Mr. SMITH) did. Mr. S. then proceeded to answer some of the statements made yesterday; stated that he had also examined the statistics of the country; and said he was fully of opinion that, if the bill passed, where 84,000 pounds of sugar were now exported, 100,000 pounds would be, in the same space of time. With regard to the constituents of the gentleman from Missouri, their share of the additional expense, should the bill pass, would be about four dollars, to be divided among the whole State; for the whole average amount of the exportation would only be 1,007 dollars. As to domestic sugar, 70,000 pounds only were produced per annum, whereas 76,000,000 pounds were imported, valued at five millions of dollars. He was tired of the subject; he had been drawn into the discussion of it against his will; and thought the matter was too clear to admit of any farther argument.

Mr. BENTON in reply to Mr. SMITH, asked how many sugar manufacturers there were in the country? (He was answered, about one hundred.) If four dollars, then, was the amount to be paid by Missouri, and that of the Union only 1,007 dollars, and if the number of manufacturers was only one hundred, to receive ten dollars additional bounty each by the bill, he thought Congress had been employed on a very insignificant subject. Was it possible that the two Houses of Congress had been occupied for nearly two weeks, at an expense of several thousand dollars, to give a thousand dollars to a hundred persons? Is it true that the Senator from Maryland has been seriously at work in this momentous business? Truly the mountain had been in labor, and brought forth a mouse—a drowned mouse. Did the manufacturers of sugar, who had a capital of thousands, require an act of Congress to allow them this paltry sum? But the manufacturers of this sugar had the exclusive supply of the market at this moment; every man, woman, and child in the country were laid at their feet: and, not content with the ten dollars, they require a bounty to go forth to trade with foreign nations. They tell us, too, that theirs is an increasing and profitable business; if profitable it must be increasing. And yet they apply for seven per cent. additional profit, to be taken from the pockets of the people. What was the value of interest in the country? What the profits of the farmer and planter? Few of them realize three per cent. He presumed the profits of the sugar refiner were now 6 per cent.; give them what they ask, and it would be 18. He was astonished at the manner in which this bill had gone through. But the statement of the gentleman from Maryland to-day had placed it on a different footing, and made it appear as an object of legislation truly contemptible. What becomes of the navigating interest?

The object of the bill was really to give one cent more on refined sugar than formerly. Estimate the consumption of sugar in the United States, and add 1 per cent., and you get at the effects of the bill upon the consumers of the country. The refiners will not sell to the consumers of this country unless they can get the one per cent.; they will sooner take it out of the country, and receive their bounty for so doing.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he was unaware of any injury or fraud that could possibly result to the country from the passage of the bill, unless the amount of drawback exceeded the importation of the article. He would, therefore, offer an amendment to the bill, to be added as a proviso at the end, as follows:

“Provided, That this act shall cease to be in force so soon as the exports of sugar shall be equal to the imports of the same article.”

Mr. TAZEWELL did not rise to discuss the bill, but to make the inquiry, whether a drawback was allowed by the laws of the United States, on any other article but sugar, where it had changed its form? Another question he would put, was, whether any drawback was ever allowed on refined sugar, until there was an excise duty laid upon it? The general principle of the Government, from its foundation, had been, he believed, to allow a drawback on articles exported in the same form and clothing in which they were imported, but, if they had undergone any change in these respects, then no drawback was allowed.

[Mr. SMITH noticed the article of cloths, which was allowed to be exported, and Mr. SILSBEE that of handkerchiefs.]

Mr. TAZEWELL. They are not changed, but cut. So early as 1789, a drawback of one cent was allowed on sugar, which was increased from time to time. There was then no internal tax on the article. In 1794, an excise of four cents was laid on refined sugar, with the understanding, that, if exported, the amount of the excise should be drawn back. But the drawback was allowed solely on account of the excise—there was no other reason assigned for it. So true was this, that both were repealed together, in the year 1818. He rose merely for information. If correct in his ideas, the drawback was never allowed on the cost of the brown sugar, but solely on account of excise. He entirely concurred with the gentleman from New Jersey, that, if the subject was to be commenced anew, the drawback system would be abandoned altogether.

Mr. SMITH said, the first excise was laid in 1794. The same law authorized a drawback of the excise. In 1800, another excise was laid by law, with the same provision as to drawback. This law was repealed in 1817, and with it was repealed the drawback, though this was not intended: for the excise alone was what Congress meant to repeal. In 1818, finding that they had repealed the drawback with the excise, another law was passed on the subject, by which a drawback was allowed of two pounds raw for one of refined sugar.

Mr. WOODBURY replied to Mr. TAZEWELL, and assured him that the drawback did not originate with the excise. In 1797, the Legislature proceeded to allow a drawback, on sugar refined, (extracts from which law Mr. W. read,) and one cent was allowed as an additional drawback on account of the increased duty on sugar exacted by that law. The system began on the theory that the drawback should be equal to the duty, and had been followed up to this time. He did not believe in the fraud on spirits—the law allowing its exportation with benefit of drawback was abolished on account of misapprehension, and he wished to set the merchants of the country right on this subject. Mr. W. then proceeded to reply to some of the arguments of Mr. BENTON; denied that the refiners would receive the large profit which he had named; explained in what their capital did really consist; and denied that their profit was more than two per cent.

He then alluded to the advantages of the drawback system; the great desire there was for the passage of the bill, that our merchants might compete with foreigners to advantage in the South American and Chinese markets, and alleged as a reason that these were the only markets now left us, on account of the liberal policy pursued by France, England, &c. Though the exportation was small at present, he had no doubt of its increase to the amount stated by the Senator from Maryland. He denied and repelled the statements and arguments of the Senator from New Jersey, and accused him of bottoming his calculations on the duties exacted by former tariffs, and not by the tariff law of the last session.

The amendment submitted by Mr. CHANDLER was then agreed to; and the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time, by the following vote:

TUESDAY, January 6, 1829.

The Sinking Fund, &c.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolutions, heretofore submitted by Mr. BENTON, and made the special order for to-day:

"Resolved, That the 5th section of the Sinking Fund act, of 1817, ought to be so amended as to authorize the commissioners of that fund to make purchase of the public debt, at its current market price, whenever, in their opinion, such purchases can be made beneficially for the interest of the United States, and consistently with existing engagements.

"2. That the 4th section of the same act, which authorizes a retention of two millions of surplus revenue in the Treasury, ought to be repealed; and that the first section of the Sinking Fund act of 1790, which directs the whole of the surplus money in the Treasury to be applied to the payment of the public debt, ought to be revived and continued in force.

"3. That the Bank of the United States ought to be required to make a compensation to the people of the United States, for the use of the balances of public money on its hands.

"4. That a public debt is a public burden, and that the present debt of the United States is a burden upon the people of the United States to the amount of more than fifteen millions of dollars per annum; from which they ought to be relieved as soon as possible, and may be relieved in four years, by a "timely" and "judicious" application of the means within the power of Congress.

"5. That an abolition of duties, to the amount of the ten millions of dollars now annually levied on account of the public debt, ought to be made as soon as that debt is paid, and may be made, according to the present indications of the revenue, without diminishing the protection due to any branch of domestic manufactures, and with manifest advantage to the agriculture and commerce of the country.

"6. That the Committee on Finance be directed to prepare and bring in a bill to carry into effect the objects of the first and second of these resolutions."

Mr. BENTON explained their nature and object, and advocated their adoption, in a speech of about two hours, in which he entered very fully into the consideration of each resolution, separately, and enforced the necessity and advantage of agreeing to them all.

The first resolution, he said, related to the 5th section of the Sinking Fund act of 1817, and proposed an amendment to it. This proposal implied a defect in the section as it now stood, and such was the fact. The section, in its present form, confers a limited authority upon the commissioners of that fund to make purchases of the public debt at certain fixed rates, the three per cents at 65 per cent. and other stocks at par; the amendment would give a discretionary authority to the commissioners to make purchases of the same debt at its current market price, whenever, in their opinion, such purchases could be made beneficially for the public interest, and without prejudice to existing engagements. The evil, or mischief, of the section, as it now stood, was, that the three per cent. stock (about 18½ millions) could never be paid off; and that about eight millions of other stocks, for the payment of which the money would be lying in the Treasury in 1831-'32, could not be paid off until 1834-'35. Mr. B. verified these statements by references to laws and facts, and took it upon himself to affirm, that there was no way to prevent an accumulation of near twenty millions of dollars in the Treasury, in the years 1832-'33, to lie there idle, or what was still worse, to be diverted to some subordinate object, while public debt to that amount was unpaid and drawing interest, but to make the amendment which he proposed. The advantage of paying our debt, when we had the money on hand, was too obvious to be insisted upon. Another advantage would be in reducing the price of the three per cent. stock to something nearer the true value of money than what it now bore.

The act of 1817 fixed the value of this stock at 65 per cent., which seems high enough for stock worth but 8 per cent.; but it now ranges at from 80 to 85, with no prospect of falling, while it preserves the character of perpetuity which it now has. This character is abhorrent to American notions of public debt, but it is a favorite with money lenders and stock dealers, and while it continues, the price of the stock will continue out of all fair proportion to the interest and common uses of money. Destroy this character of perpetuity, by adopting the amendment, and this stock will immediately fall, if not to 65, at least to something considerably below 85; and a portion of the public debt, which is now counted at 18½ millions, but which can be purchased in market for about 11 millions, will fall to about 9 millions, and save to the public the difference between that sum and eleven millions. Mr. B. could see no possible objection to an amendment fraught with such manifest advantage, except in the apprehension that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund could not be safely trusted with the discretionary power which it gives them. This he considered as amounting to no objection at all. The discretion was but little, and it was to be vested in a board of eminent men.

It was a discretion to purchase, or not to purchase, about twenty millions of debt, at the current market price. It was a discretion to apply some public money to the payment of the public debt, rather than to let the money lie idle, or be wasted, and the debt run on, carrying interest. This, he thought, vested but little discretion, and such as might be trusted, without danger, to our Commissioners. Who were these Commissioners? Men of the first distinction and obliged to be of the first distinction, of any in the Union. They were Commissioners by virtue of their offices, and these offices among the highest in the country—the Vice President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General. A discretion to purchase the public debt at its market price has always belonged to the Commissioners of the British Sinking Fund, and has never been abused by them. They have exercised it for a hundred years, and over a debt, growing up in that time, from about the present size of our own, to above four thousand millions of dollars; and if this power could be exercised by them so long, and over an amount of debt so vast, and still without abuse, can it be seriously apprehended that there is danger in trusting the like power to our Commissioners for the four brief years which the debt has to last, and over the little remnant of it to which their power would be applicable?

Mr. B. then took up his second resolution, which proposes to repeal the fourth section of the Sinking Fund Act of 1818, and to revive the first section of the Sinking Fund Act of 1790. He stated the defect of the act of 1817 to be in the authority, as it had been construed at the Treasury, to retain two millions of dollars over and above the unapplied balances of appropriations on hand; and the virtue of the act of 1790, in directing all the surplus money on hand, over and above the appropriations, to be applied to the payment of the public debt. The advantage of the section to be revived over the one to be repealed, was clear and indisputable. The argument was contained in the stating of the proposition, and the resolution would have seemed to be free from the possibility of objection, if it had not been objected to when he offered it at the last session. The objection then made was founded upon the supposed necessity of keeping a reserve of two millions on hand to meet the deficiencies of revenue which might arise from disasters to the commerce from which it was derived. This objection is plausible, and respectably supported; but it is unfounded and unsolid, and vanishes upon examination. In the first place, there is no necessity for this reserve of two millions, because there is always an unapplied balance of several millions in the Treasury. These balances are seldom less than three, often as high as six millions. They were stated, in the last Treasury Report, at $5,120,000, on the first day of the present year. These balances result from the nature of daily receipts and daily expenditures, the receipts always preceding the expenditures, by some months. They keep several millions perpetually on hand; then why authorize a retention of two millions more? The Secretary of the Treasury says it has not been retained. I answer, this proves that there is no necessity for an authority to retain it. He says, the authority is discretionary. I answer, there is no necessity for the discretion; that it is an authority which cannot be used for the benefit of the public, and may be used to their prejudice. An authority to retain two millions of surplus money in the Treasury, is an authority to make a gratuitous loan of it to the bank which has the keeping of it, and where it may be used in creating an interest in elections, or at the renewal of a charter adverse to the interests of the people. As a precaution against deficiencies of revenue occasioned by disasters to commerce, the objection is authoritatively condemned by the voice of experience, and the history of our own country for seven and twenty years. These twenty-seven years cover a period of unexampled disasters to commerce—from 1790 to 1817; during which the act of 1790 was in force, and that of 1817, with its precautionary reserve, was unheard of; and during which there was no complaint for want of these two millions. These twenty-seven years covered the period of the mad attacks of the French revolutionary Governments on commerce; the period of the British Orders in Council; of the ruinous decrees of Berlin and Milan; the period of our own embargo, and of our war with England. Such a period of commercial disaster can never be expected again; yet we went through it without this precautionary reserve, and we can certainly make out in future without it. The fact is, the construction at the Treasury is erroneous; instead of authorizing a retention of two millions over and above the unapplied balances, it was intended to limit the money kept to meet these balances to two millions of dollars.

The third resolution was next taken up by Mr. B. and read by him. It imported that the Bank of the United States ought to make compensation to the people of the United States, for the use of the balances of public money on its hands. Before entering upon the consideration of the main question presented in this resolution, Mr. B. said there were two preliminary inquiries necessary to be answered, namely, first, whether, in point of fact, there were any such balances in the Bank, and secondly, whether, in point of law, the people of the United States have a right to require compensation from the Bank for the use of them? Mr. B. held the affirmative of both these inquiries, and would prove his answer to the first of them, by referring to the Treasury report of the last session, made on his own call, showing an average annual amount of public money in the hands of the Bank, from 1817 to the date of the report, of $3,554,756 50; and he would prove his answer to the second of them by reading, as he did read, the 16th section of the Bank charter, the first clause of which directed the Secretary of the Treasury to make deposits of the public money in this Bank; and the second authorized him to remove them at any time that he thought proper. This was decisive. The right to remove the deposits at pleasure, included the right to make terms for letting them remain; and this was precisely what the resolution proposed to do.

The Sinking Fund, &c.

Mr. B. then spoke at considerable length in favor of the fairness, the equity, and the reasonableness of his proposition; and rested the public claim for the compensation he required, on the following prominent facts and powerful considerations:

1. That these balances in Bank were great, being an annual average amount of above three and a half millions of dollars.

2. That they were permanent, having remained in Bank twelve years, and likely to remain there the eight years longer which the charter had to run.

3. That they were virtually Bank capital, and available, as such, for loans or issues of notes.

4. That they required no idle reserve of gold and silver to be kept in Bank to meet them, being themselves payable in the notes of the Bank, though deposited in gold and silver.

5. That the profit to the Bank from their use must have been great, and may have been equal to the highest rate of Bank interest upon the greatest amount of notes issuable upon a capital of three and a half millions of dollars.

6. That the loss to the people of the United States, while paying interest on the public debt, and receiving no interest for the use of these balances in Bank, has been six per cent. per annum, for twelve years, on $3,554,756 50, and may be at the same rate for eight years more, if this resolution is not adopted.

Upon these great facts and considerations, Mr. B. rested his argument of reason, justice, and equity. But he had another argument of authority, example, and precedent; and as this kind of argument always had the greatest weight against the rights and liberties of the people, he would now try the virtue of one in favor of the people. He alluded to what had been done in England, where the Bank, after baffling Mr. Burke for twenty years, was at last brought to terms by Mr. Pitt, and compelled to make compensation for the use of the Government deposits.

For the sake of accuracy in his statements, Mr. B. now had recourse to his books, and took up some volumes of British Parliamentary debates, and read extracts from a report of the Finance Committee of the House of Commons, on the subject of Government balances in the Bank of England; also extracts from the correspondence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank, in relation to these balances; also extracts from a debate in the House of Commons, upon the ratification of the arrangement to which that correspondence led. From these extracts it appeared that the committee of the House ascertained that the average annual amount of Government balances in the hands of the Bank, was about ten millions sterling; that the Bank derived great profit from them; and the committee held it to be right and reasonable that some part of these profits ought to go to the public, to whom the capital belonged, which produced them. The House of Commons was of the same opinion; the Chancellor of the Exchequer also; and of the terms offered by the Bank, either to pay about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually for the use of these balances, or to make a loan of about fifteen millions of dollars without interest, the latter was accepted by the Chancellor, and finally ratified by Parliament, after a debate, in which the sole point was the inadequacy of the compensation. Mr. B. admitted that there was discouragement, as well as encouragement, for him in this example. He was discouraged by seeing that Mr. Burke was baffled for twenty years, and died before the Bank was brought to terms; but he was encouraged by seeing that she was brought to terms at last, though it took a Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister of England—a Pitt, and the son of a Pitt—to bring her to.

Mr. B. took up his fourth resolution, and read it: "That a public debt is a public burthen; that the present debt of the United States is a burthen upon the people of the United States, to the amount of more than fifteen millions of dollars per annum; that the people ought to be relieved from this burthen as soon as possible, and might be relieved from it in four years, by a timely and judicious application of the means in the power of Congress."

He would not waste time upon the general proposition with which the resolution set out, although he knew there were many who disputed that proposition; he would go to the clause which asserted the annual amount of burthen which this debt imposed upon the people to exceed fifteen millions of dollars, and prove it by a statement as brief as it would be plain and intelligible. The annual amount paid on the debt for the last four years averaged about twelve millions of dollars, and he hoped that the payments for the next four would rather exceed than fall short of the same average. This would be admitted to be a burthen to the amount of twelve millions per annum, by all who admitted that taxes were burthens. In the next place, these twelve millions were levied upon the consumption of foreign goods, the averaged duty on which was now fifty per cent., upon which fifty the retail merchant had his profit, as well as upon the cost of the article. It was all cost to him. This profit might average 83½ per cent., especially where the article went through the hands of several sellers. This advance on twelve millions would be four millions, which, together, made sixteen millions, and sustains the words of the resolution. But this is not all. A farther expense attends the collection of these duties, to the amount of about nine hundred thousand dollars per annum more, in salaries, fees, and commissions to the revenue officers. This also comes out of the pockets of the people, and contributes to swell far above the statement in the resolution, the annual burthen which the people bear on account of the public debt.

That this debt can be paid off in four years by a "timely" and "judicious" application of the means in the power of Congress, was a proposition susceptible of the clearest demonstration. Its nominal amount was fifty-eight millions, its real amount about forty-nine millions, after deducting seven millions for stock in the United States Bank, and two millions more for the difference between the nominal amount, and the market price of the 8 per cent. stock. The adoption of the first resolution offered by Mr. B. would probably sink the market price of this stock one or two millions lower by destroying its character of perpetuity, and then the actual debt would be but forty-seven millions. But, even at forty-three millions, it can be paid off in four years, by applying the twelve millions which will go to the principal and interest, to the principal alone, and raising the interest from accelerated sales of the public lands. This was what was intended by a "timely" and "judicious" application of the means in the power of Congress; words which were borrowed from the first Message of President Washington to Congress, and enforced by the first and ablest of all the Secretaries of the Treasury, but which had never yet been acted upon by Congress. At this part of his argument, Mr. B. took the following bold positions:

1. That one hundred millions of acres of land sold, near forty years ago, at an average of twenty cents per acre, as recommended by General Hamilton, would have been worth sixty millions of dollars to the people, by extinguishing twenty millions of debt, and stopping the payment of forty millions in interest.

2. That all the land sold by the Federal Government has not been worth one cent to the people, the amount received from sales being swallowed up in expenses, or lost in interest upon the capital of land unsold, while paying interest upon the capital of the debt unpaid.

3. That the sale of the eighty millions of land to which his graduation bill was applicable, would raise, at an average of twenty-five cents per acre, twenty millions of dollars in four years, the one-half of which would pay the interest on the public debt, and the other half would give to all the neglected States their proportionate shares of the amount expended in the favored States on works of internal improvement.

Mr. B.'s fifth resolution related to the abolition of duties, and imported that duties to the amount of the ten millions of dollars now annually levied on account of the public debt, ought to be abolished as soon as that debt was paid, and might be abolished, according to the present indications of the revenue, without diminishing the protection due to any branch of domestic industry, and with great advantage to the agriculture and commerce of the country.

Mr. B. went on to say, that this resolution presented a great question to the consideration of the Senate and American people. It was a question in the decision of which, above all others, the vote of the Representative ought to be governed by the will of the constituent. It was a question to the consideration of which the attention of the people ought to be worked up, and worked up in time to know what their Representatives were about, before a final decision might be made to their prejudice. With this view, he had brought forward the question at the last session of Congress; with this view he brought it forward now; and for the same purpose he should bring it forward at the next session, if his resolution was not adopted at the present one.

The first clause of the resolution asserts that duties ought to be abolished to the amount of ten millions of dollars, the instant the public debt is paid off. I know there are many who think differently, who are of opinion that the duties ought to be kept up, and the amount expended by Congress in works of internal improvement; but my mind is clear and decisive in favor of the abolition. There will be enough for internal improvement without these ten millions, which now go, not to that object, but to the public debt. I am for the abolition, because I am opposed to all taxation not required for the necessary support of the Government. I am against raising money by taxes, either for accumulation in the vaults of the Treasury, or for repartition among the people. What is attempted to be kept in the Treasury would be wasted; a partition could never be fairly made; a majority of the payers would never get back their own. The pockets of the people are the best treasuries which the Government can have for its spare revenues. They are the safest; for every citizen is the keeper of his own. They are the cheapest, for these keepers have no salaries; they are the most beneficial, for they are the only treasuries of which the keeper may always use the contents without blame, and with profit to himself and the country.

The Sinking Fund, &c.

[SENATE.]

I am for the abolition, because the sum is great in itself, and raised at still greater expense to the people. The levy of ten millions for the Government cost upwards of fifteen millions to the people. It is a mistake of the present day, founded upon what was fact thirty years ago, to suppose that taxation by duties is the cheapest way of levying money from the people. This was true when the average duties were seven and a half per cent., and when the addition of that amount to the value of the article made no sensible addition to its cost. But all this is now changed. The average duties are now 50 per cent., and this adds one-half to the cost of the article; the merchant's profit is thirty-three and a third per cent. on this duty of 50, and that adds a third more to it. Fees, salaries, and commissions, are then paid besides to the revenue officers to the annual amount of near nine hundred thousand dollars more. The effect of all these per cents, fees, and salaries, is, that it now costs the people nearly two dollars to raise one dollar for the Government, and this load is increased upon some, by the fact that smugglers, and dealers with smugglers, pay nothing. A levy of twelve millions for the public debt, now occasions a levy of more than fifteen, and nearly twenty millions upon the people; a rate of expense for collection out of all proportion to the revenue raised, exceeded in no country upon earth but in England, and from which the people, in the language of the resolution, ought to be relieved as soon as possible.

I am for the abolition, because the wielding of ten millions of surplus revenue would dangerously increase the patronage of the Federal Government. This sum is now mortgaged to the payment of the public debt, and its application to that object being fixed and regular, involves the exercise of but little patronage. Released from that mortgage, it would be applicable to innumerable objects, and subject to the annual appropriation by Congress. Its distribution would attract all eyes, and excite universal cupidity. It would draw deputations from cities, towns, and villages, from companies and corporations, from counties, States, and districts, to the feet of the Federal Government, all clamorous for their share of the spoil, or neglecting their own business to obtain it, and all becoming less independent in proportion as they received it—like the degenerate Romans, who ceased to be free when they began to look to the public granaries, instead of their own cribs, for a supply of corn.

I am for the abolition, because an annual scramble on the floors of Congress for ten millions of dollars, would fill our halls with bargains, combinations, intrigue, and corruption. The effect would be inevitable. Help my State to half a million, and I will help yours to another half. A majority of the members might meet beforehand, and divide the whole among their own States. They might do worse. They might insert appropriations for roads and canals, in States whose Representatives denied the constitutionality of such appropriations, and thus subject them to the censure of their constituents, for not taking a share while it was going. In this way, the delegation of a State might be rendered obnoxious to their constituents, and broken down at home by a manœuvre here. Is this fancy, or is it fact? exclaimed Mr. B. It is fact, and the history of our legislation proves it. Within the last three years the manœuvre was tried. A bill came up from the House of Representatives with appropriations for internal improvement for a majority of the States, including some whose delegations could not vote for such objects. The bill passed through this chamber, and became a law; but the design against the members failed. A kindly feeling prevailed. The yeas and nays were not called. The bill went through without noise, and the obnoxious voters were not pointed out to their constituents. This may be attempted again, upon a greater scale, and with a more determined intent, if ten millions are to be annually divided out.

I am for the abolition, because the annual division of ten millions of dollars would fill this Union with discord and violence. The division of money and property is the fruitful source of discord throughout the world. It is the bane of partnerships, the rock on which the peace of families is split, and the signal for strife and contention amongst confederates and conquerors. So sung the poet of nature:

—“Friends now fast sworn,
Whose double bosoms seem but one heart to bear,
Who twine, as 'twere, in love inseparable,
Shall, within this hour, upon dissension of a doit,
Break out to bitterest enmity.”

Yes, break out to bitterest enmity upon dissension of a farthing! With how much greater bitterness, then, when the dissension is for millions, when the parties are whole communities, their passions inflamed by association, no common superior to decide between them, an individual shame lost in the mass of undistinguished multitudes! The last thing that any friend to the peace, the harmony, the stability of the Union, would wish to see, would be an annual scramble on the floor of Congress for ten millions of dollars. We shall have heart-burnings enough in distributing the two or three millions of surplus revenue which will remain without these ten millions, and in scrambling for the countless millions of the public land.

I am for the abolition, because it will be the means of restoring the harmony of this Union, now greatly impaired by a tariff, which sits hard upon the navigating and planting interests of the country. An abolition of ten millions of duties will relieve these interests, without injuring any other; and thus an angry question will drop from our discussions, and every cloud of discontent will vanish from our horizon.

The last branch of this resolution declares, that this abolition may be made, according to present indications of the revenue, without detriment to domestic industry, and with great advantage to agriculture and commerce. On this point my remarks will be few and brief. They are abridged, and almost superseded by the labors of the last session. This subject, upon a resolution of my own, was referred to the Committee of Finance twelve months ago. That committee reported a list of thirty-two articles, estimated to yield a revenue of seven and a quarter millions, on which the duties might be repealed without injury to domestic industry; seven other articles, whose product could not be then ascertained, and six more on which the drawback for the last year exceeded the revenue, but which, in a run of several years, yield a considerable sum. This makes forty-five articles, and to these I think about fifteen more might be added. But I omit these fifteen. I take the forty-five* reported by the committee, and say that they will yield the ten millions in four years from this time. They yield a million and a half more now than was estimated by the committee. Three of them alone exceed that estimate by eight hundred and thirty thousand dollars. But this is a detail, and a subordinate inquiry. If we agree in the great principle of abolition, there will be no balk about a few articles, or a few thousands of dollars more or less. The benefit to agriculture and commerce would be great and immediate from this abolition. Free trade is their delight and element, and this abolition of duties would set the half of our trade free. A few examples will illustrate its benefit. We have a growing trade with France, of which the chief articles on our part are cotton and tobacco; on her part, silks and wines. She took from us last year seventy millions of pounds of cotton, and thirty thousand hogsheads of tobacco. An abolition of duties on silks and wines will increase our purchases of those articles, and her purchases of our cotton and tobacco, and require a great increase of ships for their transportation. The same of the West India trade. We have a great trade with these islands; the chief articles on our part, beef, pork, flour, corn, corn meal, whiskey, bacon, and lumber; and hers, coffee and specie, of which they sent us last year fifty millions of pounds of the former, and two millions two hundred thousand dollars of the latter. Our duty on coffee is five cents a pound, more than half of the first cost of the article. Abolish it, and we shall take double the quantity of coffee, and greatly increase our exports of provisions and imports of specie.

Mr. B. had now finished his exposition of the reasons and policy of his resolutions. He had spoken to them all at once, but they could be discussed separately, on the motion of any Senator; the vote, of course, would be on each separate resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved the reference of the first resolution to the Committee of Finance. He said, that the subject was one that required much consideration; that he had applied some of his leisure hours to satisfy himself on the subject; that he had not yet perfected his inquiries. So far as he had gone had convinced him that the Senator (Mr. BENTON) was mistaken. If referred to the committee, the subject would be fully investigated, and he believed it would be shown, that there would be of debt, (redeemable at the pleasure of the Government,) sufficient, with the interest annually payable, to absorb the whole of the ten millions of dollars which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were authorized by law to apply annually to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt. He had, he said, completed his inquiry for the years 1829 and 1830, and could state that there were of six and five per cent., redeemable during those years, a sum which, with the interest accruing for those years, would amount to $22,878,639; the payment to be made for those two years, agreeably to law, was twenty millions, which would leave a surplus, payable in 1831, of $2,878,639. He trusted, he said, that he had satisfied the Senate, that, during the years 1829 and 1830, there were of stocks redeemable, and of interest payable, an amount amply sufficient to satisfy the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund for those two years. He added, that he was not yet prepared to give a statement respecting the years 1831 and 1832, but if the resolution should be committed, he hoped, and believed, that he would be able to show that, without any authority to purchase, the whole or nearly the whole of the 6, 5, and 4½ per cent. debts, (Bank debt excepted,) might be paid off in 1832.

Mr. S. concluded by offering the following as an amendment to the first clause of the resolution:

Strike out the first clause, and insert—

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to purchase, at its current market price, the public debt, whenever, in their opinion, such purchases can be made beneficially for the interests of the United States, and consistently with existing engagements."

MONDAY, January 12.

Protest of the Legislature of Georgia against the Tariff Act of 1828.

The Chair communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Georgia, transmitting the following Protest of the Legislature of that State :

"STATE OF GEORGIA.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Milledgeville, December 30th, 1828.

Sir: The enclosed protest is transmitted to you, to be laid before the Senate of the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

HON. JOHN C. CALHOUN,
Vice President of the United States."

"From a painful conviction that a manifestation of the public sentiment, in the most imposing and impressive form, is called for by the present agitated state of the Southern section of the Union, the General Assembly of the State of Georgia have deemed it their duty to adopt the novel expedient of addressing, in the name of the State, the Senate of the Congress of the United States.

"In her sovereign character, the State of Georgia protests against the act of the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports,' as deceptive in its title, fraudulent in its pretexts, oppressive in its exactions, partial and unjust in its operations, unconstitutional in its well-known objects, ruinous to commerce and agriculture—to secure a hateful monopoly to a combination of importunate manufacturers.

"Demanding the repeal of an act which has already disturbed the Union and endangered the public tranquillity, weakened the confidence of whole States in the Federal Government, and diminished the affection of large masses of the people to the Union itself, and the abandonment of the degrading system which considers the people as incapable of wisely directing their own enterprise; which sets up the servants of the people in Congress as the exclusive judges of what pursuits are most advantageous and suitable for those by whom they were elected, the State of Georgia expects that, in perpetual testimony thereof, the deliberate and solemn expression of her opinion will be carefully preserved among the archives of the Senate; and in justification of her character to the present generation, and to posterity, if, unfortunately, Congress, disregarding the protest, and continuing to pervert powers granted for clearly defined and well-understood purposes, to effectuate objects never intended by the great parties by whom the constitution was framed, to be entrusted to the controlling guardianship of the Federal Government, should render necessary measures of a decisive character, for the protection of the people of the State, and the vindication of the Constitution of the United States.

IRBY HUDSON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THOMAS STOCKS,

JOHN FORSYTH, Governor."

Mr. BERRIEN said, that the annunciation made from the Chair, imposed a duty on his colleague and himself, which, with his assent, he would perform, by giving a direction, with the sanction of the Senate, to the document which had been just announced. I am not willing, sir, said Mr. B., to see an act so grave and interesting in its character, pass away with those mere every day events which are forgotten almost in the instant of their occurrence. In order, therefore, that it may be distinctly presented to the notice of the Senate, before I submit the motion which it calls for, I will state its purport, and avail myself of the occasion to make a very brief remark.

That document, sir, of which an official copy has been transmitted to my colleague and myself, is the protest of the State of Georgia, made through her constitutional organs, to this assembly of the Representatives of States, against the "act in alteration of the several acts laying duties on imports," passed at the late session of the Congress of the United States. In her sovereign character, as one of the original members of this Confederacy, by whom this Government was called into existence, that State protests against this act, on the several grounds which are specifically set forth, in that instrument, which is attested by the signatures of her Legislative and Executive functionaries, and authenticated under her public seal.

It is now delivered to this Department of the Federal Government, to be deposited in its archives, in perpetuum rei memoriam, to serve whenever the occasion may require it, as an authentic testimony of the solemn dissent of one of the sovereign States of this Union from the act therein protested against, as an infraction of the constitutional compact by which she is united to the other members of this Confederacy.

It is difficult, sir, to repress—it is, perhaps, still more difficult appropriately to express the feelings which belong to such an occasion as the present. I have been educated in sentiments of reverence for our Federal Union, and, through life, I have habitually cherished these sentiments. As an individual citizen, therefore, it is painful to recur to that disastrous policy which has imposed on the State in which I live the stern necessity of assuming this relation to the Government of this Confederacy.

As one of the Representatives on this floor of that State, whose citizens have always been forward to manifest a profound and devoted attachment to this Union—of a patriotic and gallant people, who would freely yield their treasure and unsparingly shed their blood in its defence; the occasion is one of deep and unmingled humiliation, which demands the deposit, in the registry of the Senate, of this record of their wrongs. There may be those, sir, who will look to this act with indifference, perhaps with levity; who will consider it as the result of momentary excitement; and see, or think they see in it, merely the effusion of impassioned, but evanescent feeling. I implore those gentlemen not to deceive themselves on a subject in relation to which error may be alike dangerous to us all.

Forty years of successful experiment have proved the efficiency of this Government to sustain us in an honorable intercourse with the other nations of the world. Externally, in peace and in war, amid the fluctuations of commerce, and the strife of arms, it has protected our interests, and defended our rights. One trial, one fearful trial, yet remains to be made. It is one, under the apprehension of which the bravest may tremble—which the wise and the good will anxiously endeavor to avoid. It is that experiment which shall test the competency of this Government to preserve our internal peace, whenever a question vitally affecting the bond, which unites us as one people, shall come to be solemnly agitated between the sovereign members of this Confederacy. In proportion to its dangers should be our solicitude to avoid it, by abstaining on the one hand from acts of doubtful legislation, as well as by the manner of resistance on the other, to those which are deemed unconstitutional. Between the independent members of this Confederacy, sir, there can be no common arbiter. They are necessarily remitted to their own sovereign will, deliberately expressed, in the exercise of those reserved rights of sovereignty, the delegation of which would have been an act of political suicide. The designation of such an arbiter, sir, was, by the force of invincible necessity, casus omissus among the provisions of a constitution conferring limited powers, the interpretation of which was to be confided to the subordinate agents, created by those who were entrusted to administer it.

I earnestly hope, that the wise and conciliatory spirit of this Government, and of those of the several States, will postpone, to a period far distant, the day which will summon us to so fearful a trial. If we are indeed doomed to encounter it, I as earnestly hope that it may be entered upon in the spirit of peace, and with cherished recollections of former amity. But the occasion which shall impel the sovereign people of even one of the members of this Confederacy to resolve, that they are not bound by its acts, is one to which no patriot can look with levity, nor yet with indifference. Whatever men and freemen may do to avert it, the people of Georgia will do. Deeply as they feel the wrongs which they suffer, they will yet bear and forbear. Though their complaints have been hitherto disregarded, and their remonstrances have been heretofore set at nought, they will still look with confidence to the returning justice of this Government.

I fulfil my duty, sir, on this occasion, with a cherished reliance on that justice; with a deep and abiding conviction of the patriotism and forbearance of that people by whom it is demanded; with an humble but unwavering trust in the mercy of Heaven.

On motion, by Mr. BERRIEN, the letter and protest were ordered to be printed, for the use of the Senate.

The Sinking Fund, &c.

The Senate took up for consideration the resolutions heretofore offered by Mr. BENTON, relative to the Sinking Fund, the Public Debt, the Bank of the United States, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, withdrew his amendment, and moved to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SANFORD said he was satisfied that it was expedient to adopt the first of the resolutions of the gentleman from Missouri. We have now, said he, about fifty millions of debt, and the whole of it, excepting the three per cent. debt, may be discharged in three or four years. What is to be done with the three per cents, amounting to more than thirteen millions of dollars? Is this part of the debt to be perpetual? His own opinion was, that this, like every other portion of the debt, should be extinguished, as soon and as fast as possible. How is the three per cent. debt, then, to be extinguished? Certainly, in no other way than by payment or purchase. We must either pay the full nominal amount, or we must purchase this debt from its holders. The highest market price to which this debt has risen is eighty-five per cent.; the fluctuations of the market, for a long time past, having been between eighty and eighty-five per cent.; and the medium rate of the market being, perhaps, about eighty-three per cent. By the restriction now in force, under the law of 1817, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are not permitted to purchase this debt, when its market price exceeds sixty-five per cent. None has been purchased; and none will ever be purchased, while this restriction continues. To provide for the payment of this debt, or to declare our purpose to pay it, would elevate the debt to par; but to give an authority to purchase would not much advance the market price of this debt. Such an authority ought to be, and would be, exercised very cautiously and slowly. This debt is widely diffused, and much of it is held in Europe. So long as it is an annuity of indefinite duration, its value is governed by the market rate of interest, and it cannot rise much above its present market rate; since, at a higher rate, it would afford an interest lower than the lowest market rate of interest in the world. So long, therefore, as the final discharge of the capital of this annuity is indefinitely distant, the capital itself will probably never rise to ninety per cent. in the market. As it is clearly our interest to buy this debt rather than to pay it; as the greater part of this debt is held by persons who have no desire to sell it; as the portions offered in the market, from time to time, are small; and, as it would be inexpedient to raise the market, by offering higher prices than the current rates; it is necessary, if we intend to purchase, to begin and to proceed with all the caution of discreet buyers. There can be no doubt that an authority in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to purchase at market rates would be judiciously exercised by them. If this operation shall be commenced, until all the other portions of the public debt shall be paid, our situation may, and probably will, be that, with means in the Treasury fully equal to the discharge of this debt of thirteen millions, we shall be obliged either to postpone its payment, or to pay it at par, or to purchase it upon terms far less advantageous to the public than may be made by gradual and progressive purchases. There can be no doubt, that, by a judicious course of purchases of this debt, a very large sum may be saved to the public.

Mr. BAXTON called for a division of the question, so that the Senate might decide separately on each clause of the resolution; which was agreed to.

Mr. B. then stated, that he was opposed to sending his resolutions to the Finance Committee, as mere resolutions of inquiry. He had sent them to that committee, in that form, at the last session, and had them returned, like a bill of indictment ignored by the grand jury. He did not think it worth while to send them, through the same process, a second time. He was for discussing them here, as he had a right to do, under the rules of the Senate, which it was proper to do on many occasions, and doubly proper on this occasion, when the question which grew out of his resolutions was one of principle, not of detail, and when the committee had once shown themselves to be unfavorable. He was glad to see the Senator from New York (Mr. SANFORD) on his side. He had not expected to argue these questions, but only to turn the attention of others to them, who were more conversant than himself with subjects of finance. His walk lay in a different field—among the public lands, the military and the Indian affairs. As for the finances, the Public Debt, the Sinking Fund, the abolition of duties, and the balances in the hands of the Bank, they were all subjects out of his range, and, in moving certain resolutions about them, at the last session, he thought he had nothing to do but to put the ball in motion. But quite the contrary he had found to be the fact. The ball soon stopped, or rather rolled back upon him; and, as he was not a man to give up when he thought himself right, he had now done what he pledged himself to do, at the last session—he had started the ball again, and meant to keep it a-going. He was rejoiced to see the Senator from New York (Mr. SANFORD) taking part with him even on one branch of his resolutions.

Mr. DICKERSON said he did not rise to oppose the reference of the subject to the Committee on Finance; yet he was not willing to adopt the resolution, and give the discretionary power to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund which was proposed. It certainly was desirable to extinguish the public debt, as soon as a due regard to the general interest would permit. It will be highly gratifying to proclaim to the world that we are out of debt. To purchase up the debt would be to incur a heavy loss; we cannot gratify ourselves in this particular, without paying too dearly for the gratification. The gentleman from New York (Mr. SANFORD) had stated truly, that the creditors in Europe owned a very considerable portion of the stock of the United States, and had remarked that the three per cent. stock might be purchased at $3 or 85 per cent. But the fact was, that, if we purchased at 85, we should lose two millions, and, if at its nominal value, four millions of dollars. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are now authorized to purchase this stock at $65 for the hundred, which is considered its par value; the whole, at that rate, would amount to something more than eight and a half millions of dollars; if we purchase it at $85 the hundred, the present market price, it will cost us more than eleven millions of dollars; and, of course, we should incur a loss of more than two and a half millions; and, if we redeem it at its nominal value, we shall incur a loss of more than four and a half millions; and this to be taken from our Treasury, and a considerable part of it put into the pockets of stockjobbers in Europe. What would be the consequence of going into the market, and purchasing the public debt, as proposed? Why, our stock in Europe, as well as at home, would immediately take a rise, and its value would be considerably increased. The argument of the gentleman from Missouri, relative to British stocks, would not avail in this country: for the price of our stock will certainly be increased with the increased demand for it, should a law be passed as proposed; and, if the price for the three per cents should be fixed at 85, it would immediately rise above it; and, the moment we resolve to purchase up the debt, or to redeem it as soon as proposed, it would rise to its nominal value, and we should have to pay dollar for dollar. Thus, no benefit would arise to the United States, but much to the holders of the stock. The Sinking Fund, he contended, was merely a resolution to pay ten millions a year of the public debt; it was never contemplated to buy up stock to any great extent, nor was it ever expected that it would have that effect. The Sinking Fund had answered all the purposes expected from it, one of which was to keep up the price of United States stock, and had fully accomplished the object of its creation. The three per cent. stock may be continued for years, under an arrangement, and not felt as a burthen by the community; and, if gentlemen entertained the opinion, that the debt might, with safety, be reduced more rapidly than at present, a power could be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase as occasions offered, which would answer every reasonable purpose. He would leave the matter to the Committee on Finance, so far as an inquiry into the expediency of the measure was concerned; but he could not, as at present impressed, vote for the passage of the proposed law; at least, so far as he was concerned, he thought the inquiry by the committee should precede the passage of the law.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that, having made the motion, it was incumbent on him to say a few words on the subject. He then took an extended view of the funding system, from its commencement. He said, that the old six per cents had been considered irredeemable, except by the payment of eight per cent. per annum, on every certificate for one hundred dollars; that, in the year 1802, Congress passed an act, appropriating the sum of $7,300,000, to be paid annually to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be applied by them to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt; and, on the purchase of Louisiana, an addition was made to that fund of $700,000, making the whole fund eight millions—that the system operated well. It enabled the Treasury to pay off with the surplus funds the debt due to Holland; but that debt being paid off, a large surplus would have remained in the Treasury, inapplicable to any object, until the eight per cents, contracted in Mr. Adams' administration, should become payable, which was, he believed, in 1809. To obviate that difficulty, a proposal was made, in 1806, he believed, to the holders of the six per cent. debt, and acquiesced in by them, that, in lieu of the stock held by them, payable, as already stated, by eight dollars annually on the 100 dollars, they should receive a new stock for the balances due to them, bearing an interest of six per cent., and redeemable at pleasure. That arrangement enabled the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to apply, annually, the whole of the eight millions, and the old six per cents have been paid off many years (he believed nine) sooner than could have been done under the previous system.

The late war involved the United States in a large debt, he believed, exceeding one hundred and twenty millions of dollars; and a new law passed, on the 3d of March, 1817, which appropriated ten millions of dollars, annually, to be applied to the payment of the interest and principal of the debt. The system has operated as well as its most sanguine friends could have contemplated. It is due to Mr. LOWNDES, then Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It has nearly paid off the whole of the debt, and will, without any extraneous aid, discharge nearly the whole (the three per cents and Bank debt excepted) in the year 1832.

But, said Mr. S., we are told that we cannot pay the debt, except by purchase. Why? Because the Senator (Mr. BENTON) assures us, "that there was no way to prevent an accumulation of near twenty millions of dollars in the Treasury, in the years 1832 and 1833, to lie there idle, (or rather in the Bank,) or, what was worse, to be directed to some subordinate object, while public debt to that amount was unpaid, and drawing interest."

If, said Mr. S., the Senator be correct in his assertion, then it is indispensably necessary that the Senate should adopt some measure to prevent so great an evil. If, however, he should have been mistaken in his calculations, and, if it can be shown that there will be of debt redeemable nearly sufficient to absorb the ten millions at the disposition of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and the small deficiency can be supplied, without the necessity of having recourse to purchase; and, if it can be shown that nearly the whole, perhaps the whole, of the debt will be paid off before the year 1833, then the authority to purchase the 4½, 5, and 6 per cents will be wholly unnecessary. Mr. S. said, that he hoped to satisfy the Senate on all those points. It had been, he said, the practice of his long life to have recourse to figures, on all similar subjects; not, he said, to figures of speech or rhetoric, but to arithmetical figures. He could rely on them for truth, and would proceed to state the ground on which he relied with confidence.

The debt, he said, amounted, on the 1st of January, to $58,862,125; deduct therefrom the Bank debt and the three per cent., amounting together to $20,296,249, and there will remain a debt of 6, 5, and 4½ per cents of $38,065,886, which, he expected, might nearly be discharged in the year 1832, perhaps entirely.

Mr. S. proceeded and said, that there will be redeemable, in 1829 and 1830, an amount of six and five per cents redeemable at pleasure, which, with the interest on the whole debt, will make together the sum of $22,553,179, being $2,553,179 more than the twenty millions applicable by the Commissioners to the payment of the debt and interest for those two years. That unpaid balance, Mr. S. said, would be paid in 1831, which, together with stock, redeemable in that year, bearing an interest of 4½ and 5 per cent., would, with the interest payable in that year, afford an amount, redeemable and payable, of $15,353,824; in that year, the Commissioners would, of course, pay the ten millions, and there would then remain a balance, to be paid in 1832, of $5,353,824. Here, Mr. S. stated separately the amount of the several stocks that became redeemable, during the year 1831, and the amount of interest payable; he also said, that it was proper for him to inform the Senate that $10,999,000 of those stocks were not redeemable until the 31st of December of that year, of course, that there would only be a little more than $2,600,000 that the debtor could be compelled to receive, on the 1st of July, the time at which the semi-annual payment is generally made; but, as more than six millions of that stock was held by the Bank of the United States, he could not doubt that the Board of Directors would readily consent to relinquish so much as would be necessary to complete the usual payment of five millions, in July. He did not doubt, he said, for he believed they were well disposed to do any thing in their power to accommodate the Government. It was greatly their interest to be on the best terms with the Treasury. The inconvenience would be trifling; besides, they would know, that, unless they did accommodate, the Commissioners would be compelled to redeem a part of the seven millions Bank debt.

The Sinking Fund, &c.

Mr. S. then said, that he hoped that he had satisfied the Senate that there were more than sufficient of stock redeemable and interest payable, during the years 1829, 1830, and 1831, to absorb the thirty millions applicable, during those years, to the payment of the debt, and that there would be no unemployed money in the Treasury or Bank during those years.

The balance unpaid, in 1831, said Mr. S., of $5,353,824, would be paid, in 1832, which, with the stock redeemable in that year, and the interest to be paid, would together make the sum of $8,896,779; being about a million less than the ten millions in the hands of the Commissioners; which million would, he conceived, be relinquished by the Bank from the stock it held in the loan, due on the 31st December, 1834, for reasons similar to those he had already given; indeed, he said, he felt certain that they would accommodate the Treasury, without hesitation.

Mr. S. proceeded, and said, that he trusted that he had satisfied the Senate, that, instead of twenty millions lying in the Treasury unapplied, whilst a debt was unpaid, bearing interest, there would not be one dollar. It was, however, proper for him to state, that there would still remain a small debt of about two millions, redeemable in 1833, and another, of a little more, in 1834; but that they were not of importance, and would be paid without being felt; that it was possible the whole of those debts might, by management, and an increase of revenue, be paid in 1832. If not, it ought not to deter us from repealing the duties on articles which now give a revenue of eight, perhaps ten millions; but, on that subject we could act more advisedly at the next session, when we should better know the effect of the last tariff. For himself, he was decidedly of opinion that duties to that amount ought to be repealed, and, in the recess, he would prepare a bill with a view to that object, which he thought he could submit early in the session. But he was unwilling to touch the subject during the present session, for it was one that required time and great consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said he would reply to the first resolution, which proposes to authorize the purchase of the public debt in the market. He said he thought it premature to pass a law at this session, which must be in-operative for two years to come, and which would, in effect, supersede all other modes of employing the public money, whatever might be the future opinion of Congress.

Mr. J. remarked, that we should have ample employment for our funds during 1829 and 1830. He said there was redeemable, during the present year, 16,279,822 dollars of stock, bearing six per cent., and there was a stock of 1,582,836 dollars, of four and a half per cent., payable half this year and half the next; which, with the accruing interest, will make a sum nearly equal to the Sinking Fund of ten millions, for two years. This stock bears a high rate of interest, and above the market rate of money, and which it is the interest of the Treasury to pay as soon as possible.

In the year 1831 there will be no stocks redeemable, and consequently, we may calculate on ten or twelve millions of dollars in that year, for which Congress must provide before that time arrives. But, he said, it appeared to him too soon now to provide for the purchase of stocks, which could not be effected under two years. While one gentleman proposes to purchase our stocks in the market, another suggests the expediency of dividing this sum among the several States; another claims a portion of it for great national improvements; another thinks that will be a proper time to commence a reduction of the duties. The public mind is not yet sufficiently formed and expressed on these propositions. We require facts, and time for deliberation. The next will be a long session, and we shall then have the benefit of a full discussion; and the session after 1830-'31, will be in good time to decide what ought to be done with the revenue of 1831.

The gentleman from Missouri proposes now to pass a law to authorize, at that time, the purchase of the stock. This may become the most judicious application of the money, but it is premature, and unnecessary now to give the authority. When we go into the market, we may not be able to buy our stock at its par value; indeed, we know we must pay more; and the very fact of going into the market to purchase so large a sum will raise the price. It will be advisable, at the next session, to ascertain what can be done in the market, with the fund holders, to legislate advisedly—upon that information my opinion will be formed. Mr. J. said the gentleman has suggested the propriety of purchasing the thirteen millions of three per cents. The propriety of that must depend on the price at which they could be bought. If they must be purchased at par, that is, 100 for 100, then we dispose of our money for three per cent., which we are not prepared to do for the present. The three per cents are now selling at 85 on the 100, that is, equal to an investment at $3 58 per cent., which is less than the market rate of interest. This arises chiefly from the fact, that this stock will, before many years, be paid off at 100, when the holders will realize 15 dollars on each share, which will bring the stock to 4 or 4½ per cent., equal to the value of money in the market. The price of this stock is now estimated at 100 for 100, in making a calculation of its value. This stock could not be purchased at 85, because the holders now see it will ere long be redeemed, and, when redeemed, must be taken at 100.

Mr. J. explained how the average balances in the Bank had been so large; which was owing to several large sums lying over, unemployed, which would never occur again; that portions of this sum were in transitu from place to place; that the Bank could not employ its capital, much less avail itself of the use of these balances. It is known that about sixteen millions of the revenue is received in New York, where the capital of the Branch does not exceed two millions five hundred thousand dollars, and where the discounts do not exceed four to five millions. The gentleman proposes to make the Bank pay interest for these uncertain balances, which, at most, are only unapplied balances of appropriations.

Mr. J. said, the Bank has given us $1,500,000 for the bonus, the interest on which alone would exceed the interest due on the balances. Besides this, they receive and pay out, without compensation for the labor or the risk on the exchange, more than twenty millions a year. The Bank will tell you to use your money, if you desire to draw it, in any way or at any time; but that they cannot pay the interest, because they cannot employ it. Mr. J. said, that Mr. Crawford was induced, in 1821, to give the loan (among other reasons) to the Bank, because they could not employ their funds, of which we were a large stockholder. Mr. J. said, we had a large equivalent from the Bank in the safety and management of our funds for the use of the balances. We ought to deal justly with them. If they pay us the interest, which will not exceed $150,000 a year, we must pay them a reasonable compensation for their services. Mr. J. concluded by saying, the proposition now submitted was, in his judgment, premature, and the law unnecessary.

Mr. BENTON had a remark to make in reply to the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. JOHNSON,) which was, that all these statements about the amount and use of the balances would come much better when they came officially, as he hoped they would, from the President of the Bank. With respect to the amount of actual balances, of which he had only exhibited the average, he presumed the Senate would soon have an opportunity of seeing them, as they had been called for by a resolution of the Senate. Their amount would then be seen to be great, astonishingly great. He differed from the gentleman as to the proper time for this debate. He did not think it premature; on the contrary, it was hardly early enough. He himself had begun, about a year ago, to call the attention of the people to the great subject of extinguishing the public debt, and abolishing ten millions of duties. The subject was just beginning to take root in the public mind, and there was now hardly time for the people to think, to make up their minds, and to make known their minds, before Congress would have to act. The subject was one of vast consequence in principle, and of great extent in detail. The Committee of Finance had reported forty-five articles on which duties might be abolished without injury to domestic industry. He, Mr. B., would add fifteen articles more, of which two, namely, blankets and strouds, for the Indian trade, were of the first moment to his constituents engaged in the fur trade; and three others, namely, tin, copper, and brass, in plates or sheets, fit for manufacturing here, were of great moment to the numerous manufacturers of these articles, and to the still more numerous class who use the articles after they are manufactured. The payment of the debt, and the consequent abolition of duties, will be the test of new parties. None will stand up openly for the continuance of the debt; but innumerable operations will be carried on to diminish the revenue, or to squander it; the effect, if not the object of which, will be to perpetuate the debt. He, Mr. B., was against partial reductions of duty to diminish the revenue and to continue the debt, to relieve one part of the community, and leave the burthens upon another; he was for abolition, when the whole list could be taken up.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TUESDAY, January 13.

Distribution of the Revenue.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, took up the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required, under such regulations as he may think proper to prescribe, to divide annually among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of direct taxation, all moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, on the first day of June next, and on the first day of June in every succeeding year.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, of the annual sum of ten millions of dollars appropriated to the sinking fund by the second section of the act of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt,' five millions be appropriated to the fund to be divided among the States, as by the first section of this act, annually, after the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine; and that so much of the residue of the said annual sum of ten millions of dollars, as shall not, on the first day of June of any year, have been applied to the redemption of the public debt, shall be appropriated to the fund to be divided among the States as aforesaid."

Mr. DICKERSON (who introduced the bill) arose and said, that, two years ago, when this subject was under discussion, he endeavored to show the necessity of providing, in time, for the proper direction of our funds—when our public debt shall be paid; when the great works for national defence shall be completed; and when the demands upon our Treasury, growing out of the consequences of the revolutionary and late wars, shall be reduced to a small amount. He then endeavored to show that, whatever system should be adopted for this purpose, it ought to commence before the entire extinguishment of the public debt: and he further attempted to show the extreme danger of a large surplus in our Treasury, unless subject to some well-digested and previously settled regulation for its disposal.

I thought then, as I do now, said Mr. D., that, with a proper retrenchment of our expenditures, we might divert a large sum, annually, in addition to the ten millions appropriated to the Sinking Fund, towards the reduction of the public debt; by which, the moment of its final redemption might be greatly hastened. Believing, however, that no proposition to divert from the present objects of expenditure any considerable portion of our revenue, would be well received, I shall consider the subject as if no more than ten millions of dollars a year were to be applied to the reduction of the public debt.

At this rate, however, it is rapidly drawing to a close. By a calculation which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, it appears that, by the annual application of the ten millions of dollars, our debt, except that bearing an interest of three per cent., and the United States Bank loan, may be extinguished on the 1st day of July, 1833; and leaving, on that day, a surplus of $342,069 28. But, as more than two millions of the four and a half per cent. stock is not redeemable before the first day of January, 1834, and as more than four and a half millions of our five per cent. debt is not redeemable before the first day of January, 1835, there will be a large surplus in our Treasury, between the years 1832 and 1835, not applicable to the reduction of the public debt, under the present regulation of the Sinking Fund.

It is proposed, by the bill under consideration, to appropriate, after the 1st of January, 1830, five millions of the Sinking Fund to the fund for distribution; still, however, subject to the control of Congress; as no more is to be divided than may be found in the Treasury unappropriated, on the first day of June in that year, and on the first day of June in each succeeding year.

By this arrangement, the public debt—except the three per cents and Bank loan—might be extinguished on the first day of January, 1833, and forty millions of dollars distributed among the States. This would admit of a gradual reduction of the public debt; but, as fast as the public good requires that it should be reduced, it would speedily bring into operation a fund for such objects of education and internal improvement, as the States might think proper to adopt; and gradually introduce a safe system for the disposal of our surplus funds, after the extinguishment of our debt; and which, after all the reductions of revenue that can or will be adopted, will not fall short of five millions of dollars a year.

Of this feature of the bill, however, I am not particularly tenacious. Should the whole of the Sinking Fund be applied to the reduction of the debt, till the first of January, 1831, or 1832, the States would wait the longer for the funds, which are extremely necessary to their purposes, and which they could apply to the greatest possible advantage to the country, but the debt would be the sooner extinguished. Even if this part of the bill should be altogether omitted, still its most important objects would be answered, and many objections to it obviated. If the bill should simply provide, that, after the first day of June, of the next, and every succeeding year, the unappropriated moneys in the Treasury should be divided among the States, in the ratio of direct taxation, and that such parts of the Sinking Fund, as, in any year, should not be applied to the reduction of the public debt, should be considered as unappropriated money, the most important objects in view would be attained. The States would ultimately, and in a short time, have the benefit of their funds; and the inconvenience and extreme danger of a large surplus in the United States Treasury, to be legislated away by Congress, would be avoided.

I have no doubt of the constitutionality of the measure proposed in this bill. Others may have. The doubts of some, as to the constitutional powers of Congress, if adopted by a majority, would put an end to some of the most important and indispensable objects of legislation; while others seem to consider no provision in the constitution as an impediment to the exercise of the will of Congress. I am with those who are in favor of a rigid construction of the constitution; but not too rigid. Among the enumerated powers of Congress, is that to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; and they are to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or office thereof. It is a matter of extreme difficulty to ascertain the exact extent and limits of the powers vested in Congress by this provision of our constitution. Had the members of the federal convention been required to define those powers, they would probably have been as much at a loss as we are. It was undoubtedly intended, however, by this provision, to vest in Congress, a body of which there was the least jealousy, a power not otherwise granted, but absolutely necessary to the perfection of the system—a power which it was impossible accurately to define, or upon the exact limits of which the convention could not agree. It was an expedient to avoid difficulties at the moment, that might otherwise have been found insurmountable, adopted under an impression that, being subordinate to the other provisions of the constitution, it might be safely trusted to the immediate representatives of the people and of the States. The power, however, has limits, and narrow limits. It must be exercised in strict accordance with, and in subordination to, the other provisions and principles of the constitution; its range must be confined by the words necessary and proper; and must, in no case, infringe the rights of States or individuals.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he was of opinion, with the gentleman from Missouri, that, when the public debt was extinguished, it was better, instead of continuing to raise a revenue, to leave in the pockets of the citizens the surplus which the gentleman proposed to divide among the states. It was better to reduce the duties on imports, the result of which would be cheaper. Was it not better that citizens should be relieved from a part of their burdens, to decrease the expenses of every family in the United States, than to raise a revenue not wanted by the country? He thought it was.

In relation to distributing the surplus revenue, the effect of it would be, that every State would repeal its own laws, levying taxes for its own support, and look to the General Government for support. Thus the several States would be subservient to the General Government, giving that Government a power most dangerous.

Congress, in the next place, had no right to raise a revenue for the purpose of distributing it; the gentleman from New Jersey could not find, in all the powers delegated to Congress, any authorizing it to raise a revenue, except for its support, and for the extinguishment of the public debt. Under the name of revenue, the Government had already given large bounties, for he would call them bounties, to the woollen manufacturers; the revenue was wanted for the protection of the woollen manufacturers. When a duty was imposed upon cotton, it was said that the manufacturers would, in a few years, supply all the demand of the country, and be enabled to export. It was true it varied in different years, but the amount annually exported was upwards of a million of dollars. It was expected, in 1816, that this would be the case; it was expected that the domestic would drive all the foreign manufacturers out of the country, and it turned out to be true at first, but, afterwards, it was found that the importations were finally greater, notwithstanding the first diminution; it would be the same with woollens, else there was no necessity for the gentleman's bill, for there would be no revenue to distribute.

Mr. HAYNE said, that the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey had gained favor from the public, and some countenance even in this House, from a misunderstanding which had gone abroad, as to its true character. The public supposed the gentleman from New Jersey had contrived a plan to settle this distracting question of internal improvement; not only that he had settled the constitutional question, but that the whole subject was hereafter to be set at rest. But what do you find, upon looking at the bill? It does not even propose to settle that question. It has no more to do with it than it has with the military or naval establishment. It simply provides, that all the unappropriated money remaining in the Treasury on the first of June every year, shall be distributed among the several States, and that five millions of dollars of the Sinking Fund shall be applied in the same way. But are there to be no more calls for money for internal improvements? Are there to be no more claims presented upon this floor? Are there to be no more Ohio and Chesapeake Canals? No more Louisville and Portland Canals? No more improvements to be specially provided for? No, sir, there will not be a cent of revenue to distribute, except the five millions taken from the Sinking Fund. And this is the sum and substance of the bill. It does not even touch the question which it is supposed to settle. It depends upon entirely different principles, and has different objects from those discussed by the gentleman from New Jersey. That gentleman had, indeed, given a faithful picture of the state of things under the present system—of the scrambles, quarrels, and heart burnings; but his bill does not set them at rest, nor even attempt to do so. He repeated, that, if the bill passed to-morrow, it would never stop the application of one dollar for internal improvements.

The gentleman seemed to think there would be some advantage in raising the revenue, even if it was not wanted, for the mere purpose of distributing it; but could any thing be more shocking to the common sense of mankind than the idea of levying taxes for the sake of returning the money so raised back again to the pockets of the people from whom it was exacted? Was it the object of the gentleman to support an army of tax-gatherers, who should subsist by raising money that was not wanted? Or was it the object of the gentleman to have the eyes of all the States fixed upon the Federal Government, and have them live under the apprehension that in that Government rested the power to furnish them with money for State purposes? Or was it the object to have the States fed by the General Government, for the purpose of keeping them in subserviency to it? Some one of these objects must be proposed. The project could not be sustained for a moment, merely on the ground that the General Government was going to the trouble and expense of collecting this money, in order to have the pleasure of returning it to the several States. Then, again, let it be specially noted that it was not to be returned in the ratio of consumption, (by which it was raised,) but in the ratio of direct taxation. The gentleman had advocated the passage of his bill, on the ground that it would be easier for the Federal Government to raise this revenue and return it, than it would be for each State to raise sufficient for its own purposes; but, when the constitution was formed, was it ever imagined that the States would require the aid of the Federal Government to levy taxes for domestic purposes, within their individual boundaries?

Supposing the bill to have passed, what was to be the effect? The Government has the money, and we, in the States, are to be put in the situation of mendicants, scrambling, as it has been described, for a portion of our own money. We are to have doled out to us, as a favor, the money which has been first drawn from our own pockets. Supposing the constitutional question to be settled, if the Government has the right to give this money, so it has the right to withhold it; thus keeping the States forever in a state of subserviency, putting them, he presumed, on their good behavior.

The second section of the act is still more objectionable than the first. What is it? Why, the object is to apply, in the same objectionable way, the funds set apart for the payment of the public debt—to postpone indefinitely the payment of the national debt.

This brought up, at once, the question, whether our national debt ever ought to be paid? Whether a national debt was indeed a national blessing—a question which had divided the statesmen of Europe from the beginning of time, but on which he had hoped we were more united. Several years ago, Congress had solemnly set apart ten millions annually as a Sinking Fund, and had sacredly pledged this ten millions to the people of the United States, to pay the national debt. He believed that the act was one of the wisest in the statute book. He believed that the debt could not be paid off too soon. Congress could not tell how long the country was to be in a state of peace and prosperity; the revenue might fail, or a war, or other unforeseen circumstances might arise, to thwart their expectations.

The gentleman from New Jersey had offered two statements, one showing that, by the regular operation of the Sinking Fund, the debt would be extinguished in the year 1838; the other showing that, by his plan of delaying the payment of a certain portion, for the purpose of distributing it, the debt would not be extinguished until the year 1838. The proposition was, then, to prolong the period for the payment of the national debt for five years. The gentleman had asserted that there would be a difficulty in paying this debt, because a portion of it was not redeemable. From his statement, it appeared that the whole of it was redeemable by 1838, except two sums, which, inconsiderable, (less than \$7,000,000,) was to run for a few years longer; but could there be any difficulty in redeeming, even by purchase, at the market price, seven millions of dollars, by the year 1838, if the country continued in a state of prosperity? He contended that they could redeem the whole of it (for it bore only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  or 5 per cent. interest) by purchase, at any time, after the manner proposed by the gentleman from Missouri. The stock could be obtained at par, or a little above it; and he took it for granted, that, by the passage of a timely act, the whole of the four and a half and five per cents would be obtained. The gentleman from New Jersey had argued that it was wrong to purchase stock which bore a less interest than money was worth in the market; but Mr. H. was of opinion that the debt should be purchased up and extinguished as fast as it could be done conveniently. He considered money, idle in the Treasury, not only as bearing no interest at all, but as actually fifty per cent. below par in value, for it would lie there to be squandered, and be always subject to the general "scramble" of the States, which had been described by the gentleman.

Mr. BENTON rose to read some extracts from a debate in the British House of Commons, about a hundred years ago, on a proposition of the same kind as that which now occupied the deliberations of the Senate. England then had a small debt, not much larger than the debt of the United States was at present; she had a Sinking Fund also, under the operation of which her debt was annually melting away; and she enjoyed a season of peace—the long peace under the timid administration of Sir Robert Walpole, in which the debt might have been paid off. The circumstances of the two countries, with respect to their debt, were as alike as possible; that is to say, the condition of England one hundred years ago, and that of the United States now. In these circumstances, Sir Robert Walpole made a motion to divert £500,000 from the English Sinking Fund, as the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. DICKERSON, who Mr. B. was sorry to name in company with Sir Robert Walpole) now proposes to divert five millions annually from our Sinking Fund. The motion of the English minister was supported by all the commonplace arguments in mitigation and in favor of the public debt, as, that a debt increased the wealth of a country, and gave stability to the Government; that the then debt of England was inconsiderable, and might be paid at any time; that the public creditors were in no hurry to receive, and that the money, for the present, could be used more beneficially for other purposes. The opposition members, however, from whose speeches I propose to read extracts, were opposed to all these doctrines. These members were the Iron Barons of the day, such as Lord Chatham, afterwards contrasted with the Silken Barons of a later period. They had the best of the argument, and their prophecies, unhappily for their country, have become its history. But the Minister had the best of it at voting, and his motion prevailed. He succeeded in violating the Sinking Fund—in diverting one-half of its amount from its proper object, to objects of transient interest and subordinate importance. The consequences were such as had been foretold by the Iron Barons.

The season of peace passed away; the long and timid administration of Walpole itself passed away; the debt was unpaid; successive wars came on; and the debt, which was then made so light of by the Minister, rapidly grew up to a frightful amount; soon overwhelmed the country with taxes, and banished all idea of ever seeing it paid. The example, Mr. B. hoped, would not be lost upon the United States, the child of England. The experience of the mother, he humbly trusted, would not be lost upon the daughter, as the experience of parents is too often lost upon their children. History was said to be philosophy teaching by example; he hoped this moral and sublime teacher would not lavish her lessons in vain upon the American Senate.

Mr. B. joined in the wish expressed by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) that the debt of the United States might be paid off under the ensuing administration. He concurred with that Senator in the measure of the new fame which such a consummation would confer upon General Jackson.

Observing some Senators to smile, Mr. B. spoke up with animation and vehemence, repeating what he had said, and even going so far as to say that the new President would have as hard, or harder work in baffling the enemies to the payment of the debt, than he had in vanquishing the British at New Orleans; for there he had his enemy in front, and saw what he was at, but here he would have his opponents on his flank and rear, covered up in masks and disguises, laboring to accomplish what would not be avowed. No one would now stand up and say "a public debt was a public blessing;" but many would practise upon the maxim, and endeavor to perpetuate ours, by withholding the means of paying it; by abolishing duties beforehand, and preventing the acquisition of revenue, or by squandering it upon all sorts of objects.

Mr. B. read the following extracts from the debates to which he alluded:

Sir William Pulteney.—"The Sinking Fund, that sacred deposit for extinguishing the duties and abolishing the taxes which lie so heavy on the trade and on the people of this nation, ought never to be touched; no consideration whatever ought to prevail with us to convert that fund to any use but that for which it was originally designed. It has, of late, too often been robbed—I beg pardon, sir, robbing is a harsh word, I will not say robbed—but I must say that, upon several occasions, there have been considerable sums snipped away from it."

Sir John Barnard.—"The creditors of the public are, perhaps, at present, unwilling to be paid off, because they have a greater interest for their money from the public than they can have anywhere else. But, let their inclinations be what they please, it is certainly the interest of the nation to have them all paid off; the sooner it is done, the happier it will be for the nation, and therefore no part of what is appropriated to their payment ought to be converted to any other use. Their unwillingness to receive payment is so far from being an argument against paying them that, on the contrary, it shows that they have a better bargain from the public than they can, in the same way, have from any other person."

Sir William Wyndham.—"The Sinking Fund is a fund I have always had the greatest veneration for; I look on it as a sacred fund, appropriated to the relieving the nation from that load of debts and taxes it now groans under. * * * I have, indeed, been always afraid that some enterprising Minister might be tempted to seize upon it, or some part of it, in time of war; but I little dreamt of seeing any attempts made upon it in a time of the most profound tranquillity. It is to me a melancholy consideration to think of the present vast load of the national debt—a debt of no less than forty-five millions and upwards, and that all contracted since the Revolution (1688). This must be a melancholy consideration to every gentleman that has any concern for his country's happiness; but if the motion now made to us shall be agreed to, how dismal will this consideration be rendered when we reflect upon the little appearance there will then be of this debt's ever being paid. Is the public expense never to be lessened? Are the people of England always to pay the same heavy and grievous taxes? Surely, sir, if there is ever a time to be looked for of easing the people of this nation, the present is the time for doing it. * * * To this the motion now made is directly contrary; for, the not paying off an old debt is the same as contracting a new one, and subjects the nation to the same expense with respect to the payment of the interest."

Mr. Taylor, member for Petersfield, observed, "That there are some people in the nation who, the more they owe, the greater advantage they make, and the richer they grow—such are the bankers; that, by the motion made to the House, one might imagine that some gentlemen took the case of the nation to be the same: but, for his part, he could not think so, and, therefore, differed from the motion."

WEDNESDAY, January 14.

Claim of Maison Rouge et al.

The Senate took up, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to "provide for the legal adjudication and settlement of the claims to land therein mentioned;" and after an explanation of the object of the bill by Mr. BERRIEN, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved that it be postponed, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

Mr. S. observed, that the subjects comprised in the bill had previously been under the consideration of Congress, and he thought he had some recollection of them. The claims of Bastrop, of Winter, and of Maison Rouge, were, he believed, embraced in the bill; and some of these claims had more than once been here, and been rejected. A bill on the Maison Rouge claim had passed the other House, but had been rejected in the Senate; and there was a mass of testimony, which went to show that the claimant had no right whatever to the land claimed by him. Mr. S. wished the bill to be postponed for a few days, in order that he might have an opportunity of examining the documents. If the gentleman who introduced this bill would name any particular day to which it should be postponed, he would be satisfied; but, if he did not, he himself would move that the bill be postponed to this day week. There was, said Mr. S., a vast deal of written evidence somewhere; the subject was one of importance, embracing near three millions of acres of land in Louisiana; and he thought it would require more deliberation than one moment, to enable the Senate to pass such a bill with a correct understanding of its ultimate consequences.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, had no objection to the postponement of the bill, that the gentleman might acquire information, but he hoped the gentleman from South Carolina would make the time of postponement as short as possible, as it was an important subject to his constituents, and the session was very short. He could state all the facts necessary, and if the written documents to which the gentleman alluded could be found, still the bill was necessary. The holders of the land had appealed to the Senate for a settlement of their title; the Senate had decided that their body was incompetent to act upon the petition; they now wished to appeal to a judicial tribunal for a settlement, and this bill would enable them to take it to some competent court. The remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina showed that he was prepossessed; that he had made up his mind upon the subject; and that no evidence which could be offered would alter that opinion. He (Mr. J.) knew all the circumstances to which the gentleman had alluded. The title to the lands never was attacked on the ground that the titles were not legal; there was no question with regard to the genuineness of that, but the difficulty was, that the parties made a contract with the King of Spain to settle the country upon certain terms, and the only question was, whether that contract had been performed; and it was a question which could only be settled by a judicial tribunal. He had been required by the Legislature of Louisiana to press this matter upon the consideration of the Senate.

It had been before Congress for more than five and twenty years, and the richest country in Louisiana, which was covered with these titles, had remained all that time unsettled.

The holders dared not sell the lands, under these circumstances, and they asked Congress to give them an opportunity to settle the doubtful question of the titles, that they might sell the lands, and the country no longer remain unsettled. It seemed, from his remarks, as if the mind of the gentleman from South Carolina was made up, by some previous consideration of the question; but he could assure the gentleman that all guards had been placed in the provisions of the bill, to have the public rights preserved, as well as the rights of those interested, settled. He hoped the gentleman would not ask for a long postponement; he was willing to indulge him in any delay for the purpose of acquiring information, although he was perfectly satisfied he could explain every thing to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, he was not certain whether the gentleman from Louisiana opposed a postponement of the bill or not. He should not, as the gentleman had not asked them, give his reasons for wishing a postponement. His reasons, however, were very cogent, and he did not know that a shorter time than Wednesday next would enable him to examine, as fully as he wished to do, the various papers connected with the subject. He did not know what he should say when his investigations had terminated; but he had a distinct recollection of some facts, in relation to these claims, and he wished time to be allowed him to acquaint himself with all of them. The gentleman from Louisiana entertained doubts whether he (Mr. S.) was not already opposed to the claims provided for in the bill. Mr. S. would remove these doubts, and assure the gentleman that he had been opposed to them, and wished for an investigation, to ascertain whether his opinions would or would not remain unchanged.

The bill was made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

THURSDAY, January 15.

Distribution of the Revenue.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill "to distribute a portion of the revenues of the United States among the States"—the question being on a motion of Mr. BERRIEN, for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. DICKERSON said he had not supposed, when he offered this bill to the consideration of the Senate, that it was in an unexceptionable form. He expected that it would excite considerable discussion, and that it would be referred to a committee, to receive such modifications as should be thought expedient. Presuming that the minds of the Senators were made up upon the subject, he would move that it be referred to a select committee.

The PRESIDENT said that a motion to refer was not in order, the motion to postpone having precedence.

Mr. BERRIEN said he was not disposed to interfere, and prevent the gentleman from New Jersey from modifying his bill so as to make it acceptable. In order, therefore, that the gentleman might have an opportunity to amend the bill, he would withdraw his motion to postpone.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the yeas and nays having been ordered, the motion to postpone could not be withdrawn without the unanimous consent of the Senate.

No objection having been made, the motion to postpone was withdrawn, and the bill was referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. DICKERSON, BRANCH, BELL, HAYNE, and SANFORD.

MONDAY, January 19.

Sabbath Mails.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom had been referred several petitions in relation to the transportation and opening the mails on the Sabbath day, made a report, concluding with a resolution, "that the committee be discharged from the farther consideration of the subject."

Mr. J. moved that the reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed. He requested that more than one copy for each Senator should be provided, that he might send copies to his constituents. He believed that legislation upon the subject was improper, and that nine hundred and ninety-nine in a thousand were opposed to any legislative interference, inasmuch as it would have a tendency to unite religious institutions with the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that one thousand copies be printed, and Mr. HAYNE, that three thousand copies be printed, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER said he had no objection to the printing of any number of copies, except as to principle: it did not appear to him that it was right to order a large number of copies to be printed until the Senate knew what it was, and that they should not be ordered until the report had been read, as it might seem to imply that they approved of the report.

Mr. JOHNSON said he had moved to dispense with the reading of the report, because he did not wish to trouble the Senate with the reading of any of his reports. He believed that these petitions and memorials in relation to Sunday mails, were but the entering wedge of a scheme to make this Government a religious instead of a social and political institution; they were widely circulated, and people were induced to sign them without reflecting upon the subject or the consequences which would result from the adoption of the measure proposed. There was nothing more improper than the interference of Congress in this matter.

Mr. CHAMBERS disagreed with the gentleman from Maine, that ordering a large number would imply any assent to the principles adopted in the report. Neither did he agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the adoption of the measure prayed for would have a bad tendency, and that legislation upon the subject would be improper. Some had asserted that this measure did tend to unite religious with our political institutions, and others had asserted that such would not be the result. The petitioners took an entirely different ground. They said that the observance of the Sabbath was connected with the civil interests of the Government. He did not mean to be understood, however, as having formed any opinion upon the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON said he would state, in justice to himself, that he believed the petitioners were governed by the purest motives, but if the gentleman from Maryland would look at the proceedings of a meeting at Salem, in Massachusetts, he would find, it did not matter what was the purity of motive, that the petitioners did not consider the ground they had taken as being purely that the Sabbath was a day of rest; they assumed that it was such by a law of God. Now, some denominations considered one day the most sacred, and some looked to another, and these petitions did, in fact, call upon Congress to settle what was the law of God. The committee had framed their report upon principles of policy and expediency. It was but the first step taken, that they were to legislate upon religious grounds, and it made no sort of difference which was the day asked to be set apart, which day was to be considered sacred, whether it was the first day or the seventh, the principle was wrong. It was upon this ground that the committee went in making their report.

The resolution that the committee be discharged was adopted; and three thousand copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

Northeastern Boundary.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. McKINLEY, was taken up.

"Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the appointment of the King of the Netherlands, umpire for the decision of the controversy with Great Britain, relating to the northeastern boundary of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and that said Committee inquire whether, by the treaty of Ghent, and according to the Constitution of the United States, the President alone has power to make said appointment."

Mr. McKINLEY said, that it appeared, by the treaty of Ghent, that several questions remained undecided; but that their decision was provided for by a reference to some friendly power. One of those questions had been decided by the Emperor of Russia. He wished to be understood, that, in offering this resolution, he did not intend it to operate in any manner as a party question. The predecessor of the present

President of the United States having established a precedent in the appointment he had referred to, the great question in his mind was, whether the President of the United States had the power to make such an appointment. The treaty of Ghent provided that the boundary between the United States and Great Britain should be left to the commissioners to be appointed by the two Governments; and in case they could not agree, as another expedient, it was to be left to the umpirage of some friendly power, whose decision should be final and conclusive. It seemed to him that this award might be considered the conventional law of the United States until the umpire had decided, and his decision would be the supreme law of the land. It then came to the question, whether the President had power to make a treaty. The Government of the United States was bound to abide by the award of the umpire, and consequently could exercise no discretion. The Senate exercised no influence in this case, and consequently a treaty was made by the President. No one would pretend that the treaty of Ghent was a treaty of limits; it was a mere provisional treaty, providing expedients for the settlement of this question. By the Constitution of the United States, it was the duty of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint commissioners, ambassadors, &c. It was a question whether the power selected as an umpire was not, ipso facto, a Minister of the United States. If he is not a minister, where and how does he derive his authority to act for the United States? The President of the United States had power to make treaties and arrangements with individuals within the bounds of the United States; but it was provided that all nominations of ambassadors should come before the Senate. If no foreign prince was eligible to the office of Minister of the United States, no foreign prince could make a treaty for the United States. In the present case, the fate of the United States was solemnly pledged to abide by this award, and the faith of the country would be violated if that pledge was not redeemed. Now, would a treaty, based upon the award of an umpire, be binding upon the people of the United States, if there was no power to appoint this umpire? Here was an anomaly. The faith of the Government was pledged to abide by the award of the umpire, and the people of the United States not bound to abide by the decision, because there was no power to make this award. The precedent of settlements by umpirage had been established; but a single precedent should not grow into so much strength as to be engrafted upon the constitution. It was under these views that he had offered the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

TUESDAY, January 20.

Supreme Court.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States.'"

Mr. WEBSTER said, it was known that the Supreme Court was now holden by four judges only; the judge of the second circuit was recovering from a severe illness, and it was supposed he was now on the road; and the Judge of the Southern circuit had met with an accident, and was delayed in one of the Carolinas. What rendered the passage of the bill peculiarly necessary, was, that if, within ten days after the time settled for the meeting of the Court, there was not a quorum of the Judges assembled, the Court must adjourn, and the session be lost. If one of the four Judges now here should be taken sick to-morrow, the Court would be broken up, and the session closed. The second section of the bill provided that, when less than four of the Judges were assembled, they should adjourn from day to day, until twenty days after the first meeting, and then adjourn until the next annual session. If there was no objection, the subject was so important, that he would ask for the second reading at the present time.

No objection being made, the bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[Subsequently, the bill was reported as correctly engrossed; and, on motion, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the House of Representatives.]

Cumberland Road.

The bill providing for the extension of the Cumberland road westwardly from Zanesville, in the State of Ohio, was next taken up.

Mr. HENRICKS said, that, unless some objection was made to the passage of the bill, it was not worth while to go into a history of the road; it now went very near Zanesville, and this bill merely authorized its extension.

Mr. BRANCH said he could wish that this bill and every other similar bill could be postponed until the great question about the expenditure of the public money was settled. There was now a proposition before Congress, it was well known, which would settle this question; and would it not be well to postpone this bill until that time? Congress had been expending million after million, more than enough to pay the national debt, unjustly and partially. They could not avert the evil, but they might mitigate it; and he could wish the gentleman from Indiana would consent to postpone the bill, and lay it upon the table. Let us do justice, said Mr. B.; I do not wish to raise a revenue for the purpose of distributing it over the country; but let us adopt some principle to make our taxes as small as possible. A bill for this purpose was now before a Special Committee, and he wished to hear their report before acting farther.

He then moved to lay the bill upon the table, and asked the yeas and nays upon the question.

The motion was lost—ayes 16, noes 25.

Mr. BENTON said he would make some inquiry of the committee who reported the bill, which would perhaps supersede the necessity of his offering an amendment. The bill, as read by its title, was for extending the road westwardly. "Westwardly" was a very indefinite expression. The route for this road was marked out in the time of Mr. Jefferson, 20 years ago; there had been a great struggle made in Ohio and Kentucky to get the road turned off south, through Kentucky. All he wished to know was, whether the words of the bill were such as would carry into effect the original design of the Cumberland road.

Mr. HENDRICKS explained, that the bill provided for extending the road from Zanesville, through the States of Indiana, and Illinois, to St. Louis, in the State of Missouri.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 21.

Land Claims in Missouri.

The bill for the final adjustment of land claims in the State of Missouri was taken up.

Mr. BARTON rose in explanation of the objects of the bill. It was introduced, he said, in consequence of the Legislature of Missouri having taken up the subject, and asked that measures might be taken to produce a final decision with regard to the unconfirmed land claims in that State. The particular plan provided in the bill for the adjustment of these claims had been proposed by the committee as the most convenient one that could, in their opinion, be fallen on; but the bill was open for amendment, as it was of more importance to the State of Missouri that a final conclusion should be put upon the claims than as to the mode of doing it. The particular plan proposed in this bill was introduced in the Senate in the year 1824; the bill passed, and was sent to the other House for concurrence, where the plan of sending the claims to a Board of Commissioners for adjudication, was substituted instead of it.

Mr. CHANDLER thought it was premature to act upon the subject at this time, as there was a law upon the subject limited as to time. He thought it better to let the subject rest until the old law should expire.

Mr. BENTON was in favor of the bill. It was the copy of one which passed the Senate four years ago, went down to the House, and was not acted upon there; another bill, referring these claims to the Judiciary, being preferred by the House of Representatives, and sent up to the Senate, where it became a law. This law applied to claims of the same character both in Missouri and Arkansas, and in the latter place has answered a good purpose; in Missouri rather worse than no purpose at all. Many claims were settled in Arkansas, where three judges presided; all were condemned in Missouri, where one judge presided. The same law, applying to the same class of claims administered by judges appointed by the Federal Government, has been construed just as differently as yes and no. It produced great discontent to have decisions in Arkansas one way, and decisions upon the other side of an invisible line, another way. Mr. B. was in favor of the bill; it was the copy of one drawn by himself four years ago; but he wanted an amendment, by having some other officers, or commissioners, associated with the recorder.

Mr. BARTON then submitted an amendment, providing for the appointment of two commissioners, by the President and Senate, in addition to the recorder; which amendment was adopted.

Mr. PRINCE was entirely in favor of the bill, and hoped it would be passed. It occurred to him, however, that it should be amended so that, when there were conflicting claims, the evidence should be reported to Congress. He accordingly moved an amendment having that object, which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON then moved to fill the blank in the first section of the bill with the words "first day of August next," (the day on which the commission is to commence,) and to insert a provision fixing the salaries of the Recorder and Commissioners at fifteen hundred dollars each; which was carried.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill was so amended as to make it the duty of the Recorder and Commissioners to assign, in their reports, "the reasons for their opinions so given."

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

Claim of Maison Rouge et al.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill "to provide for the legal adjudication and settlement of the claims to land therein mentioned."

[This is a bill providing for the settlement of the large claims of Maison Rouge, Bastrop, and Winter, which have been so long before Congress; and which was now proposed to be referred to a judicial decision.]

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said the bill had been postponed at his request, and he would now call the attention of the Senate to a few observations. He was opposed to the passage of such a bill, because he was well assured that its provisions were contrary to the constitution. It was not competent for Congress to enact such a law, for no suit could be authorized which was contrary to constitutional principles. It was on that ground that he was opposed to it. The Constitution of the United States did not authorize, or sanction the principle; it did not authorize any citizen to sue the United States; and if the constitution did not give the right, the right could not be conferred by legislative enactment. There had been a time when suits were brought by individuals against some of the States, but the power had been regarded as one of an extraor-dimory nature, and it had been taken away. The right to sue a State did not now exist, if it ever did—it was expressly taken away; and yet Congress, by the passage of the bill, would assume to give the power which had been withheld. He was opposed to the bill on principle, on constitutional principles. He would not say that he was hostile to the claims, for he would be glad to lay his hand upon the evidence upon which they were founded; but he was opposed to the manner of settling those claims without constitutional authority, for which it was the object of the bill to provide. The cases reported were those of considerable magnitude. They had been recommended to Congress for decision: Congress had taken them into consideration, and the claims of Maison Rouge were once discussed for three weeks. He would offer, in opposition to the law which was proposed to be passed, the Constitution of the United States. The constitution would show that no such power could be exercised by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, regretted that the gentleman from South Carolina should have had any difficulty in laying his hands on the papers in relation to the claims under consideration, &c., &c., because he was satisfied that the bare allusion to them was calculated to have a much more unfavorable bearing on the subject than if the papers were produced; and he was disposed to postpone the consideration of the subject a sufficient time to enable the gentleman to examine the testimony, as he was decidedly of opinion that the production of them would convince the Senate of the necessity of speedily passing upon the claims. The titles to all these claims were of a similar character. That of Bastrop embraced about one million of acres of the richest portion of Louisiana, and was founded on a contract with the Spanish Government, signed by the King of Spain himself, six years before the country passed under the jurisdiction of the United States. We acquired that country, said Mr. J., under a contract that Congress would respect the claims to lands, which were founded on grants from the Spanish Crown; and in part fulfilment of that contract, a Board of Commissioners was constituted to investigate and report on the claims. That Board did report, and reported that the claims embraced in this bill were good; but Congress, unwilling to give to the commissioners, and reserving to itself, the power of final decision on them, they had remained as yet unjustified. When the commissioners made their report, Congress was applied to for a confirmation of their awards; and various opinions were entertained respecting them when the application came before the Senate. Some of the Senators believed that the claims were valid, others were of an opinion that they were illegal, and ought not to be confirmed; while a much larger portion of the Senators believed that this body was not a competent tribunal to try their validity. The claimants, said Mr. J., had now waited for twenty-five years, in the vain expectation of a final decision for or against them; much injury had resulted to them, and to the State, from the protracted delay; and inasmuch as the Senate had decided that it was not a competent tribunal to pass upon their claims, it followed as a matter of justice, that they ought to be sent to a judicial tribunal. The claims being founded on a written contract with the Spanish Government, the performance of the conditions of which had been suspended, it was incumbent on the United States, either to constitute a judicial tribunal to try their validity, or to fulfil the terms of the contract. Mr. J. did not himself assert that the claims were perfectly legal and valid, but that they were such as presented the most colorable title that the nature of the case would admit of. There was one consideration which should induce Congress to make some speedy and final distribution of the subject; it was this: the lands embraced in the claim were situated in one of the richest counties of the State of Louisiana, which, in consequence of the unsettled nature of the titles, remained waste and uncultivated. Moreover, whatever decision Congress might make on the subject, it could not annul the titles already existing; nor sell the lands: for if you proceed to sell, said Mr. J., the claimant can sue the person you sell to—thus reducing the price of the land sold to little or nothing, creating endless confusion, and retarding the settlement of the country for ten or fifteen years.

With regard to the claim of Maison Rouge, which comprehended only about 200,000 acres, it stood upon the same foundation with that of Bastrop; and was granted about the same time, and upon the same conditions, which he (Mr. J.) was informed by his colleague had been complied with. That, however, he waived, as the evidence went not to invalidate the titles, which were as well known in New Orleans, as the Declaration of Independence was in other parts of the United States; indeed, their validity was a matter of such notoriety, that the only question to be raised in Louisiana, was with regard to their location; and that question was one, which the courts alone were competent to decide. The locations, however, were made by the Surveyor General, an officer of great skill, and high character, and whose handwriting was as well known as that of any man in the United States, as early as 1797, and recorded among others, in a book kept by him for that purpose. Now if it were shown that the locations were recorded in the proper book, it would prove beyond a question that they were made in 1797. With regard to the third class of claims embraced in the bill, the lands granted to Winter and his two sons, the titles were precisely similar to the others; and this, as well as the others, could be settled by no other mode than that of a court constituted for the purpose. It was important to the public, to the State of Louisiana, and due to the faith of the nation, pledged to these people, that the claims should be finally disposed of. The titles had been held up for twenty-five years; many of the original claimants were dead, and knew that many were held by minor children, and, on this account, the hardship of protracting the decision was the greater.

Mr. BENTON sympathized with the State of Louisiana. She had been hardly dealt with. She had been a part of this Confederacy for twenty-five years, and in all that time no more than 200,000 acres of land had been sold by the Federal Government. [Mr. JOHNSTON of Louisiana said only 185,000.] This is keeping the country a desert so far as the action of the Federal Government is concerned. At the same time, her private claims, to the amount of a million and a half of arpens, remained unconfirmed, to the great injury of the claimants. They could not make beneficial improvements; they could not make dykes and levees; they could not sell to any advantage; and they were subjected, as Mr. BENTON believed, to the payment of taxes. [The Senators from Louisiana, Messrs. JOHNSTON and BOULIGNY, in answer to a look of inquiry from Mr. BENTON, said they were subject to taxes.] All this is hard upon the claimants; but the State was a party to the injury. She suffered for want of population; for want of cultivation; for want of taxes; for want of dykes and levees. The whole upper country, the States up the river, was interested in having Louisiana populated. New Orleans was their magazine, and their store-house; it was the most exposed point in the Union; and upon every alarm of invasion, real or imaginary, the people of the upper country were called out. They had always gone with alacrity; would forever go with alacrity. But the State ought to have means of defence within herself, and the first of these means was population. People would have arms, and would use them for the defence of their country. It would be a beneficial grant to give to the frontier settlers tracts of land; they would maintain them against invasion, and in defending their firesides, their wives and their children, they would defend the country. There was bad economy on the part of the Federal Government in keeping this country waste—in waving a barren sceptre over it. It had to pay the expense of expeditions to defend it; and they lost the advantages of their cultivation—the increased wealth which their cultivation would give to the Federal Government. There was always a gain to the public in passing any property, especially landed property, from hands that could not use it to hands that could. This was eminently the case with the Federal Government; it made no profit out of its lands; it was not a cultivator; and it was a property which deteriorated in their hands, from daily, universal, and enormous depredations upon its timber. Mr. BENTON said, that he had not got up to plead the case of the claimants, nor of the State of Louisiana, which he considered as a party to the bill; that task had been well done, skillfully and powerfully done, by the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. JOHNSTON; he merely rose to declare his concurrence in what had been said in favor of the bill; to express his sympathy for Louisiana for the manner in which she had been treated about her lands; to declare his conviction that she had been hardly dealt with; and that the Federal Government itself was a loser in the injustice done her.

Mr. BARTON did not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, on the subject of the constitutional question. He believed there existed, in every Government, the power of giving to the citizen a remedy against that Government. The mode or manner of the remedy was another thing. As to the summoning of juries and witnesses, in cases of adjudication, there could be nothing unconstitutional in that. The constitutional right of all claimants was the same, and he did not believe it would be an infraction of the constitution to refer them all to judicial decision. The claims of Carondelet and Winter were of a similar kind, and might be referred. He thought the question more proper for the Judiciary than for Congress. It was, as he believed, no violation of the constitution, and he would wish to see the claims settled. He had been of opinion that a general bill upon the subject of such claims, would be most advisable; but the more he reflected, the more firmly he was of opinion now, that such a course would not answer, and that it was best to have the claims settled at home. Under the views which he had, he should vote for the bill.

On the question of engrossment for a third reading, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays; it was decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28.

Louisville and Portland Canal.

The bill "authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal," was taken up.

Mr. CHANDLER said he should like to have some reason assigned why the bill should pass.

Mr. ROWAN said, it was easy enough to give the reasons why this bill should pass. The canal could not be completed without the aid of the Government. Unfortunately the calculation of the Engineer employed to survey the route, and estimate the expenses, proved erroneous, and after the work was far progressed, it was found that the expense would far exceed the estimate. The canal was two miles and something less than a quarter in length, and cut out of the solid rock; much had been done; the locks were nearly completed; the excavated stone had been removed, and about two-thirds of the work was completed. Being thus delayed, the stock was below par, and many shares had been forfeited, in consequence of the non-payment of the amount called for. This forfeited stock could not be sold to individuals at par. The present bill provided that the Government should take it, and unless the Government did take it, the work could not be completed. The expenditures had already amounted to between two and three hundred thousand dollars; and it was calculated that the amount provided for in this bill would be sufficient to complete it. For this purpose, the Legislature of Kentucky had extended the time in which it was to be finished for the term of two years longer. It had proved to be a very great work, much greater than was ever anticipated by anybody who had inquired into the subject. He was not going into the question of the principle; it was merely a question upon the expediency of taking so much of the stock. It was believed by the stockholders that the stock would be good; and while, in a pecuniary point of view, the Government would not lose, he hoped the bill would pass without objection.

JANUARY, 1829.]

Louisville and Portland Canal.

[SENATE.]

Mr. BRANCH wished his friend from Kentucky would suffer this bill to lie over, until the great question could be settled; it was known that there was a bill before the Senate providing for the distribution of the public money, doing justice to the country, and preventing the application, by Government, of money to purposes merely local. This bill went further than any bill that had ever been presented; by passing this bill, they were about to make good the insolvencies and bankruptcies of the State of Kentucky. And were gentlemen prepared to take this step? He trusted not: he hoped the bill would lie over. He was determined, in the general scramble for the public treasure, to get what belonged to North Carolina—nothing more; he did not want any thing more than her share. If there was any objection to this, he should like to have half a dozen members of the Senate cast the first stone—"those who live in houses of glass," &c., says the proverb. There was no gentleman in the Senate, who had not, at some time or other, made similar applications. His State, in common with others, had instructed him to demand what belonged to her; and what was he to do? Was it not his duty to obey his instructions? And yet he thought it was wrong, and he wished to arrest this method of applying the public money. If we have a sum to dispose of, let us do it equally and impartially. He regretted to hear the reasons given for that grant; and he regretted to hear the equal distribution of the revenue opposed upon constitutional grounds. By whom was this just method opposed? Was it by those who had uniformly opposed the distribution of money? No; but it was by men who were always in favor of appropriating money for local objects. He did not censure the gentleman for asking for this grant, for it was no more than almost every member of the Senate had done. The constitutional question had been overlooked, and precedent after precedent had been established, until it was almost impossible to prevent it, or refuse the applicants. Let us, said Mr. B., in conclusion, check this system of legislation which should make every member of the Senate blush when he looks it full in the face. A new era is approaching, and let us make the basis of the new Administration upon equitable grounds. He hoped the bill would lie upon the table, until the bill reported by the gentleman from New Jersey, providing for the equal distribution of the surplus revenue, should pass, and the question be settled.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, supported the bill, and, in reply to the remarks of Mr. BRANCH, assured the gentleman that, should any thing be found necessary for North Carolina, his vote should not be wanting. He was sorry they had been obliged to make this demand; he regretted as much as the gentleman from North Carolina did, the necessity of making it. The work was commenced, no fraud had been committed, all the proceedings were fair and honorable, and the enterprise had proved to be unlucky. The work was not one altogether local in its interests; the stockholders were not confined to Kentucky; they were to be found in the Western States, in the Atlantic States, and, he presumed, even in the State of North Carolina. He was satisfied that there would be no loss to the Government of the United States, either in principal or interest; the work was two-thirds done, and now they were checked by unforeseen consequences, and they appealed to Congress. If it was the first application of a similar kind, he would pause; but it was not; and would he pause, after what had been done, if the State of North Carolina, similarly situated, had made this demand? He would not. He, however, now took the ground that the Senate might reject it, and ought to reject it, if they considered it altogether as a local object. But, could that be called local in which the whole Western country was interested, which was important to more than four millions of people—more than fought the battles of our Revolution? If this was local, he wished gentlemen would tell him what was general. This was the only manner in which this Government could distribute money in the Western country: for, of the twenty-five millions, which were annually paid into the Treasury, for what legitimate object could it be expended in the West? There was none; and he was sufficiently latitudinarian in his construction of the constitution, to vote for similar bills. Mr J. offered a statement of the affairs of the company, which was laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said he was satisfied of the necessity of the work, and, from an examination of the report, he was satisfied that the affairs had been properly managed, and the money properly expended. He believed the work would be a profitable one: the increase of trade in that section of the country was inconceivable. There was no place in the country in which so large a portion of the country was connected by so short a canal. A reason for the immediate passage of the bill was, that the waters will soon rise, and obstruct the work. They were already in possession of all the information they could have; and unless the bill passed immediately, it could not pass the other House; and consequently the whole work would be postponed for another twelve months. The work, said Mr. J., will be completed within the amount contemplated in the act of incorporation. The resources of the company, including capital, property, &c., were fully adequate to the completion of the canal.

Mr. BENTON supported the bill on the grounds of its importance; that it was not a new application; and that it would not be any loss to the United States.

The question on ordering to a third reading was decided in the affirmative.

The Judiciary.

The report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the resolution instructing them to consider the expediency of amending the Judicial System of the United States so as to equalize the distribution of justice, and place all the States on a similar footing, was considered.

Mr. BERRIEN said, the resolution was upon a subject of great magnitude and importance; it had excited great interest in the National Legislature, both now and at other times. The committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending certain alleged inequalities in the present organization, and suggest such measures as in their opinion would remedy the difficulty. So far as regarded the present Judicial system, no diversity of opinion was entertained in the committee; all agreed that there was an inequality, which should be removed; but when the committee came to inquire what was the remedy, they found it impossible to report any specific plan. The result had been, that, in their report, they had gone into a historical account of the Judicial system, showing the inequalities, and stated their inability to concur in any specific plan. Their object had been to present the subject to the consideration of the Senate in such a manner that it should be open to the members of the Senate, whether belonging to the committee or not, to suggest any specific plan for the removal of this evil. It was, perhaps, a subject of too much importance to be discharged at the present moment, and it appeared to him to be a more appropriate treatment of the subject to lay it upon the table, that it might be called up at some future time. Accordingly, he moved to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. WEBSTER added, very briefly, that the conclusion of the report suggested several modes in which the inequalities might be removed; and the subject had become one of so much importance, that he wished to have it brought before the Senate. If it could be made the order of the day for some early day hereafter, he should prefer it to having it laid upon the table; but he was willing to agree in any measure thought most expedient.

Mr. BERRIEN said he was willing to have it made the order of the day, if, when that arrived, the Senate would be prepared to act upon it. But they probably would not; if it was laid upon the table, it could be called up at any moment, and discussed. Therefore he renewed his motion, and the bill was laid upon the table.

School Lands.

On motion of Mr. BARTON, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill allowing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections appropriated for schools in the State of Mississippi, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof.

Mr. BARTON moved to strike out the word "Mississippi," and insert "any township in any State or Territory of the United States," which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

The amendment offered yesterday by Mr. SANFORD to a similar bill for the State of Louisiana, was incorporated with this bill.

Mr. EATON moved to insert the words "in all cases," which was agreed to.

Mr. BRANCH said he could view these grants of the public lands in no other light than as pure donations, without any equivalent at all. He would ask the gentlemen, when they were giving the lands away, why they would not give to the old States? He appealed to their liberality. He wished the bill to be amended to that effect. He believed he should get at his object more readily by the recommitment of the bill, and he therefore made the motion, for the express object of making some provision for the old States.

Mr. KANE explained the bill. In the settlement of the terms upon which the new States were admitted, the sixteenth section in each township was reserved for the use of schools; in many cases this sixteenth section had proved to be barren and unproductive, and the bill provided that, in such cases, the town should be allowed to select good land, in order that the original intention might be carried into effect. Now, said Mr. K., if North Carolina is laboring under the disadvantages of having bad school lands granted to her, she is already provided for by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. If North Carolina has no such lands, she has no interest in the bill. If the gentleman wished for a new grant, he would suggest whether it was proper to incorporate it with the present bill, which was for another purpose?

School Lands.

Mr. BRANCH said he was not in Congress at the time, but he remembered perfectly well, some ten or fifteen years ago, when new States were admitted, when this provision was made, that the old States made a claim for a similar grant, which was resisted on the ground that this was not to be considered as a donation, because the Government would receive an equivalent in the enhanced value of its own lands situated adjacent to such school lands. He would ask how they received an equivalent, when such lands were worth nothing? If they received no equivalent, then it was a donation.

Mr. BARTON then took the floor in opposition to the recommitment, and recapitulated the terms upon which the States were admitted, and the reservations made; and concluded by saying, as he had a thousand times before said, that the new States did not consider this grant of a section for the benefit of schools, as a donation, for the Government received an equivalent in the privileges granted.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina opened a wide field, and embraced principles which he had not expected would be drawn into the argument in this incidental way. He alluded to the compacts, the principles on which the new States were entitled to admission into the Union, and the principles on which they were admitted. The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BARTON) had said, that the new States had been greatly prejudiced by the compacts. In that opinion he fully concurred. It was his opinion that the new States would be benefited by annulling those compacts, and he had heretofore expressed that opinion to the Senate. He repelled the idea that the compacts had been made for the benefit of the States; said they had been enacted by law, and originally imposed on the States, rather than asked for by them; said their validity had been questioned, and might well be questioned, on various grounds; referred to the resolutions of Louisiana, and to the proceedings of the Legislature of Indiana, on the subject of the public lands, and to the proximate attitude of Alabama, Illinois, and Missouri, on the same subject. The doctrine, that any political community may transfer to another political community its sovereignty, or a portion of it, might well be questioned, and the doctrine of the perpetual obligation of those compacts, was surely very objectionable. It was in derogation of a principle at the basis of our institutions—the principle which asserted the right of every free people to change and modify their constitution and laws, from time to time, as their condition may require. He would strictly observe the faith of compacts, but it was surely allowable to suggest every objection to them. He denied the power of the States to transfer the right of their own soil to the Federal Government, and the power of the Government to accept such transfer; and said, that, for this opinion, there was the highest authority. He referred to the construction of the constitution, given by Mr. Monroe, in his veto on the Gate bill, and to a recent argument in the other House, on the same subject; he would not enter further into the argument, but disclaimed the allegation that the compacts were made for the benefit of the new States. If the Senator from North Carolina had, in his State, vacant lands, and wished to appropriate them to the purposes of education, he would not object, but he did object to an appropriation of the soil within the limits of the State he had the honor to represent, for those purposes in North Carolina.

Mr. BARTON said, if it was true that there was no validity in the compact, as it was called, although he considered it no compact, but merely an arrangement between owners of property for the disposal of that property, on the supposition that the individuals, when making the contract, for their descendants were but as minors, then the gentleman from North Carolina was manifestly right in his proposition to admit the old States. He did not himself consider these compacts invalid; he considered them merely arrangements between all the owners of a common property to dispose of that property. He could not discover any objection to the claims of the old States that had school lands. He thought the new States were entitled to such lands as were granted to them for the use of schools without the old States coming in. He did not see that there was any invalidity on the ground of minority, and believed the whole argument wrong: for it was an arrangement made between parties fully competent.

Mr. HENDRICKS replied, that the Senator from Missouri (Mr. BARTON) had said, in reference to his former remarks, that if the compacts were of no validity, then certainly the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina was correct—for then the public lands, unembarrassed by all restrictions, would belong to the Union, and might fairly be distributed among the States. He wished to be correctly understood. Perhaps the word validity would not so well express his meaning as some other word. He cared not for terms, but thought it was absolutely certain that the Congress of the United States, in passing laws requiring these compacts, understood the subject very differ-ently from the Senator from Missouri. Congress had required the new States to stipulate that they would not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, and that they would not tax the lands for a specified period after their sale. Now if the Congress of that day believed that the States, without these compacts, after their admission into the Union, would have no such power, why was it thought necessary to restrict them by compacts? It is evident that Congress believed the power would exist in the States, or they would have taken no measures to restrain its exercise—would not have imposed the compacts. He would respect the compacts while they had the form of existence, but it would surely be permitted to the new States, even at this late day, to say, that they had hard bargains, and that Congress ought not to retain the advantages they gained. Mr. H. spoke of the political balance which had originally adjusted the powers of government between the States and the Union, and said that, if this balance were destroyed by cessions, on the part of the States to the Federal Government, whether of abstract political power or the object of its exercise, their system was destroyed.

Mr. BERRIEN said he had given a notice yesterday, and, for the purpose of redeeming his pledge, he moved to lay the bill upon the table, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business; which motion prevailed.

Exploring Expedition to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas.

The following resolution, yesterday submitted by Mr. HAYNE, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a detailed statement of the expenses incurred in fitting out and preparing an expedition for exploring the Pacific Ocean and South Seas; together with the additional amounts which will be necessary to cover all the expenses of such an expedition. And that he be also requested to cause to be submitted a detailed statement, showing the several amounts transferred from the different heads of appropriations for the support of the navy to this object, and the authority by which such transfers have been made."

In explanation of the object of the resolution—

Mr. HAYNE said it had been submitted by him under the direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs. A bill from the House of Representatives, appropriating 50,000 dollars for the purpose of exploring the Pacific Ocean and South Seas, had been referred to that committee, in consequence of which, their chairman had been directed to address a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, requiring of him an explanation of the views of the Department as to the objects of the expedition, and a statement of the expenses already incurred, with an estimate of the further expense that would be incurred in fitting it out. An answer had been received from the Secretary, which was not altogether satisfactory to the committee. He had given an explanation of the plan of the expedition, and what had already been done in furtherance of it; stated some of the expenses which had been incurred, but did not give all the information required. The want of the accounts was the reason alleged why the desired information had not been afforded. In the examination of the subject by the committee, some circumstances had occurred, which induced them to submit this call. In order to present to the Senate the views which influenced the committee, he would give a brief history of this exploring expedition, and state what had already been done in reference to this subject.

At the last session of Congress, the projector of the expedition came to Washington, bringing with him several memorials, signed by persons of respectability, praying that Congress would either fit out an expedition for the purpose of making explorations at the South Pole, or that they would aid in fitting out such an expedition. The memorials were referred to the Committee of Naval Affairs, in the other House, who communicated with the head of the Navy Department on the subject; and he held in his hand the letter of the Secretary of the Navy to that committee, from which he would read a few extracts for the information of the Senate. [Here Mr. H. read from the letter of the Secretary as follows:]

"The expedition ought not to be large nor expensive. Other nations have erred on this point. It seems to be the desire of the memorialist that Congress should afford aid, not furnish the whole expense. If this mode be preferred by the committee, all that the bill need provide is, that 'the sum of—dollars be appropriated to aid in fitting out an expedition to explore the Pacific Ocean and South Seas.' If it be the intention that the whole expense should be borne by Government, the bill ought to provide, 'That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be fitted out an expedition to explore the Pacific Ocean and South Seas; and that the sum of—dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated for that object.' The blank ought to be filled with 45,000 or 50,000 dollars."

On the receipt of this communication from the Secretary, (said Mr. H.,) the committee reported a bill, similar, he believed, in all its provisions, to that now before the Senate, taking the whole matter into the hands of the Government, authorizing the President to cause the expedition to be fitted out, and appropriating 50,000 dollars for that object. The committee reported the bill some time in March, but it was not acted on—Congress being either unwilling to act upon the subject at all, or not having time to do so. Congress having omitted to pass the law, there was, of course, an end of the matter. Within a few days of the close of the session, however, viz: on the 19th of May, a member of the House submitted the following resolutions, which, on the 21st of the same month, were considered and agreed to by that House, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient that one of our small public vessels be sent to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas, to examine the coasts, islands, harbors, shoals, and reefs, in those seas, and to ascertain their true situation and description.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to send one of our small public ships into those seas, for that purpose; and that he be requested to afford such facilities as may be within the reach of the Navy Department, to attain the object proposed: Provided it can be effected without prejudice to the general interest of the naval service; and provided it may be done without further appropriations during the present year.

These resolutions were never sent to the Senate for their concurrence, and consequently could not be considered as sanctioned by Congress. Nevertheless, the Secretary of the Navy had acted upon the subject, in the same manner as he would have done, not only if the resolutions had passed both Houses, but as if the original bill had become a law. The specific appropriations made for the general purposes of the Navy had been applied, at pleasure, towards this object; and now this bill is sent to us for our approbation, going to sanction what had already been done by the Secretary. This was its object. It appeared to the committee as of the last importance that this matter should be carefully looked into. The Senate was a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and no appropriation could legally be made for a public object without their concurrence. Whether appropriations made by law for particular objects should be suffered to be transferred to those which were not authorized by law, was a question which it was desirable to bring to the view of the public. The resolution (Mr. H. said) furnished no authority for what had been done in this case. And he quoted that clause of the constitution which provided that "every order, resolution, or vote," to be obligatory, must have the sanction of both Houses, and be approved by the President. An appropriation bill had no effect, unless passed by both Houses, and approved by the President; and the rule was the same as to resolutions requiring the appropriation of money, or which related to any matter of public concern. But if these resolutions of the House of Representatives could be considered as an authority, they had not been pursued.

Mr. H. then commented on the resolutions passed by the other House, and explained their object. They provided for sending out one of our small vessels, provided it could be done without injury to the public service, and without any increase of expenditure: in other words, that one of our small cruising vessels might be detached on this service. But the measures pursued by the Secretary were the same as if the law now before the Senate had been passed during the last session. It seemed the Secretary had considered the resolution in the light of a law, giving him an unlimited discretion. What had been done? Why, the Peacock had been rebuilt, at an expense probably exceeding the construction of a sloop of war; she had been doubly timbered, and otherwise fitted for this particular service. A brig had been purchased at an expense of ten thousand dollars, (with the understanding, it is true, that, if the expedition was not sent out, she should be taken back by her owners.) A schooner was also to be procured, to serve as a provision ship. An agent had been employed to procure information, at an expense of from five hundred to one thousand dollars; and in addition to the naval officers selected for the service, a scientific corps had been organized: five or six persons, such as an astronomer, a naturalist, a draughtsman, and surveyors, had also been engaged, together with an historiographer. One of these was to make observations on our commerce, another was to write the history of the expedition, &c.

The salaries of these officers, we are informed, would each average about 1,600 dollars per annum—some considerably more, and some less. The mathematical instruments had cost about 2,000 dollars; in addition to which, extra supplies and provisions were to be procured. These were some of the expenditures already contracted for, and incurred, which had been drawn without any lawful authority from the appropriation for the navy. It was important to have full information on this subject; a detailed statement was required of all the actual expenditures which had been made, of the items of which it consisted, as well as the whole amount, and of what would yet be required to cover the whole expense of the expedition. The importance of the exploring expedition was nothing, in comparison with the question—one of the most important that could be discussed—of the power assumed by the Executive to transfer, at pleasure, appropriations made by law to certain objects, to another and distinct object, not having the sanction of Congress. How far Congress would subsequently sanction, and thereby legalize such a practice, was a very important question. We require, before making our appropriations for the naval service of the year, that the estimates shall be submitted to us, down to the smallest contingency; and yet these might always be diverted to other objects.

With regard to this South Polar expedition, he repeated, there was no law to sanction it. Yet the whole country had been led to believe that there was such a law, and the Department had transferred, at pleasure, appropriations made by law to other objects, to fitting out a magnificent expedition. He would call the attention of the Senate to another view of the subject. It was impossible the public should ever know how much this expedition would cost, without calling for this information. He would venture the assertion that, instead of $50,000, it would cost nearer half a million. He had a statement before him—it had been made hastily, and was only an estimate, he admitted—but he believed it was sufficiently accurate at least to serve the purposes of illustration, so as to put this matter in a proper light. First, the Peacock had been rebuilt—at what cost he did not know—but most probably at an increased cost over an ordinary sloop of war. Take the Boston sloop, which was built at one of the cheapest yards in the country, as an example; she cost the Government 96,000 dollars—the Peacock might perhaps be put down at a hundred thousand, when fitted out and fully prepared for sea. A brig had been purchased at 10,000 dollars, and would probably require 5,000 for repairs, and as much more to fit her properly for the expedition. The provision ship, probably 20,000 dollars. The Secretary of the Navy estimates her at 15,000—making 185,000 dollars. The agent 1,000; instruments 2,000 dollars; contingencies 10,000 dollars. Then come the provisions, and support of these vessels at sea. Ordinary sloops of war required, he believed, about 40,000 dollars per annum; schooners, about 20,000 dollars; say, for the three vessels employed, 80,000 dollars; contingencies 10,000, making 100,000 dollars, in round numbers, per annum. It was probable the expedition would not be completed in less than three years, (the Secretary estimates two years and a half,) making 300,000 dollars. Add to this the wear and tear of the vessels, &c., and it would be seen that, before this expedition is completed, the whole expense would probably not fall much short of half a million of dollars. True, the bill appropriates but 50,000 dollars; but this is in addition to what has already been expended, and the sums to be hereafter expended, out of the navy appropriations. He would not pretend this statement was at all accurate, but it was quite sufficient to show that information was wanted from the Department, that we might form some correct idea of the cost to the country of this expedition, in order to determine if it was worth our while to prosecute it.

Mr. H. said that the committee were influenced by these views, in calling for the information required by this resolution. The merits of the expedition were not intended to be now discussed; but, however important it may be considered by some gentlemen, it was deemed more important not to sanction the measures that had been pursued in this business. For himself, he would say, that he considered the plan of the expedition, as disclosed in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, as extremely objectionable. Here was a scientific corps, created by the mere will of an Executive officer, already selected, and only waiting for the passage of this bill to receive their appointments. They were to receive salaries of from 1,500 dollars to 2,000 or 3,000 dollars, and they were to perform duties which would reduce the officers of the navy connected with the expedition to insignificance. The observations—commercial, astronomical, and scientific—were all to be made and reported to Government by these gentlemen, and one of them was finally to write and publish the history of the voyage. What, he would ask, was to be left to the naval officers? They were merely to command the sailors and to navigate the ships. The Captain (as gallant and intelligent an officer as any in the navy service) was to incur all the responsibility, without sharing in the honor that might be acquired. If it should be the opinion of the Senate that this bill ought to pass, and that the expedition be now sent out, for the credit of the Navy he should endeavor to have it put on a better footing. The officers of the navy, as it was at present organized, were to be mere navigators; this did not meet his approbation; he would have them at the head of the expedition; and the scientific corps should be their mere agents and instruments. To the navy should belong the glory of the enterprise, if any glory was to be acquired in it.

The resolution was agreed to.

MR. TAZEWELL, from the Joint Committee appointed for the purpose, reported, in part, the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 11th day of February, 1829, at twelve o'clock; that one person be appointed Teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed Tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce to the two Houses, assembled as aforesaid, the state of the vote, and the person or persons elected, if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States; which communication shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the person or persons elected, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

The report was read and agreed to, and Mr. TAZEWELL was elected Teller on the part of the Senate.

TUESDAY, February 10.

South Carolina Protest against the Tariff of 1828.

MR. SMITH, of South Carolina, presented the following protest of the State of South Carolina, against the system of duties lately established by the Government of the United States:

FEBRUARY, 1829.]

South Carolina Protest against the Tariff of 1828.

[SENATE.]

"The Senate and House of Representatives of South Carolina, now met, and sitting in General Assembly—through the Honorable WILLIAM SMITH, and the Honorable ROBERT Y. HAYNE, their Representatives in the Senate of the United States—do, in the name and on behalf of the good people of the said Commonwealth, solemnly protest against the system of protecting duties lately adopted by the Federal Government, for the following reasons:

"1. Because the good people of this Commonwealth believe that the powers of Congress were delegated to it in trust for the accomplishment of certain specified objects, which limit and control them, and that every exercise of them for any other purpose, is a violation of the constitution, as unwarrantable as the undisguised assumption of substantive independent powers, not granted or expressly withheld.

"2. Because the power to lay duties on imports is, and, in its very nature, can be, only a means of effecting the objects specified by the constitution; since no free Government, and, least of all, a Government of enumerated powers, can, of right, impose any tax, (any more than a penalty,) which is not at once justified by public necessity, and clearly within the scope and purview of the social compact; and since the right of confining appropriations of the public money to such legitimate and constitutional objects is as essential to the liberties of the people, as their unquestionable privilege to be taxed only by their own consent.

"3. Because they believe that the Tariff Law, passed by Congress at its last session, and all other acts of which the principal object is the protection of manufactures, or any other branch of domestic industry—if they be considered as the exercise of a supposed power in Congress, to tax the people at its own good will and pleasure, and to apply the money raised to objects not specified by the constitution—is a violation of these fundamental principles, a breach of a well-defined trust, and a perversion of the high powers vested in the Federal Government for federal purposes only.

"4. Because such acts, considered in the light of a regulation of commerce, are equally liable to objection; since, although the power to regulate commerce, may, like other powers, be exercised so as to protect domestic manufactures, yet it is clearly distinguished from a power to do so eo nomine, both in the nature of the thing and in the common acceptance of the terms; and because the confounding of them would lead to the most extravagant results; since the encouragement of domestic industry implies an absolute control over all the interests, resources, and pursuits, of a people; and is inconsistent with the idea of any other than a simple consolidated Government.

"5. Because, from the coteremporaneous expositions of the constitution, in the numbers of the Federalist, (which is cited only because the Supreme Court has recognized its authority,) it is clear that the power to regulate commerce was considered by the convention as only incidentally connected with the encouragement of agriculture and manufactures; and because the power of laying imposts, and duties on imports, was not understood to justify, in any case, a prohibition of foreign commodities, except as a means of extending commerce, by coercing foreign nations to a fair reciprocity in their intercourse with us, or for some other bona fide commercial purpose.

"6. Because, whilst the power to protect manufactures is nowhere expressly granted to Congress, nor can be considered as necessary and proper to carry into effect any specified power, it seems to be expressly reserved to the States by the tenth section of the first article of the constitution.

"7. Because, even admitting Congress have a constitutional right to protect manufactures by the imposition of duties, or by regulations of commerce, designed principally for that purpose, yet a tariff, of which the operation is grossly unequal and oppressive, is such an abuse of power as is incompatible with the principles of a free Government and the great ends of civil society, justice, and equality of rights and protection.

"8. Finally, because South Carolina, from her climate, situation, and peculiar institutions, is, and must ever continue to be, wholly dependent upon agriculture and commerce, not only for her prosperity, but for her very existence as a State—because the valuable products of her soil, the blessings by which Divine Providence seems to have designed to compensate for the great disadvantages under which she suffers in other respects, are among the very few that can be cultivated with any profit by slave labor; and if, by the loss of her foreign commerce, these products should be confined to an inadequate market, the fate of this fertile State would be poverty and utter desolation; her citizens in despair, would emigrate to more fortunate regions, and the whole frame and constitution of her civil polity be impaired and deranged, if not dissolved entirely.

"Deeply impressed with these considerations, the Representatives of the good people of this Commonwealth, anxiously desiring to live in peace with their fellow-citizens, and to do all that in them lies to preserve and perpetuate the Union of the States, and the liberties of which it is the surest pledge—but feeling it to be their bounden duty to expose and to resist all encroachments upon the true spirit of the constitution, lest an apparent acquiescence in the system of protecting duties should be drawn into precedent, do, in the name of the Commonwealth of South Carolina, claim to enter upon the Journals of the Senate their protest against it, as unconstitutional, oppressive, and unjust.

"HENRY DEAS,

"BENJ. FANEUIL DANKIN,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. S. said that, in presenting this protest, it was not his purpose to go fully into the objections which could be raised against the system, but it was his intention to make a few remarks, suggested by the occasion. South Carolina believed that when, as a sovereign State, she surrendered a portion of her territory, it was for certain and specified objects; and that, when those objects were accomplished, the authority ceded to the General Government was at an end; that any measures pursued beyond the objects first contemplated, was a violation of the compact: It belonged to the States to resume the authority. South Carolina did not assent to the postulate, that the authority was ever delegated to the Government, which the Government had assumed, over individuals and property composing the State. South Carolina had a deep interest in the Government. She had been as patriotic as any State in the Revolutionary contest. In that struggle, she furnished her full proportion of resources; she spilt her due proportion of blood; and in point of privations, waste of property, and individual suffering, there she was without a compeer. She had been content to obey all the requisitions of the General Government, and she had done so, from the reflection that her sufferings were not for the benefit of one member only, but of the whole Union. She had surrendered what, upon the consideration of wealth, would have placed her among the most opulent States in the Union, had she retained it. And she had done it for no other compensation, with no other intention, with no other desire, than her expectation of the protection of the General Government. After that struggle was over, she was an independent sovereign; she owed no allegiance to the Government of the whole, except by the compact to pay her portion of the expenses of the war. She then surrendered to the General Government a part, the profits of which were second to few, if any, in the Union, and which, except for the present circumstances, would be second to but one in the country. All this South Carolina, perfectly informed of the objects to be attained, was willing to yield for the sake of union, and was willing to add her strength to that of the others, that she might have their strength to protect her rights. She surrendered almost every thing in receiving the constitution, and obtained nothing more from the Government, than her own sovereignty already gave her. She gave up her wealth for the security of the other States. South Carolina, in yielding all this, never regretted that she did so, until she found that her rights were not secured as she expected they would be. Laws were passed which restrained her citizens, and discouraged her industry, and her wealth was taken and bestowed upon the citizens of other States. Although suffering all these wrongs, South Carolina never refused the demands of the Government. In the last war, her citizens were not only vigilant to observe the laws themselves, but they used unusual vigilance to defend them against the infractions of others. During seven years of the old war, it was her pride to suffer for the general good; and upon the return of peace, the face of her country was indeed a dreary waste. She had risen again, but after three years of the last war, she was again reduced; your embargo and your non-intercourse laws had prevented her sending out her products; she was obliged to retain them, and on the return of peace a second time, she was again in poverty. News of the peace was received in February, 1815; a law imposing an extra duty for the protection of manufactures dragged on the heels of that declaration. You were then told, for the first time, that there was a great and important manufacturing interest in the country, which called aloud for your protection. Carolina yielded, under the impression that the stipulation was to render protection to any State, even if it was not for the general good. When Congress laid double duties for the protection of the war, and it was with difficulty that you got along with your double duties, when the war was at an end, and the duties to be repealed, you were told that you had committed yourselves—that you were pledged to protect the manufacturers. The double duties were retained. This was yielded to under a pledge that it was only for a few years; that in a short time, the manufacturers of this country would be able to compete with those of other countries; that then the people would be satisfied, and the duties would be reduced. So far from this, the manufactures had increased; the prosperity of one had induced others to embark in the business, and there had been constant applications for new duties, which had been granted. South Carolina has protested against these duties; he did not know that the constitution acknowledged this principle; he did know that the constitution had not lately been looked to. Constitutional arguments had been used, which had never been replied to.

Since the year 1816, there had not been any attempt to increase the duties, which had not been opposed, but had been met by memorials and petitions from South Carolina. To whom had they been referred? To the Committee on Manufactures. Twelve months ago, the Legislature of South Carolina remonstrated, and in strong terms, against any more protecting duties. And this, too, had gone to the Committee on Manufactures. Petition, and remonstrance, and protest, had been presented, and they had all been referred to the Committee on Manufactures. What had been the result? Whether there was no intention to attend to them, when referred, or what motives had actuated them, he did not know, but he had never seen from that committee any detailed report upon what grounds they had considered them, and decided against them. The committee always came in with a bill, or rather an amendment to a bill, putting on additional duties, but never accompanied by any report giving their reasons. They had, in argument, said the good of the country required the additional duty; and, year after year, the memorials from South Carolina had slept in the archives of the Senate, if, indeed, they had ever been honored with a place there. They had been read from the desk of the Secretary when presented, and never seen the light again.

Mr. HAYNE rose and said, that the importance of the subject, and the intense interest it had excited among his constituents, must be his apology for adding a few words to what had fallen from his colleague. He knew that every thing which proceeded from so high a source as one of the sovereign and independent States of this Confederacy, was entitled to receive, and, he trusted, always would receive, the most respectful consideration here. It was not so much, therefore, (said Mr. H.,) to invite the earnest attention of the Senate to this protest, as to do justice to my own feelings, and to fulfil my obligations as one of the Representatives of South Carolina, that I now proceed to make a few remarks, suggested by the occasion.

One of the most unhappy circumstances connected with the present condition of the Southern States was, the great, he might, perhaps, say, the insuperable difficulty of causing their sentiments and feelings to be made known, so as to be understood and appreciated by their fellow-citizens in other quarters of the Union. Viewing the United States as one country, the people of the South might almost be considered as strangers in the land of their fathers. The fruits of their industry had, from the policy pursued by the Federal Government, for many years past, been flowing to the North, in a current as steady and undeviating as the waters of the great Gulf; and as the sources of our prosperity were drying up, that reciprocal intercourse which had softened asperities, and bound the different parts of the country together, in the bonds of common sympathy and affection, had, in a great measure, ceased. That close and intimate communion, necessary to a full knowledge of each other, no longer existed, and in its place there was springing up (it is useless to disguise the truth) among the people in opposite quarters of the Union, a spirit of jealousy and distrust, founded on a settled conviction, on the one part, that they are the victims of injustice, and on the other, that our complaints, if not groundless, may be safely disregarded. The people of the South are well aware of the evils growing out of this unhappy state of things; and of none are they more deeply sensible than that (from causes to which I shall not now advert) the eyes of our brethren have been closed to our true condition, and their hearts shut against our just complaints. Although South Carolina, in common with several of her sister States, had, on former occasions, avowed the principles contained in the protest, yet, it may be well doubted (if we are to judge from what we hear and see around us) whether it is believed, north of the Potomac, that she really entertains them: for, in the face of the solemn declarations of her people, and their Representatives, denouncing the policy pursued by the Federal Government, as involving them in ruin, we still find the public ear abused, and the public mind deluded, by exaggerated statements of our uninterrupted prosperity and happiness. It has ever been innuendated, here, at the very seat of Government, that the enlightened public opinion of the South is in favor of this policy, and that the excitement which prevails there is merely "artificial," if it has not been "got up for party purposes."

Sir, this state of things, let me assure gentlemen, must not be suffered to continue, or it will inevitably lead to the most unhappy consequences. It has become necessary, therefore—indispensably necessary—that the sentiments of our constituents should be expressed in the most deliberate and imposing form, in a manner no longer to be misunderstood or misrepresented. The Legislature of South Carolina, coming directly from the people, have, at their late session, with a unanimity without example, instructed their Senators to lay this their protest before you. In obedience to that command, my colleague and myself here, in our places, in the presence of the Representatives of the several States, and in the face of the whole American people, solemnly protest against the system of protecting duties, as "UNCONSTITUTIONAL, OPPRESSIVE, and UNJUST." We desire that this record may bear witness for us to all future times, that we have earnestly remonstrated with our brethren against the extension of an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us; and with full experience of the ruinous effects of the system of protecting duties, have denounced it as utterly destructive of our interests. The people of South Carolina find themselves impelled, by their attachment to the principles of the constitution, and by a proud recollection of common dangers, and common triumphs, to endeavor to preserve for themselves and their posterity, those rights and privileges secured to them by the great Charter of our Liberties, and consecrated by the blood of our fathers. It is (to use the language of the protest) "because they anxiously desire to live in peace with their brethren, to do all that in them lies to preserve and perpetuate the union of the States, and the liberties of which it is the surest pledge," that they now protest against a system, which not only aims a fatal blow at the prosperity of South Carolina, (dependent as she must ever continue upon agriculture and commerce,) but which threatens her very existence as a State.

Mr. DICKERSON, in reply to the remarks of Mr. SMITH, upon the Committee on Manufactures, showed that the State of South Carolina had never experienced the least disrespect in regard to her memorials; but they had been printed, and were on file.

Mr. SMITH said, if the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures would show him a succinct report upon these memorials, he would ask the gentleman's pardon. He meant to make no reflections upon that committee.

Mr. DICKERSON replied, that he considered reporting a bill as reporting against the remonstrances.

The protest was then ordered to be printed.

At twelve o'clock the members of the Senate repaired to the chamber of the House of Representatives, where the votes were counted, and the Vice President made proclamation of the result. [See the proceedings of the House of Representatives of this day.] After returning to the Senate chamber,

Mr. TAZEWELL said, the joint committee appointed for that purpose had ascertained and reported the result of the election for President, and had directed him to move that a committee of one be appointed to joint a committee on the part of the House, to inform Andrew Jackson that he has this day been elected President of the United States.

Mr. TAZEWELL was then chosen the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred certain resolutions on the 12th of January last, in relation to the Sinking Fund and the public debt, made a report thereon.

On motion of Mr. SILSBEE, it was ordered that one thousand extra copies be printed.

Mr. McLANE said that, while he had no objection to the printing, he owed to himself to state that, to the conclusion of the report on the first resolution to which it related, he dissented from a majority of the committee. The report in regard to the other resolutions, independent of its reasoning and the grounds on which the conclusions were predicated, had his assent. Without detaining the Senate at this time, he would take the opportunity of explaining his views at large when the report should be called up for the consideration of the Senate.

TUESDAY, February 24.

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved that all the orders of the day, previous to bill No. 91, be postponed, and that the Senate take up that bill, entitled "An act to authorize a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

Mr. BENTON and Mr. HAYNE opposed the motion as calculated to derange the order of business, as an unfair course towards other very important measures, which would be delayed, and as altogether unparliamentary.

Mr. BENTON expressed himself with much warmth in relation to bills which he had reported, and in which he felt an interest, and concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, which were ordered, and were as follows—yeas 19, nays 18.

So it was decided that the bill "to authorize a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company" should have the preference; and that bill was accordingly taken up.

Mr. TAZEWELL stated that he had received, from the Directors of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, a memorial of a nature similar to the one upon which this bill was founded, and which he had not presented to the Senate, because he had not anticipated the course which had just been pursued by the Senate, and had therefore concluded that no measure of the kind could pass through both Houses at the present session. It was due to a portion of the citizens he represented to present and press this measure upon the attention of the Senate; he should press it to a certain point, and there he should leave it, because he was opposed to the whole system, from the beginning to the end. He now, therefore, moved a recommitment of this bill, in order that an amendment might be made to it to include a subscription for a certain number of shares of the Dismal Swamp Canal, and the two could go together. It was well known what his opinions were; he should vote against the bill, if the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS hoped the bill would not be recommitted for any such purpose, and he knew no argument so strong against the measure as that, if it was recommitted, it would not be reached again during the present session. He hoped the motion would not be adopted, because the effect would be to destroy both measures.

Mr. TAZEWELL had but one remark to make. It was well known that it was the general opinion, that, during the short session of Congress no business of this kind would be acted upon. When he received the memorial in question, he entertained this opinion, and having no conception that the Senate of the United States would postpone all their orders of the day for the purpose of taking up particular bills, he had not presented it. He now, however, had felt it to be his duty to make the motion to include a subscription for stock to the Dismal Swamp Canal, in the present bill, and the Senate might dispose of it as they pleased.

Mr. NOBLE said, if gentlemen were decidedly opposed to a measure upon constitutional principles, he could not see the propriety of their moving amendments to bills for the purpose of destroying them, saying, at the same time, that they should vote against the bill, even if their amendment prevailed. If the gentleman from Virginia was unwilling to spend the public money for great national objects, why could he not let the people of Delaware and of Pennsylvania, who had no such scruples, enjoy the benefits of the system? For himself, when he was opposed to an object, he placed his vote and his remarks directly in opposition to that object, and did not endeavor to destroy a bill by indirect means.

Mr. TAZEWELL, in reply, repeated, that it was not supposed business of this kind would be acted upon at the short session; accordingly, he had exercised the sound discretion of a Representative of the people, and supposing it impossible to pass the measure, he had not proposed it. The Senator from Delaware, in receiving a memorial from the directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, thought differently; he had presented it, and it had been acted upon. He had no other course than the one he had pursued; and when gentlemen accused him of resorting to indirect measures, they most unquestionably did him injustice. He should vote against this bill, and he should vote against all propositions of the kind, whatever quarter they came from. There were certain States that entertained the belief, and they had avowed it, that there was such a thing as State sovereignty; their Representatives in Congress, upon the pledge of gentlemen, had said that they entertained the same belief; and what did it come to? Gentlemen say, if you entertain the opinion that you have no right to this money, give us, who entertain different opinions, all the revenue we can apply to these objects; and, for God's sake, continue in the same opinion, that there may be fewer to divide the spoil. He represented a country which had lived heretofore without the aid of the General Government. The opinions they entertained upon this and some other subjects they had taken up maturely and deliberately; we have always gone together, and we shall always entertain them. We will continue to live without the aid of this Government; we will turn neither to the right hand nor to the left in relation to this subject; and we will neither bend the knee nor doff the cap to obtain aid from this or any other administration.

Mr. McLANE said he did not design to impute to the gentleman from Virginia the use of indirect means for the purpose of killing the bill; he had only stated that such would be the effect of the measure, if adopted; he had only said, if it was recommitment, it was rejected; and if there should be a failure of both measures, who was gratified? Why, the gentleman from Virginia; because, from his motion to amend, the bill was killed entirely. He read from the journal to show, that, when this bill was originally before Congress, the gentleman from Virginia had made a motion similar to that which he had made to-day, which had been rejected.

Mr. WEBSTER said he felt bound to say, he could see nothing exceptionable, or out of the common course, in the measure proposed by the gentleman from Virginia; and, although he should not vote with him, yet it seemed that this method of killing the bill was perfectly natural, perfectly parliamentary, and perfectly fair. Every amendment, whether proposed by those opposed to the bill or not, was worthy of the consideration and respect of the Senate; and there was nothing more conformable to parliamentary usage and practice, than, when a measure was on its passage, for those opposed to it to propose amendments, to make it better and more agreeable to their notions, and finally, to vote against them. It was perfectly natural, parliamentary, and just, for the gentleman from Virginia, holding the opinions he did, to call for the same bounty; for he (Mr. TAZEWELL) considered it bounty, for his constituents, that was given to other people.

He thought the importance of the measure proposed by the gentleman from Virginia such as entitled it to separate consideration, and therefore should vote against including it in this bill. He should act upon this bill as if it had come up in the regular order. The Corporation had applied to the Government for its assistance; their memorial had been received, referred to a committee of the Senate, and a bill introduced; and the proposition was, to suspend this bill, until another public work, in another part of the country, could be included in it. The work was to be considered of equal public importance, but there was no connection between them in the nature of things. There was a general resemblance, but the facts upon which an opinion was to be exercised, might be very different. The inclusion of another subject, which had not been introduced into either branch of the Legislature, did not appear to him a sufficient reason for postponing this bill. It was of high importance that, if passed at all, it should pass at the present session; it was now near the commencement of the working season, and if it was not passed now, the work would be delayed another year. In his judgment, the Government would be able, in a few years, to dispose of their property in that work, and he hoped without much sacrifice, and apply the proceeds to some other work. He hoped they would keep the two measures separate, and dispose of this bill now, upon its own merits.

Mr. TAZEWELL rose to a point of order. He inquired whether, if he offered an amendment with a blank in it, the blank could be filled hereafter?

Being answered in the affirmative, he withdrew his motion to re-commit, and offered the following amendment:

"Sec. 3d. Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to subscribe for _____ shares in the capital stock of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company: and

"Sec. 4th, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to vote for officers of the corporation.

The yeas and nays were taken on the amendment, and were—yeas 18, nays 28.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bouigny, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Dudley, Eaton, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Webster, Willey—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Foot, Hayne, Iredell, Knight, Prince, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury—15.

THURSDAY, February 26.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

The bill from the House of Representatives,

"to amend an act, entitled 'An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war,' and the several acts made in amendment thereof, and for other purposes," was read the first time; and the yeas and nays were called for on ordering it to a second reading.

Mr. CHANDLER stated his reasons for the vote he should give on this question. The session was near its close; the bill was of an important nature, and required due consideration; there was not sufficient time to give it that attention which its importance demanded.

Mr. MARKS thought that a proper courtesy to the other House required the Senate to have the bill read a second time and referred. It was true, there was already much business before the Committee on Pensions; nevertheless, if the bill was referred to them, they would give it a careful examination, though he was fearful it could not be acted upon during the present session.

Mr. NOBLE was of opinion that there would be no want of courtesy to the other House in laying the bill on the table, if there was not sufficient time for the Senate to act upon it. If such was the fact, it might as well be laid upon the table at once, and he therefore made that motion.

The motion prevailed—yeas 26, nays 17.
So the bill was virtually rejected.

Officers of the Revolution, &c.

The bill for the relief of sundry Revolutionary and other officers and soldiers, and for other purposes, was taken up, and the amendments of the committee were considered.

Mr. MARKS, in explanation of the bill, said he supposed it was unnecessary to go into a detailed statement in relation to all the cases contained. The sum which would be required, he had ascertained would be about fifteen thousand six hundred dollars; but a great number of the persons named, probably two-thirds of them, might be placed upon the pension roll without the necessity of a separate bill. There were some names upon the list of individuals who did not belong to the regular army of the United States. The reason why they were placed there was, that several States had troops called the troops of the State, which were at times called into the general service, some of whom served three or four years. None of these State troops, however, had been admitted, unless they had served at least nine months under the orders of the Continental officers. There was one question upon which the committee were divided. It would be seen that the pensions all commenced on the first of January, 1828. The committee, not being able to agree, had concluded to leave it for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that he considered the admission of the cases mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as an innovation upon the regular pension system of the United States. The law of 1818 admitted none upon the rolls who were not in the Continental service at the end of the war. It had been an established principle to admit none who were not regular Continental soldiers. He could not see why, at this late day, when the laws provided for all who were in need of assistance, they should be called upon to legislate for particular and individual cases every year.

Mr. MARKS replied, that the committee had been very particular as to the kind of service; and, whenever it had been in the militia service, they had stricken the name off. He introduced a letter from the head of the Pension Bureau, in the War Department, stating what individuals came in for pensions, and under what rules. There were but few in the bill of the State troops, but the committee were satisfied that they had rendered very important services to the United States; and, although they had not heretofore been admitted, yet their claim was such as could not, in equity, be resisted. He was not certain about the number, but he believed not more than eight or ten.

Mr. HAYNE inquired the amount which would probably be called for annually by this bill.

Mr. MARKS replied, that since the adoption of the several names by the Senate, it would probably amount to 15,800 dollars.

Mr. HAYNE said he had moved an adjournment in order that he might look into the bill; but as the Senate had refused him the opportunity, he must state some of the reasons which induced him to oppose the bill. It appeared to him one of the most extraordinary bills which had ever been before Congress. They were asked to grant pensions to a hundred individuals mentioned by name. Was it usual to put names upon the pension roll without any reference to the grounds upon which they were admitted, or others rejected? The Senate knew nothing about these individuals. He believed this very bill had been before the Senate at the last session, and he did not know but the session before, and he well remembered that the Chairman of the Committee on Pensions last year stated that the principles of this bill were new and unknown to the Pension Law. What had been the practice of the Senate? If there was any new principle, he wished to have it placed before them; he wished some report upon it, and he wished to have it placed upon record, why A, B, C, down to Z, and to the end of the chapter, were placed upon the roll, when, as the chairman of the committee said, it was not according to the rule. True, the committee said they had examined the cases, and thought such and such persons ought to have pensions, and that such and such should be exempted from the general operation of the rule. Now, he wished to form his own opinion upon that subject.

Upon an examination of the bill, it appeared, by one section, that a pension was to be given, to the child of an individual who was a soldier in the last war for five years. No reason was given why this child should have a pension, and he could only conclude that all the children of all the soldiers of the last war were to have pensions for five years. By another section, a pension was granted to the widow of a soldier. It was not stated why; and, therefore, all the widows of soldiers will have an equal claim, and all receive pensions. Still, by another section, a pension was granted to the legal representatives of a soldier deceased. Were all representatives and descendants of deceased soldiers to have pensions? There was nothing said about it; there was a law stating certain individuals by name who were to have pensions, and for no apparent reasons, except that they were the children, widows, and representatives of soldiers. There was one case stated of a man who had performed certain services, and who was a lunatic, and his representatives were to have the pension for his use. There he knew something about it; the case was stated.

FEBRUARY, 1829.]

Instructions to Panama Ministers.

[SENATE.]

He begged gentlemen would not understand that this sum was to pay for all the claims under this law. This 15,000 dollars was not to pay all these demands. Gentlemen knew very well what was done to-day was precedent to-morrow, and principle the next day; and, hereafter, whenever an individual wanted a pension, he had only to declare that he had performed services, to put his finger on some name in this bill, call his situation similar, and he could not be refused, and the amount would swell, until neither fifteen thousand nor fifteen millions of dollars would satisfy the demands.

Mr. BAXTON called for an adjournment; which was carried.

SATURDAY, February 28.

Instructions to Panama Ministers.

The following resolution, offered last evening by Mr. WEBSTER, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, confidentially, and in its Executive character, copies of the instructions given to the Ministers of the United States to the Congress of Panama; and of the communications of the other Governments represented at that Congress, to the Government of the United States; or so much thereof as may be communicated without detriment to the public interest."

[The words first italicized were inserted during the debate, and those last in italics, or words to that effect, were of course stricken out.]

Mr. TAZEWELL said he should like to hear some reason why, at this late period of the session, this subject, formerly productive of so much excitement and discussion, was again brought forward.

Mr. WEBSTER said it was for the very reason indicated in the remark of the Senator from Virginia, that he had offered the resolution. The subject of the Panama Mission, while it lasted, was highly interesting. It would be very interesting to know the results of that mission, so far as it had any results. His object was simply, as stated in the resolution, to make public all the proceedings of the Executive on this matter, if they could be published without prejudice to the public interest. It was a transaction that had passed by, and become a part of the diplomatic history of the country. He had nothing in view except information, and there would be no expense except that of the publication.

Mr. TAZEWELL replied, that it was of little consequence what the object was; the course pursued was incorrect. Here was a President who had only three days to serve, and the Senate were required to make a call upon him for important public documents, relating to the foreign intercourse of the country, and which had never been published. He thought it better to wait a few days, and then make the call upon the then Executive. These instructions might contain matter which it was improper to have go before the public: they related to the policy of the country, which it would not, perhaps, be prudent to expose to the eyes of other nations. He objected to the call being made at this time, because, if important secrets should be brought to light, the responsibility of the course would not light upon the present Executive, and might embarrass the next. He objected to the manner in which the resolution was expressed. It was left to the judgment of the President to say how much of the instructions should be made public, after all the responsibility had been removed from him, and he could publish just as much or just as little as he pleased. He thought it more proper for the next administration to make the selection, when they could bear the responsibility of their own acts. He considered it incorrect, and dangerous.

Mr. WEBSTER said he saw no good reason why the motion should not be made now, as well as three days hence. The Senator from Virginia seemed to go upon the ground that the same discretion would not be exercised by the present Executive, as would be exercised, three days hence, by the next. This he did not believe: for the Executive was as much bound to answer the call of the Senate for information at the present time as at any other, and to exercise its discretion. The object was, as he had stated, simply that the Executive might have an opportunity to publish these instructions, as a vindication of its own conduct, in a measure upon which its policy had not only been doubted, but its motives had been very much censured, and very much assailed. The injunction of secrecy having been removed from the proceedings of the Senate, the views of the Senators who opposed it, and the messages of the Executive upon the subject, had long since been made public. Now, he wished the instructions given to the Ministers should be revealed, and then the whole facts would be placed before the people, for them to judge. He could see no objection to this. The resolution, as a means of getting the information, was a common course, it was proposed in the common manner, and it seemed to be but an act of common justice, that the administration should be allowed the opportunity of setting themselves right in the estimation of the public. He called for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HAYNE objected to the resolution on account of its terms, and also because it properly belonged to the Executive business of the Senate, and ought to be submitted to the Senate when acting in its Executive capacity. The resolution did not call for all the information connected with the subject, but only for so much as, in the opinion of the President, might be communicated without injury to the public service. It was true that this was a discretion necessary to be exerted by the President in all cases where a public call was made for documents connected with the diplomatic relations of the country, but this only demonstrates the necessity of making the call under circumstances which will entitle the Senate to receive all the information connected with the subject, thus enabling us to determine, according to our discretion, whether the whole may not be made public without detriment to the interests of the country. He would not be satisfied, in this case, with being told that it was not to be presumed, that in making this communication to Congress, the President would not exercise his discretion discreetly, prudently, and honestly. It was sufficient that, as the resolution now stood, the public might be presented with an imperfect and partial view of the subject. It may be that a portion of the instructions and communications cannot be prudently published; and it may also happen that the suppression of these parts may present an imperfect or a garbled view of the subject, one calculated to make a false impression on the public mind. In matters of opinion, man, with the best intentions and entirely free from party feelings, may be led into errors. The President may think on this subject very differently from the Senate. He may deem communications unimportant which the Senate may suppose to be very material, or he may believe that matters cannot be safely disclosed, which we may consider altogether harmless, and, perhaps, indispensable to the clear understanding of the whole subject. What is the result of our own experience in the very case before us? When the Panama Mission was first brought before the Senate, the President communicated certain documents and information, which he considered all that was necessary to give a full view of the character and objects of the mission. Now it so happened, that that portion of the Senate with which it was his pride to have acted on that occasion, did believe that very material information was withheld—information which was drawn out by the calls subsequently made on the Executive, and which, in his opinion, entirely changed the aspect of the affair. The truth is, that the Panama Mission, as presented to the Senate by the first Message of the President, was a measure of a very different character from that which was, at a later period, presented to this House, and which differed still more from the same measure when it got into the House of Representatives. And who could tell what may be its character as disclosed by the communications which may now be made in answer to this call. The object of every gentleman ought to be to disclose the whole truth. He, therefore, protested against any call on the Executive which should fall short of a full disclosure of every fact, and a communication of every document connected with the subject. When these should be communicated, the Senate would be able to form an opinion whether the whole could be made public without injury to the public service, and if not, whether the publication of any part could take place, without conveying an erroneous impression of the facts. He had no objection to the publication of every thing connected with the Panama Mission, feeling, as he did, the perfect assurance that the more the subject was discussed and examined, the more clearly it would appear that it was a wild, visionary, or dangerous project. But it was obvious that the resolution now before the Senate, restricted as it is, puts every thing in the power of the President, and leaves it to his discretion to bring the subject before the world in any way he may think proper. To this, from the experience of the Senate on this subject, he for one was not willing to give his assent. For the purpose, therefore, of enabling the Senator from Massachusetts to bring this motion before the Senate when acting in its Executive character, thereby to enable us to receive all the documents connected with the subject, in order that we may exercise our own discretion in making the whole or any part of it public, he would now move to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was withdrawn at the request of Mr. WEBSTER. He said it was unnecessary to repeat the object he had in view in introducing this resolution; he had already stated his motives, and he had not anticipated the least objection to its passage. While the subject of the Panama Mission was before Congress, great alarm had been spread through the country in relation to it. Great fears were either felt or feigned, both in and out of Congress, that the objects of the Executive were not correct, that the measure was unconstitutional, and the ministers appointed might compromise the honor of the country. He wished to ascertain how far those fears were justified; he cared not in what form the information was obtained; this was a common and a convenient one. Gentlemen who had expressed their views and apprehensions, would not, surely, now that their fears had gone forth to the world under the sanction of their own names, now that the measure had produced all the effects it could produce upon the public, prevent those who thought differently from giving their views. While their fears in relation to these instructions had been published, gentlemen could not in justice keep the facts, the real instructions, locked up. He cared not for the time when the call was made; he hoped it would be made as soon as might be, and if gentlemen objected to the manner of the call, he was willing to meet all their views, if it was possible; he was willing the instructions should be required confidentially, and that the whole should be required: he, therefore, moved a modification of the resolution, by inserting "confidentially," and striking out the last clause.

Mr. HAYNE said he preferred proceeding in the usual course. It was altogether an Executive matter, and should be made and received in their Executive character.

Mr. WEBSTER was willing to, and did, modify the resolution still farther, by the insertion of the words "in its Executive character."

Mr. HAYNE said he would still prefer the ordinary course.

Mr. BENTON said he could conceive of no difficulty which would arise from the form of the call. The documents would be marked confidential, and would be opened in secret session.

Mr. TAKEWELL remarked, that the original defect of the resolution could not be removed. He cared not in what form, or when it was moved; he would oppose it. The reason for the call was avowed to be to give the Executive an opportunity to publish its views on a matter which has been discussed and was at an end. If the President wishes to make his views public, let him do it. If he wishes to publish the documents, let him do it. It would be necessary for us to pass this resolution, if we wish to force from him documents which would inculcate him, and which he chose to keep back; but it is unnecessary for us to pass a resolution for the purpose of enabling him to publish documents which he might wish to publish. The object is, to ease the President by the interposition of this body. The President having but two or three days of office, will feel but little responsibility for the effect of the publication; but shall we assist him to do it, who have six years of responsibility? But, if all this be done, what is to be the result? Are you to take up this business again, and follow it through all the mutations of the Executive will? Are the "fears, felt or feigned," by those who opposed the Panama Mission, to be pronounced unfounded, because they are not justified by the instructions given after those "fears, felt or feigned," were expressed? Are those instructions to be given to the public now, to expound what occurred six months before the instructions were written? I cannot speak intelligibly to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He was not in this body at the time alluded to. But my brethren, said Mr. T., on my right and left, saw the monstrous project as it was first brought before us.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that nothing was farther from his expectation, than that a resolution calling for information, a motion so constitutional, so conformable to the practice of both Houses, and often so necessary, should have met with opposition, or produced debate. He wished for no contention; he courted no controversy. He had no desire to create new, or to revive old topics of dispute. It had not occurred to him that any such consequence would naturally follow from this resolution; and it would not escape observation, that, after the modification of it had taken place, he had been asked to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, upon the supposition, doubtless, that no opposition was intended. But the affair, it seems, had taken another turn. But, whatever course the discussion should take, he should not imitate the example of wandering into extraneous and irrelevant matter. Still less should he attack individuals, or allude to occurrences no way connected with this subject, for the purpose of making personal observations or inflicting pain. He intended, on this and other occasions, to discharge his public duties with decorum towards all public men, and with abstinence from asperity and personal vituperation and reproach. As to the resolution itself, common justice required its adoption. The resolution, as originally framed, requested that the instructions to our Ministers at Panama should be communicated to us, so far as the public service would properly allow them to be made public. This was the usual course. It was customary in re, and in relation to all negotiations, either pending or closed. How long was it since a member from Maine had made a similar call for the correspondence of our commissioners under the treaty of Ghent? This call had been made for the purpose of publishing that correspondence, although it related to a question of great importance still pending; nevertheless, it was readily acceded to, or, according to usage, it was limited by reference to the discretion of the President.

Mr. BENTON would vote differently on this occasion from what he would if the present administration were to continue in power. If they were to continue, he would struggle to the uttermost to have all the instructions communicated confidentially to the Senate; those who had opposed the mission to Panama might also have an opportunity of endeavoring to get all they conceived material before the public. But this administration was not to continue. It went out of power in three days, and could gain nothing by making an imperfect communication: for the new administration would immediately have it in its power to show any thing that might be left behind. If it should turn out to be the fact, that the President had dropped, or modified, when he came to give his instructions, any of the objects originally communicated to the Senate, it would be a high compliment to the nineteen Senators who opposed the mission, and, for that reason, were so often denounced for a factious and unprincipled opposition. To authorize the publication (if the authority was necessary) seemed to be an act of courtesy, perhaps of justice, to a retiring administration; if a partial publication was made, it would be corrected in a few days, and no advantage would be gained to one side, or injury done to the other, where the correction would be so prompt.

Mr. McKINLEY said, the proposition seemed to him to be perfectly fair. But he was not here when the subject was discussed by the Senate, and could not, therefore, be aware of the difficulty said to exist in the consideration of the proposition with open doors. It seemed to him that the proposition had better be made in secret session, and he would move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 22.

Inauguration of the President Elect.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he had been anxious to move a resolution, which he read.

The Chair stated that he had received a letter from the President elect on the subject to which the gentleman had referred.

The following communication from the President elect was read:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, March 2d, 1829.

SIR: Through you I beg leave to inform the Senate, that, on Wednesday, the 4th instant, at 12 o'clock, I shall be ready to take the oath prescribed by the constitution, previously to entering on a discharge of my official duties, and at such place as the Senate may think proper to designate.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

J. C. CALHOUN,

Vice President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH offered his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be a committee appointed to make the necessary preparations and arrangements for the inauguration of the President elect, on the 4th of March, 1829, and to apprise him of the same.

The resolution was adopted, and a committee of three members ordered, consisting of Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, WHITE, and CHANDLER.

Documents—Panama Mission.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

WASHINGTON, 3d March, 1829.

I transmit herewith to Congress, a copy of the instructions prepared by the Secretary of State, and furnished to the Ministers of the United States appointed to attend at the Assembly of American Plenipotentiaries, first held at Panama, and thence transferred to Tacubaya. The occasion for which they were given has passed away, and there is no present probability of the renewal of those negotiations; but the purpose for which they were intended are still of the deepest interest to our country and to the world, and may hereafter call again for the active energies of the Government of the United States. The motive for withholding them from general publication having ceased, justice to the Government from which they emanated, and to the people for whose benefit it was instituted, requires that they should be made known. With this view, and from the consideration that the subjects embraced by those instructions must probably engage hereafter the consideration of our successors, I deem it proper to make this communication to both Houses of Congress. One copy only of the instructions being prepared, I send it to the Senate, requesting that it may be transmitted also to the House of Representatives.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Mr. TAZEWELL moved the reference of the Message and papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The reference was ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that the Message and documents be printed.

Mr. TAZEWELL, in opposition to the motion, asked if the Senate was willing to give to the world, without previous examination, the secret instructions of the Government. This proposition was made here a few days ago by a Senator from Massachusetts, in a resolution. It was suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, that the documents should come to the Senate confidentially, and in secret session. The mover himself became satisfied of the impropriety of receiving them in any other way than with closed doors, and he modified his resolution accordingly. What then? The Senate determined not to make a call for documents on a President having but three days to live, and the resolution was laid on the table. Although the mover declared that he had no knowledge of the President's intentions or wishes in regard to the publication of these papers, yet, the resolution having been rejected, the President, uncalled, obtrudes the secret documents on the Senate. After these documents had been referred to a committee, to be examined and to be published or withheld, at their discretion, the Senator from Maryland, though he knows nothing of their contents, proposes to publish them to the world. Mr. T. hoped that the Senate would examine before they promulgated documents sent hither in the last moment of the expiring political life of the President.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he was greatly surprised at the opposition made to the motion to print. He regretted the absence from his chair of his friend from Massachusetts,* (Mr. W.), who had introduced the resolution referred to by the Senator from Virginia, because he did not understand the motives or the objects of that resolution to have been those which that Senator now expressed them to be. He had not understood the mover of the resolution to intimate, and certainly in the remarks which he himself had made in support of that resolution, he had not intimated, his motive and object to be to purify the present Executive, or to rekindle the flames of party animosity. When that resolution was introduced, it was objected by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) that the information asked for should be sent to the Senate in secret session, in Executive session, and other exceptions were taken to its language. The mover of the resolution acquiesced in all the suggestions of amendment, and modified his proposition accordingly. It was for the avowed purpose of conciliating the views, and subduing opposition, that the modifications were adopted, and not as the Senator from Virginia suggests, because the mover of the resolution deemed it proper to have the Senate in Executive session to receive the communication. He had admired, although he believed he could not have imitated, the conciliatory temper of his honorable friend who had moved the resolution, in yielding to the modifications proposed, when he was yet convinced that, in its original form, the proposition ought not to have received opposition. Yet what was the event? A strong and animated appeal was made by the Senators from Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia, and ultimately the resolution was defeated by a vote to lay it on the table.

It has been said the President has obtruded papers on the Senate containing secrets of the Government. What justifies this remark? Does the Senator know the contents of the papers, and from such knowledge assert their character? Does he not assume an appellate power over the opinion of the Executive? Does he not refuse to the President the exercise of concurrent and co-ordinate power vested by the constitution? The Executive has the right to make public his official acts. By sending his communications to Congress, he does publish to them and to the world, and this body has no right to lay hands on official papers in transitu, and smother them by sending them to a committee room, and refusing to print them.

Mr. BERRIEN had no wish, he said, to inquire into the motives of the President, or of individuals, in regard to this subject; but this last motion forcibly reminds us of the circumstances under which the original motion was introduced. The question upon the resolution was not whether the documents should be published, but whether we should, gratuitously, evoke them from the President, and give them publicity. The same argument which he opposed to the call for the papers, he would now oppose to the motion to print them. He would exclude all consideration of the motives of these motions, but look at their effects. The effect of both motions was to draw distinctly the lines of parties. Gentlemen avail themselves of the very few moments in which they can have access to the public armory, to arm themselves for another contest. He did not fear their weapons. They had been found powerless for defence; they would be found equally so for offence. The object of the motion made the other day was declared to be not the justification of the President, though that, it was said, would be its effect, but to justify to gentlemen their own course. The real object which gentlemen had in reviving the discussion of the merits of this contemned and exploded political speculation was to enable them, in their retirement, or in legislative halls, to renew the political conflict in which they had so lately been defeated. But this weapon would not aid them, sir, (said Mr. B.,) it is not for me to distrust the declarations of gentlemen. I am not disposed, on this occasion, to urge the argument of "post hoc ergo propter hoc," but how soon had these several acts, tending to the same object, followed each other. In the earliest possible moment after the rejection of the original proposition, this message was received, and it was immediately followed by a motion of an extraordinary character. The President, in the exercise of a power not denied to him, has sent to us the documents in such haste, that the clerks could not furnish a copy of them. But one set was furnished, which we were required to send to the House of Representatives. Is this usual? The President should have put both Houses in possession of the document, and he cannot make us his agents in their communication to the other House. But is there any thing unusual in resisting the proposition to print the papers? Only one copy was sent, and that was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Was there any proof that we were disposed to withhold the documents from publication? Why were they not printed? Because they should first be examined by the committee, and should go to the public accompanied by a report from the committee. The bane and the antidote should be administered together. But he would ask if the President would not lay these documents before the public. It was in his power to do whatever he wished with them; nor would it be a new case, should he open the secret drawers of the State Department to make public such of their contents as he thought proper.

The instructions to Mr. Cook were given to the public by the President after they had been refused to the House of Representatives. With my assent, no act of ours shall sanction the publication of these papers. They were in a condition to get before the public without our agency. He would not consent to be made the agent in drawing from the Department of State, and in publishing, the history of an ill-fated measure, which had long distracted the American people, and which was only called for with a view to revive and continue those distractions.

Mr. HOLMES said he had been opposed to the Panama mission; for he suspected it would come to no good, and he had feared it might produce mischief. His maxims were "to let well enough alone," and "if you could not see where to go, nor what to do, it was safest to stand still, and do nothing." But others thought well of it; public opinion was divided, and, the mission being established, and the Ministers appointed, I (said Mr. H.) could not withhold the appropriation for their compensation. The President has communicated to us the instructions to those Ministers, and the proposition is to print the documents for the use of the Senate, confidentially. The whole affair is over and finished, and we not only refuse the public the information, but we are afraid to trust ourselves.

Sir, it is a grave question, whether we have the power to arrest here a communication sent to the House of Representatives through us. The President has sent information to both Houses, requesting us to transmit it to the House. It is a usual course, and when the documents are voluminous, it is almost always done. It has been admitted that the President has, himself, the right to make public the whole transaction; and yet we are so fastidious that we apprehend danger even to trust ourselves with reading the communication. They are to be looked up in the bureau of the Committee of Foreign Relations; and until these confidential gentlemen have examined them, we are not to have a sight of them. The result is, that we are to interpose to shut out from the public that information which the President himself, on his own responsibility, has a right to give. Sir, I opposed the mission, and still believe I was right; but instead of refusing, I will facilitate every thing which may go to show me in the wrong. I am not afraid nor ashamed to hear and publish any man's doctrines in opposition to my own. It is, moreover, made the duty of the President, by the constitution, to make this communication. "He shall from time to time," that is, when, on his own responsibility, he deems it expedient, "communicate to Congress the state of the Union." A transaction affecting essentially the state of the Union is communicated, and we, the Senate, even with closed doors, are neither permitted to hear or see it. Is it material that the committee shall detain these documents, that their answer shall go out simultaneously? Public opinion is not to be forestalled: for the people of these United States will hear the whole before they decide. But if we are, indeed, afraid to trust them, it is a little singular that we should be afraid to trust ourselves.

Mr. HAYNE rose in reply to Mr. CHAMBERS and Mr. HOLMES, and said that, if the President desired to give to the world his instructions to the Ministers to the Congress of Panama, on his own responsibility, he, as a member of the Senate, could have no objection to his doing so, be the President influenced by what motives he may. But, when the attempt was made to convert this House into the mere instrument for the accomplishment of such a purpose, he felt disposed to pause and inquire into the object intended to be accomplished by the proceeding. If the President desired to shift the responsibility of laying before the world, documents which, by the practice of all Governments, are usually locked up in the archives of the country, it was at least necessary that the Senate should know precisely the character of the papers which they were called upon to print, in order that they might judge how far it was proper for them to assume the responsibility thus attempted to be thrown upon them. The usual and proper mode of proceeding was, to do, what had been done in this case—to refer the Message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations for examination; and if, after they shall have been examined, it should appear that they contain nothing which can compromise the character, or affect the future policy of this country, he, for one, would have no objection to print, and circulate them as widely as the President or his friends could desire. Those Senators who had opposed the Panama mission from the beginning, could have no possible objection to the publication of every thing calculated to afford correct information concerning that wild and visionary project. But at the same time, it is due (said Mr. H.) to ourselves and to the country, that we should clearly understand the true character of these documents, before we take upon ourselves the task of ushering them before the world on our responsibility. The President might have caused them to be printed and circulated without sending them here; but, as he is determined to send them out under the authority of the Senate, it is proper that we should resort to the usual means for obtaining authentic information as to the true character of the documents, in order to determine the course proper to be pursued in relation to them.

Having referred the Message, therefore, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject appropriately belonged, it would be entirely out of the usual course, and as it appears to me, highly improper to order them to be printed, or to adopt any other measure in relation to them, until we should have the result of the examination to which they would be subjected by that committee.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he was unable to discover the force of the objection urged by the Senator from South Carolina. A pervading error ran through his whole argument. The Senator assumes the contents of the papers to be such as to render their publication improper. The obvious answer to this was that the constitution had made the President the judge of that matter: it gave to him the power to divulge to Congress, and to the public, what, on his responsibility, he might think it safe and proper to communicate. It did not give to the Senate an appellate power over his judgment. The Senate was no more the constitutional guardian of the President than of the House of Representatives. But this doctrine, practically carried out, would make it the guardian of both. When the President sends a message to the House, we are first to examine whether it is discreet in him to send it; and this kindly office being performed to him, we are then to ascertain whether it is discreet to allow the House to receive his Message. Sir, if such powers be assumed by the Senate, who is to assign limit to them? What becomes of the co-ordinate branches of your Government? What becomes of the constitution? The Senate will be your Government, and all other departments its dependents.

These documents do not belong to you alone. They are equally the property of the other House; and they are now made public; and, therefore, their contents are the property of the public. Has not any member, at this instant, the right to go to your file, transcribe any part, or the whole of their contents, and publish them in the newspaper, without violating any rule of the Senate, any rule of law, or any rule of propriety? Certainly he has. It was altogether unimportant what were the contents of the papers. They were already public, and on the responsibility of the President. The instrumentality of the Senate was not asked or required, and it was only the exercise of some power by the Senate which could now withhold their contents from the House of Representatives and the nation. He denied the existence of such a power in the Senate. Whence did they derive it? Or why should they possess it? The Senate is not responsible, if the President has acted indiscreetly, as the argument assumes, although the Senator admits he does not know the contents of the papers, and, of course, cannot know that their publication will do mischief.

Unless the Senate be prepared to assume the functions and responsibility which the constitution has vested in the Executive, and, indeed, those which belong to the House of Representatives also, it cannot arrest what is sent by the one to the other in the course of official duty. It is not only a direct violation of the right of the Executive to send, and of the House to receive, those papers, but it is a palpable infraction of the right of the people to know what occurs in the progress of Congressional proceedings. Was it ever heard of before, that, in relation to facts disclosed with all the forms of a public proceeding in an open session of Congress, either this or any other branch of the Government had interposed to lay its hands on the materials by which those facts were to be acquired, and shut them up in a committee room? and this, too, for the avowed purpose of concealing their existence?

How, he asked, does this course compare with that of the Senate when the Panama mission was advised? The majority of that day did not hesitate to give to the people all the facts before them. No one resisted it. The mission had been determined on, and whether the documents were published or no, the Ministers would be sent out. But the question had excited public interest, and the nation had a just claim to all the information which would enable them to judge whether the policy was wise. Did we meet the demand to publish, by asking if gentlemen intended to perpetuate acrimonious feelings? By adverting to the danger of exposing our notions of the course of policy to be pursued to these nations? By suggesting the necessity of employing the agency of a committee to send out an "antidote with the bane?" As if we feared to trust the honesty or the intelligence of the American public. No, sir, all the documents we had were published, and thousands of copies dispersed over the whole surface of this Union; and all the labored arguments of our opponents accompanied them. Now we ask the same justice, and our case is a much stronger one. What we have published is a part only, and we ask to publish the remaining part, which is necessary to a right understanding of the whole. What is published was the groundwork against which was levelled all the predictions of excited apprehension. Now we ask you not to conceal from the public eye the finished and completed superstructure.

The motion to print the Message and documents was lost:

YEAH.—Messrs. Barton, Boulogny, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Webster, Willey—18.

NAY.—Messrs. Barnard, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Dudley, Eaton, Hayne, Iredell, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, McKinley, Prince, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury—24.

Mr. TAZEVELL asked whether a motion to transfer the Message and documents from the Legislative to the Executive Journal would be in order.

The Vice President said he presumed it would be in order. There were no instances of transfers from the Legislative to the Executive Journal; but transfers from the Executive to the Legislative Journal were not unfrequent. The motion was made, and carried in the affirmative, by a vote of 25 to 16.

Adjournment.

During the above discussion, a message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had passed a resolution for the appointment of a Joint Committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that unless he had any further business to communicate, the two Houses were ready to adjourn, and asking the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate concurred, and appointed a committee on its part; and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee, reported that they had discharged the duty intrusted to them, and that the President informed them he had nothing further to communicate; that he presented his best respects to both Houses of Congress, and wished them a safe return to their families and homes.

Another message was received from the House, stating that they had completed the legislative business before them, and were ready to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was ordered that the Senate meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock A. M.

The Vice President then adjourned the Senate.

Documents—Panama Mission.

The following Message from the President of the United States, received and considered the third instant, in legislative session, was, at that time, on motion of Mr. TAZEVELL, ordered to be transferred, with the accompanying documents, to the Executive Journal:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

WASHINGTON, 3d March, 1829.

I transmit herewith to Congress a copy of the instructions prepared by the Secretary of State, and furnished to the Ministers of the United States appointed to attend to the Assembly of American Plenipotentiaries, first held at Panama, and thence transferred to Tacubaya. The occasion for which they were given has passed away, and there is no present probability of the renewal of those negotiations; but the purposes for which they were intended are still of the deepest interest to our country, and to the world, and may hereafter call again for the active energies of the Government of the United States. The motive for withholding them from general publication having ceased, justice to the Government from which they emanated, and to the people for whose benefit it was instituted, requires that they should be made known. With this view, and from the consideration that the subjects embraced by those instructions must probably engage hereafter the consideration of our successors, I deem it proper to make this communication to both Houses of Congress. One copy only of the instructions being prepared, I send it to the Senate, requesting that it may be transmitted also to the House of Representatives.

TUESDAY, March 10.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following motion:

Ordered, That the message of the President of the United States, transmitting to the Senate the instructions to the Minister of the United States to the Congress at Panama, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the committee appointed the 5th instant.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion.

THURSDAY, March 12.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 10th instant, to refer the Message transmitting the instructions to the Ministers of the United States at Panama, to a Select Committee.

Mr. BENTON had leave to withdraw the motion, and submitted the following as a substitute:

"The late President of the United States having, by his message of the 3d March, 1829, communicated a copy of the instructions to the Ministers of the United States appointed to attend at the Assembly of American Plenipotentiaries, first held at Panama, and thence transferred to Tacubaya, with 'a view to their general publication,' which is claimed by him as an act of 'justice to the Government from which they emanated:' Therefore,

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the said documents, so far as to permit the publication of the same, as containing the views of the late Executive of the United States; it being thereby declared that such publication is not to be considered as the expression of an opinion on the part of the Senate, in relation to any of the principles avowed, or measures suggested in said instructions."

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion.

relative to the instructions to the Ministers of the United States at Panama.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, that it lie on the table, it was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 80.

MONDAY, March 16.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BENTON on the 12th instant, respecting the instructions to the Ministers of the United States at the Congress of Panama.

A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, to amend the same, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting, "That the Message of the President of the United States, of the 3d of March last, transmitting the instructions given to the Ministers of the United States, at the Congress of Panama, and the documents accompanying it, be transferred to the Legislative Journal of the Senate."

A division of the question was called for by Mr. KING, and being taken on striking out, It was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19.

On motion of Mr. TAZEWELL,

To amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "emanated," and inserting the following :

"The Senate having bestowed upon the said instructions the most careful attention ; and not being able to discover any possible benefit which may result from their publication at this time ; on the contrary, finding in them many expressions, insinuations, and opinions, in the justice and propriety of which the Senate do not concur, but regard the promulgation of the same as a measure which may be productive of much public detriment : Therefore,

Resolved, That the said instructions be returned to the Department of State."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 28.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the words "Resolved, That," and inserting, "the said Message, and the documents accompanying it, as containing the views of the late Executive, be transferred to the Legislative Journal of the Senate ; it being hereby declared that such transfer is not to be considered either expressive of an opinion, on the part of the Senate, of the propriety of the said Message, or of the language used, the principle avowed, or the measures suggested, in said instructions :"

VOL. X.—17

A division of the question was called for, and, being taken on striking out, it was determined in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. RUGGLES, to amend the amendment proposed to be inserted, by striking out the following clause : "It being hereby declared that such transfer is not to be considered as the expression of an opinion, on the part of the Senate, of the propriety of the said Message, or of the language used, the principles avowed, or measures suggested in said instructions."

And it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19.

A motion was made by Mr. WEBSTER, to amend the proposed amendment, by inserting, after the word "propriety," the words "or impropriety."

And it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 11.

The amendment, thus amended, was then agreed to.

On the question to agree to the original motion as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 10.

So the resolution was agreed to as follows :

"The late President of the United States having, by his message of the 3d March, 1829, communicated to the Senate a copy of the instructions to the Ministers of the United States appointed to attend at the Assembly of American Plenipotentiaries, first held at Panama, and thence transferred to Tacubaya, with a 'view to their general publication,' which is claimed by him as an act of 'justice to the Government from which they emanated : ' Therefore,

Resolved, That the said message, and documents accompanying it, as containing the views of the late Executive, be transferred to the Legislative Journal of the Senate ; it being hereby declared, that such transfer is not to be considered as the expression of an opinion, on the part of the Senate, of the propriety or impropriety of the said message, or of the language used, the principles avowed, or measures suggested, in said instructions."

On motion of Mr. TAZEWELL,

Ordered, That the proceedings of the Senate, on the subject of the message, transmitting the instructions to the Ministers of the United States at the Congress of Panama, be transferred to the legislative journal.

On motion of Mr. SEYMOUR, that this Message be printed,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 18.

TWENTIETH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

IN

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 1, 1828.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock, by the Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON, the Speaker of the House. The roll being called over, one hundred and seventy members and three delegates answered to their names.

The usual messages were interchanged between the two Houses, and a committee was appointed to wait upon the President of the United States.

TUESDAY, December 2.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses were in session, &c., reported that they had performed that duty, and the President replied he would make a communication to both Houses this day at 12 o'clock.

Soon after which, a Message, with accompanying documents, was received from the President, by the hands of Mr. John Adams, his private secretary, (for which, see the Senate's Debates.)

The reading of the President's Message being concluded, it was,

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, ordered to be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and six thousand copies of the same, with the accompanying documents, ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House.

THURSDAY, December 4.

The late Hedge Thompson.

Mr. TUCKER, of New Jersey, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to announce the unpleasant information of the death of one of my colleagues, Mr. HEDGE THOMPSON. Though not long a member of this House, those who had the pleasure of his acquaintance while here will bear me out in saying, that the worth of the deceased was of no common order. All who had the happiness of knowing him as well as did the humble individual upon whom has devolved the melancholy duty of addressing you on this occasion, will bear me testimony that his character combined an association of the most estimable qualities of the human heart; he had been afflicted by a distressing and protracted disease of the liver, which terminated his journey of life, when he paid the great debt of nature, at his residence in New Jersey, on or about the 20th of August last. That the usual solemnity in this, as in similar cases, may prevail, I move you, sir, the following resolution:

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of HEDGE THOMPSON, deceased, late a member of this House for the State of New Jersey, the members thereof will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to

Cumberland Road.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to authorize the opening of the Cumberland road eighty feet wide on its present location through the State of Indiana, by cutting off the timber, removing all obstructions, and making temporary bridges, so as to let on the travel, preparatory to turnpiking the same; and also, that said committee inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH said, that he must ask the indulgence of the House, and the ear of the Committee on Roads and Canals, while he remarked briefly on the objects of the resolution. There are few subjects, said Mr. S., I may say none, in which the citizens of the State from which I come, and particularly those more immediately affected by this road, either in fact or anticipation, are more deeply interested than in that embraced by this resolution. The Cumberland road being the grand thoroughfare through which a great portion of the emigration, as well as the merchandise from the Atlantic States, and cities, must pass, by land, to the State of Indiana, and those States west, through which this road is intended to be located, it consequently becomes a matter of much importance to our citizens, that it should be in healthy and active progress westward. It must be recollected by the House, and particularly by the committee, that Mr. Knight, the able commissioner who ran and marked the road through the State of Indiana, in his report to Congress, at the last session, warmly recommends the opening of this road in the manner contemplated by the resolution. It would seem almost unnecessary for me to add my entire concurrence in the views of Mr. Knight on the subject, as his opportunities, having examined the ground, for acquiring a knowledge of the subject, not only as regards the geography of the country, but as to the propriety of this preparatory step, has been such, as to entitle his opinions to the respectful consideration of this House and the committee. It must be recollected by the House, that a bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, authorizing the opening of the road as is contemplated by this resolution; that the repeated efforts of myself and colleague, Col. BLAKE, (Mr. JENNINGS being at that time unfortunately confined to his bed by severe indisposition,) to take up the bill out of its order, proved unavailing, and we were compelled to see the session close and the bill not reached on the orders of the day. It will also be recollected that I introduced a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Indiana on this subject, which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. It was indeed a subject of much regret to me that the bill of the last session did not become a law, as the voice of my constituents, which shall ever be my guide, called for every exertion that could be made on my part to obtain the passage of the bill.

Extension of Time for Drawback.

Sir, since the location of this road by the commissioner, a great portion of the public domain lying immediately on the line of the same, and contiguous thereto, has passed into the hands of individual purchasers, and the money into the Treasury of the United States; farms are opening, towns are laying out, and villages springing up, and the whole face of the country greatly improving, in anticipation of the opening and final completion of this great national work. National I call it, sir: for, if any work of internal improvement can properly be called national, this is surely of that character. The people consider Congress as pledged to proceed with this great and important work, and I flatter myself their just expectations will not be disappointed. To such gentlemen as held constitutional scruples on these subjects, I will merely say, that this resolution, and the subject of inquiry, steers clear of the constitutional objections of the gentlemen; it rests on other principles. Such being the case, as frequently admitted, as I believe, on this floor, I hope we shall have the co-operation of these gentlemen as well as those who, like myself, are not troubled with these constitutional objections on subjects involving the right to make works of internal improvement. I believe we have the power, and I am willing to exercise it for the benefit of the country. It is not my intention to go into the question at this time, as it can answer no valuable purpose. I will merely point gentlemen to the compact, and to the fact that the two per cent. on the amount of the sales of public lands in the State of Illinois, which I consider pledged to this object, has already amounted to more than the sum called for by the resolution.

I have felt it to be my duty, sir, to introduce this resolution, and to make the remarks which I have submitted, at this early period of the session, that the committee may have the subject under their consideration as early in the session as possible, as I am very anxious that a bill may be reported, and finally pass, during the session, which I am aware is to be a short one.

Mr. McLEAN moved to amend this resolution, by inserting therein, after the word "location," these words, "from Zanesville, by way of Columbus, in the State of Ohio."

Mr. SMITH declined accepting of this as a modification of his resolution. So far as this road had gone into the State of Ohio, it had been made to follow the course of good roads already existing; but in Indiana this was not practicable, as no such roads lay in its contemplated course. Besides, the adoption of the amendment would involve the necessity for an enlarged appropriation.

Mr. McLEAN considered this as no valid objection to the amendment. The whole subject would remain within the discretion of the committee. As to what the gentleman had observed as to the good roads in Ohio, he must certainly be under an erroneous impression. The preparation contemplated by the resolution was as much needed in that State as it could be in Indiana.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SMITH thereupon modified the original resolution, so as to insert $100,000, instead of $50,000; in which form the resolution was carried.

THURSDAY, December 11.

Extension of Time for Drawback.

The engrossed bill extending the term within which merchandise may be exported with benefit of drawback, was read a third time, and the question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, when the bill was ordered to an engrossment, he did not correctly apprehend the effects upon the revenue of the country to be operated by the first section, and he thought it probable the House did not devote sufficient attention to the bill when under consideration on yesterday. To the extension of the time for allowing goods entered for exportation the benefit of drawback, he did not see any valid objection, and of course would be willing to vote for the bill if that was its only effect; but the first section makes an innovation upon the settled revenue system of this Government from its origin. Our earliest legislation has charged a certain rate of per cent. upon the amount of debentures, varying according to circumstances in its amounts. For many years past it has been fixed at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. This  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. has yielded to our revenue annually about the sum of \$150,000 to \$200,000. The first section of this bill proposes to repeal so much of our revenue law as imposes this  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the amount of duty on foreign merchandise imported into the United States, (principally on foreign accounts, owned by foreign merchants and manufacturers,) in quest of a market.

I cannot be mistaken, said Mr. W., when I state that this bill will have the effect of subtracting from the revenue of the country, annually, $150,000, three-fourths of which is now paid by foreign merchants and manufacturers. I will not undertake to point out the propriety of levying this contribution, upon the merchandise of foreigners, considered as a revenue measure, or as a just tax for the trouble, expense, and risk, encountered by the Government: the legislation of the nation for thirty years should supersede the necessity of such labor on my part. Let not gentlemen deceive themselves by the idea that this measure is to operate to the advantage of the American merchant, citizen, or manufacturer. Its beneficial effects will be mainly enjoyed by the foreign merchants and manufacturers. They are the great owners of the goods entitled to the benefit of drawback. We have our table groaning with the remonstrances of the American merchants and citizens of our commercial cities, praying Congress to impose a duty on the sales made at auction, of foreign merchandise, because of the facilities which such sales afford to the foreign importer and manufacturer, to the great injury, if not ruin, of the American merchants, and we are by this bill called upon to grant them greater facilities, and that, too, at the expense of the public Treasury. I shall say no more. I have stated my objections to the bill. I do not think I am mistaken—I know I am not in one respect—that is, the loss which your Treasury will sustain, of something like $150,000 per annum. It is for the House to say whether this loss shall be sustained. I desire that, when the question is taken, it may be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his regret that the gentleman from Kentucky had not chosen an earlier opportunity to offer his objections to a part of the bill; when, if they had been sustained by a majority of the House, it might have been amended accordingly. He would, however, endeavor to show, that the gentleman had entirely misconceived the object of the deduction in question. He says we are about to relinquish a revenue of one or two hundred thousand dollars annually, and therefore the bill ought to be rejected. The statesman who framed the original act never contemplated that this deduction from the drawback should ever operate as a tax upon the carrying trade; it never had been the policy of the country to exact a revenue on merchandise in transit; no commercial country that he knew of had ever adopted a measure so injurious to its own navigation. The sole object contemplated by the original act of 1789—the first act levying duties on importation—was to indemnify the Government for all charges incidental to warehousing merchandise, which might be exported with the benefit of drawback. It was never intended to impose the smallest fraction of tax on such merchandise for purposes of revenue. The act of 1789 authorized a deduction of one per cent. from the moderate duties of that day, when the ad valorem rates were generally at 5 and  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The charge was equal to about five cents on every hundred dollars, and was exclusively designed to cover all incidental expenses. Under the stamp act, a stamp duty was imposed on debenture certificates; and to cover this expense, an additional deduction was made in 1800. From omission, or from some other cause, when the stamp duties were repealed, the deduction from the drawback was not restored to its original rate. We have since very considerably increased the imposts to 80, 40, 50 per cent. and upwards, until the amount now deducted for the mere expenses of warehousing, is sixteen times the rate originally contemplated, while the expenses have, in the mean time, actually diminished. There was no cause now existing for retaining any portion of the duty for the purposes mentioned in the original act. Every expense that could possibly be chargeable on merchandise deposited in our public stores, and every custom-house fee, must be paid, before it can be taken out of the possession of the officers of the customs. The property, while under the care of Government, was at the risk of the owner; the Government was in no manner responsible for its safety. We were already, by existing laws, amply indemnified for every expense incidental to merchandise designed for exportation, and the deduction from the debenture could not be defended on that ground. He was not aware that any other commercial nation had made any such deduction, unless it was in lieu of all incidental charges for storage, &c. The sole object of the bill, said Mr. O., is to place our foreign trade on the wise and liberal footing on which other nations had placed theirs. But even if we pass this bill, our navigating interest will not enjoy advantages equal to those granted by other nations to this branch of trade. In Great Britain, merchandise may, upon application to the Commissioners of the Treasury, remain in entrepot indefinitely for years, without even an entry being made, or the payment of any duty. According to our laws, the duty must be paid at the expiration of certain terms. The navigating interest of this country solicited no favors—they asked merely to have restrictions taken off which actually operated as an encouragement to the navigation of Great Britain and France, at the expense of our own commerce. To tax the carrying trade was substantially nothing less than levying a toll on merchandise for the privilege of crossing the Atlantic Ocean. But there was another and a stronger objection. If the 2½ per cent. deduction from the duty should be continued, its effect would be to impose a discriminating duty on our own navigation, in favor of the navigating interests of France and Great Britain, our competitors for the profits of the carrying trade. Such a measure would be detrimental not only to the navigating, but to every interest in the country. It would be utterly inconsistent with every rule of sound policy, and with the practice of all nations sharing in the carrying trade of the world. The bill would be essentially serviceable to our foreign commerce, and would enable us to contend with other nations in a branch of navigation which had been uniformly a favorite in all commercial countries.

Mr. BARNEY observed, that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky appeared to have taken up an impression on this subject which was directly the reverse of the actual state of the facts. The gentleman seemed to suppose that a large proportion of the amount of goods imported for drawback, is on foreign account. The reverse is the truth. By far the larger portion of our whole imports are for the consumption of the country, and those intended for re-exportation are imported almost entirely by our own merchants. When foreign merchants ship those goods, which are the usual subject of our drawback system, they ship them direct to the ports where they intend finally to send them, without entering our ports at all. But when our own merchants import for drawback, it is usually with a view to re-export the cargoes to the West Indies and South America. The bill operates on American merchants almost exclusively, and its object is to benefit them, and not foreigners. It makes, in fact, the ports of the United States free ports, and its operation will be to enable the foreign merchant to find here all those miscellaneous kinds of merchandise which are requisite to make up an assorted cargo. The retaining of the two and a half per cent. of duties operates as an injury to the carrying trade—a trade which no wise nation will tax for revenue. Great Britain has in her colonial dominions, near our own frontier, free ports, which she has opened for the very purpose of rivalling us in this trade; and the result of this wise measure, on their part, is, that British merchants are enabled to save almost the whole of the freight. Under such a state of things, our obvious policy is to free our trade from every shackle. Our trade to South America is increasing every hour, and has already so far advanced as to constitute one-third of our whole exports. Under this state of things, we ought to encourage it by every means in our power. Mr. B. concluded by again insisting that the operation of the bill would terminate on American, and not on foreign mercantile interests.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, it was his intention to vote in favor of the bill, and he wished, in a few words, to state his reasons. It is true, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) has stated, that the passage of this bill will diminish our annual revenue from $180,000 to $160,000. The question, then, is, will the object sought to be accomplished more than indemnify the country for this loss of revenue? He thought it would. The bill rests upon a very simple principle. Great Britain is struggling to obtain the carrying trade of the world. She has established free ports throughout her extensive dominions, in which her merchants may deposit foreign merchandise without the payment of any transit duty. The wise principle upon which she acts, is, to burthen her foreign trade as little as possible. It passes free through her dominions to foreign countries.

The question, then, is, shall the American merchant be placed upon the same footing? Great Britain is our great rival for the carrying trade; and ought we not to enable our merchants to struggle against this powerful competition with the same advantages which her merchants possess? Our laws impose a transit duty of two and a half per cent. upon the existing rate of duty, on all foreign merchandise imported into the United States, to be transported to foreign countries. This operates as a discriminating duty in favor of the English and against the American merchant. All other circumstances being equal, it would in effect, be a premium to that amount, to enable the foreign merchants to undersell our merchants in foreign markets. The simple question, then, is, shall we protect our foreign commerce, by affording it the same advantages with the foreign commerce of Great Britain?

At the last session of Congress, Mr. B. said, he had exerted all his feeble abilities to promote the passage of a law for the protection of agriculture and manufactures. He considered commerce equally entitled to our favor. Its protection was equally a part of the great American system. The duty which he felt he owed to the commerce and the mercantile interest of the country, would not suffer him to vote against this bill. It was calculated to build up our foreign trade, and enable our merchants to enter into a fair competition with the merchants of the other commercial nations of the world.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and stood—yeas 158, nays 28.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate.

MONDAY, December 15.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

The bill increasing the amount of drawback on sugar refined within the United States, was taken up.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, to remove all doubts as to the effect of the bill's being confined exclusively to sugars refined from foreign materials, read a paragraph from the former bills passed in 1816 and 1818; but lest any suspicion should remain, moved to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That this act shall not alter or repeal any law, now in force, regulating the exportation of sugar refined in the United States, except to change the rate of drawback, when so exported."

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, said, this bill had, without opposition, progressed so far that he presumed resistance would be unavailing. He deemed it proper, however, to say a few words explanatory of his vote against its engrossment and passage. He was against the system of bounties, cloaked under the name of drawbacks. The bill, in fact, proposes to give from the Treasury a bounty on domestic refined sugars, when exported, of five cents per pound, under the pretext that the brown sugar of which it is made pays three cents per pound duty on its importation. The existing law allows a bounty or drawback of four cents per pound on sugar refined in the United States and exported, and this is equal to the whole duty paid on the raw sugar entering into its fabric—deducting a fair proportion of the custom-house expenses, &c., on trade. To increase this bounty is not only to repay all the duty that has been received on the sugar used, but it becomes an actual charge on the community, for the benefit of the sugar refiner.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed, in reply, that the object of the present bill was merely to correct an error in previous legislation. The general provisions of law on this subject were as old as the constitution, and the simple inquiry at present was, what ought to be the actual amount of debenture? A report had been made at the last session, by the Committee of Commerce, in relation to this point, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would give himself the trouble of consulting it, he would there find that the committee agree with him, that not a cent should be allowed in form of drawback beyond the actual cost of the foreign sugar refined. He will meet, in that report, with three distinct calculations, drawn from the most satisfactory data, and made with the greatest minuteness and care; and if, after examining them, the gentleman should not be fully convinced, his apprehensions of that gentleman's candor and powers of comprehension would prove very erroneous. In fact, the rate proposed in the present bill, instead of being carried to an extreme, left a fraction in favor of the United States. In granting such a drawback, the United States would not go as far as other commercial nations, nor would the present Congress go as far as their ancestors had done for twelve years after the organization of the Government. The constant practice had been to fix the drawback at double the rate of duty, because it required two pounds of foreign raw sugar to make one pound of American refined; whereas the present bill fixes the drawback at five cents, although the duty on each pound of imported sugar was three cents. As to the question of the general policy, when the time arrived in which that question would become one of great importance, Mr. C. said he should be ready to go with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so far as to enlarge our system of debenture. But to refuse the drawback would be to double the consumption duty upon this article. It would be sending it, with a consumption duty exacted, by our own country, to meet another consumption duty, exacted in the foreign country whither it was carried; whereas the sugar refined abroad was loaded with only one such duty. Mr. C. concluded his remarks by observing, that the subject was not new, nor had he advanced the views he had expressed as having the least claim to novelty. They had long been received and acted upon, and the only question to be settled at this day was, as he had before remarked, the actual amount of the drawback to be allowed.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that the effect of the bill, as he apprehended, would be, by granting an additional drawback on refined sugar, made from that of foreign growth, to place it on the same footing with sugar refined from that of domestic growth. There might formerly have been a good reason for allowing this drawback, for at that time we possessed no sugar lands, and raised no sugar of domestic growth. But since then, the state of things had been greatly changed, and the United States now raised, within its own limits, a large proportion of the sugar actually used in the country. There was a difference between allowing drawback on the mere transit of articles which left the United States in the same condition in which they entered, and allowing drawback on articles, the form of which was changed after their importation. Government ought to be cautious how it lets articles of this description compete with similar articles of our own production. The general policy of this Government had been not to allow drawback at all upon articles of this kind. Much difficulty had been experienced in the case of imported silks stamped here and re-exported. The gentleman, surely, would not apply the doctrine of drawbacks to cotton goods manufactured in the United States and exported, if the cotton of which they were made were an imported article, or to woollens, if the wool was imported. The provision appeared to him impolitic, if not unjust.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. GORHAM said that the operation of the bill did not appear to him to be rightly understood. What is it, asked Mr. G., which the bill on your table does in effect say? It says only this: that if there is in this country any skill and industry which may be usefully employed upon a foreign material, you, the Government, will encourage such industry and skill. The gentleman from New York appears to think that the effect of the bill will be to introduce a rival to the growth of our domestic sugar; but so far was this from being the case, that the only difficulty which the Committee of Commerce apprehended, when they introduced the bill, was, that its effect would be to allow the drawback on our own sugar, which was intended only for sugar imported. Suppose ever so many millions of pounds to be imported and re-exported—so far as our consumption at home was concerned, the drawback would produce no competition between this sugar and our own, because the drawback is allowed only on the exportation. The theory of the act is this: that there are skill and capital in this country, which can be advantageously employed in refining and improving the form of a foreign article, and that you will encourage such an employment of it.

If sugar could be raised as cheaply at home as it can be imported, we should not go abroad for the article. The manufacture, then, would be of the domestic article, and not of the foreign, and every pound of our own sugar, refined and exported, would get the drawback. The bill, therefore, does not cramp and restrain, but, on the contrary, tends directly to encourage the growth of sugar in the United States. The domestic grower would have the price fixed by home consumption, and would get the drawback too. He would then have no rival; so that the argument from this bill goes rather the other way. The real danger is, that, sooner or later, such an invitation will be given to the manufacturer, that the American article will carry the drawback. The law, to be sure, attempts to prevent this, by prescribing oaths, but that is not the true security. The security lies in the nature of the transaction: for it will be easy to tell whether the Government pays more for drawback than it gets for duty. If the drawback does not exceed the duty, then the law will have been faithfully observed. For, if there are a hundred hogsheads of foreign sugar, and another hundred hogsheads of domestic, and if the two parcels are equally cheap, what is it to the public which of these the refiner chooses to use? If they are equally cheap, there is no need to discriminate between them. The true test is, does the drawback exceed the duty? If it does, then you are paying a bounty for exportation.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that, from the commencement of the present discussion, he had entertained great doubt as to the policy of this measure, and although he did not concur in all the views which had been urged against the bill, he had come to the conclusion that the bill ought not to pass. The allowance which it proposes to grant to the manufacturers of refined sugar, is denominated, indeed, a drawback; but a reference to the argument by which it has been vindicated, as well as to the practical effect of the law, will demonstrate that it is in fact, and in truth, a bounty, upon the exportation of refined sugar, manufactured in the United States. Disguise it as we may, said Mr. McD., this is the commencement of a system of bounties upon the exportation of domestic manufactures, and can only be regarded as an extension, in a new form, of that system of policy which has been recently exemplified, in raising the duties upon imported merchandise, almost to the point of prohibition. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GORHAM) has very truly said, that it is perfectly immaterial, both to the manufacturer and to the community, whether the refined sugar is made from brown sugar, grown and made in the United States, or from that which is imported from abroad. In point of fact, the law will operate precisely as if the drawback were allowed indiscriminately upon sugars refined either from domestic or imported brown sugar. It cannot, therefore, with any propriety, be regarded as a branch of the drawback system, which is confined specifically to the refunding of the duty paid to the Government by the importer. Now, is it pretended that the five cents a pound which is to be paid to the exporter of refined sugar, goes into the pocket of the importing merchant, by whom the duty upon the imported brown sugar was paid to the Government? I put it to gentlemen to say whether, under the disguise of a drawback, this is not the first step towards a complicated system of bounties and prohibitions, each sustaining the other, and all concurring in the oppression of the community?

Mr. STORRS said that the remarks that he had made when last up, had been misunderstood. He was not opposed to the system of drawback, but he did not consider this bill as legitimately pertaining to that system. As to the importation of articles intended for transit merely, he thought that a reasonable time ought to be allowed for the payment of the duty, whether it were twelve or twenty-four months. But the present was a different question, and always had been so considered. The present was a question respecting articles imported into the United States, and altered by the manufacturer before they were re-exported for the benefit of the drawback. There were but few articles thus situated, and the regulations respecting them did not constitute any general system at all. They were, for the most part, articles which we did not raise, such as silks, afterwards stamped in the United States, and one or two others of a similar kind. The present bill went to enlarge the principle, and to extend the system. A ship was an article manufactured in the United States; but did anybody ever think of asking or granting a drawback on the iron employed in its fabrication? Such a thing was never heard of. In relation to sugar the state of things was altered since the law was first passed. We now raise sugar in the United States, and that in large quantities. Mr. S. said he was not for going back and repealing the law, since it had now been long established, but he could not see any propriety in now extending it. The whole importation of sugar amounted to fifty-five millions of pounds. In 1824, the quantity of domestic sugar raised was forty millions of pounds; in three years it had increased to seventy-six millions; half as much again as the whole had formerly been. It had doubled in three years, and if it should go on increasing in the same proportion, in three years more it would equal the whole amount both of what is now raised and imported. If the product was increasing at this rate, Mr. S. asked whether he had not been right in saying that domestic sugar was a branch of our home product well worthy of our looking to. [He would not use the word protection, as that word seemed to be peculiarly offensive to some gentlemen in the House.] The present amount of drawback was but eleven thousand dollars, paid upon about three hundred hogsheds, and for an object like this, gentlemen were asking the House to introduce a principle which struck at a home product of seventy-six millions of pounds. Was the play worth the candle? The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. GORHAM) had said, that if capital sought investment in the carrying trade, ought it not to be allowed to take that direction? Certainly. But would it be a more profitable application of capital to carry foreign sugar refined in the United States, than to apply that capital to the raising and refining both? Then the whole article would be our own; we should have the carrying of it in both cases, and the profit of raising it besides. Should the amount become very large, the argument urged by the gentleman would bear the other way. The principle of the present bill was one which had always been resisted in this House, and he thought it was worth a little consideration and some delay, before the Government ventured to extend it farther.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he was glad to find that the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORES,) for whose opinion he entertained a high respect, agreed with him in the general principles which sustained the drawback system. That gentleman's opposition to the bill resolved itself into a question of fact, not of principle. He objected that it would interfere with our domestic sugar. Such, Mr. S. said, would not be the case, for two reasons: First, our domestic sugar is not suitable for refining, and the foreign sugar alone is used for that purpose.

[Mr. STORES explained, He said that the foreign sugar was better adapted to the purpose of refining, from having been longer in the country and better drained.]

Mr. SPRAGUE resumed. Whatever might be the cause, the fact was not denied by any one that our domestic sugar never goes to the refiners; it is not suited to their use as the foreign sugar is, and therefore does not come in competition. In the second place, we do not produce domestic sugar enough for our home consumption. We must, for some time certainly, continue to import largely from abroad. It is said that the quantity made in the United States, is fast increasing, but it is to be recollected that our population and consumption are fast increasing also, and we certainly cannot expect to be soon supplied from our own soil; and so long as we import for our own consumption, there certainly can be no competition in the foreign market between our own and foreign sugar.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) insists that allowing this drawback is giving a bounty upon the exportation of sugars. He says that the importer pays the duty, and that, afterwards, we pay back the amount to the refiner, as a bounty; that the article having been brought into the country, repaying the duties is a dead loss of so much to the Treasury. This proceeds upon the assumption that the same quantity would be imported, if re-exportation was not permitted. If such were the fact, the consequence would be to depress the price of domestic sugar—an effect which has been so much deprecated. Having the article here, if we prevent its flowing off, in the usual channels of commerce, the accumulation inevitably reduces the price. Exportation of the foreign article is, in such case, as highly beneficial to the domestic producer, as if the same quantity of his own found a market abroad.

Mr. DRAYTON was in favor of this bill. Its operation was not injurious to any, while it produced a benefit (not indeed to any large amount, but still a great benefit) to the commerce and navigation of the United States. How (asked Mr. D.) are we to pay for the sugar on which we refund this duty? Certainly by our native products: for there is no way of paying for imports but by exports. This benefits our agriculture. Then we have the transport of the goods—this benefits our commerce and navigation; while, at the same time, we introduce into the country a species of manufacture which otherwise would not exist. Against a bill so evidently beneficial, and productive of no ill effect to any, he was at a loss to perceive what valid objection could be brought. He would briefly notice one or two which had been suggested. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) had said that the effect of the bill would interfere with the growth of domestic sugar. But how was this possible? If instead of sugar, the drawback was granted on coffee, or on any other article not raised in the United States, it would as much interfere with the domestic product of coffee, as of sugar. Why would it not interfere with the growth of coffee? Because none was grown within the United States. And why would it not interfere with the growth of sugar? Because enough was not raised in the United States to supply our home consumption, and therefore competition was out of the question. Competition could not exist unless the imported article was put on a footing with the domestic. But the duty on the foreign was equal to one-third of its value. Competition was therefore out of the question. Sugar raised here did not sell merely at the cost of production, but at a price in which the duty was included; and as the foreign article was saddled with a duty of three cents a pound, the domestic bore the same price, and that three cents was clear profit. Our own sugar, as every one knew, was used exclusively in its raw state. All the refined sugar in the United States was manufactured from the foreign article alone. If it were not, we should necessarily import the refined article from abroad. That would pay the duty, and this duty would be paid by the consumer; whereas, by allowing its importation with drawback, the article is obtained cheaper, while all our domestic sugar is raised exclusively for consumption in other ways. The effect was unavoidable. We manufactured a new article of exportation. This produced importation, the importation paid duty, and the duties augmented the revenues of the Government. The effects of the system were all beneficial, and injured nobody, and why should it be objected to on mere abstract principles?

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

TUESDAY, December 16.

Internal Improvements.

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, rose and said, that the resolutions which he was about to present had been suggested by a bill which he found on his table—the Cumberland road bill—the provisions of which he believed contrary to the constitution, and the fundamental principles of our political institutions. It was not his purpose, himself, to go into a discussion of the abstract constitutional question. But if it should be thought proper by others, the resolutions might offer an option to the House, in discussing the question separately from the bill. If this should not be done, (Mr. H. said,) the resolution would yet serve him as a protest against the bill and its principles. Mr. H. then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, &c. That the people of the United States, in the formation of their Governments, did not alienate their sovereignty.

Resolved, That the rights of jurisdiction and soil are the essential attributes of sovereignty.

Resolved, That the power to execute a system of internal improvements, within the States, involves the right of jurisdiction and soil.

Resolved, That the power to make Roads and Canals within the jurisdictional limits of the States, and to make laws for their preservation and protection, and to erect toll gates, and to enforce the collection of tolls, involves the right to execute a complete system of internal improvements.

Resolved, That Congress does not, under the constitution, possess this power.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.*

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

The bill increasing the amount of drawback on sugars refined within the United States, came up.

Mr. GILMER remarked, that, as he was not very conversant with commercial subjects he should not have engaged in the discussion of this bill, but that the origin of the allowance of a drawback upon refined sugar had not been stated, nor the operation of the present allowance fairly represented to the House. We have been told that the allowance of drawback upon sugar refined within the United States had been coeval with the constitution. We were not, however, informed of any difference in the policy which produced the first law upon this subject, and that which is the evident object, for the passage of the present bill. The first law allowing a drawback on refined sugar was passed in 1794, and was entitled "An act laying duties upon snuff and refined sugar." The duties to be collected by virtue of this act were to be appropriated to the payment of the public debt. In order to secure to the Government the highest possible revenue from this excise upon refined sugar, a heavy duty was laid upon imported refined sugar. The entire supply of that article, for domestic consumption, was thereby given to the sugar refiners. For the purpose of enabling them to furnish that supply, and, at the same time, to avoid the consequences of a great surplus in the market, by which the refiners would be less able to pay the excise, a drawback was allowed them, equal to the excise and the duty upon the raw sugar imported, upon all refined sugar exported. They were allowed the benefits of the foreign market, that they might be the better enabled to pay a tax imposed by the Government upon the home consumption. Mr. G. observed, that, from our proximity to the West Indies, and the circumstances that the most essential supplies of the sugar islands were drawn from the United States, a large quantity of sugar was brought into the United States for exportation; so that the sugar refiners were enabled, very soon, not only to supply the home market, but to transport a considerable quantity for the foreign market. The internal duty upon refined sugar ceased after the 30th of January, 1802. In 1818, an internal duty of four cents, was again laid upon sugar refined within the United States; and for the same reason as before, a drawback was allowed upon exportation. By the act of 1816, the duties upon refined sugar were continued, and the drawback increased. By the act of 1817, the duties upon refined sugar were repealed. By the act of 1818, the drawback allowed by the act of 1816, of four cents a pound, upon refined sugar exported, was again re-enacted. Mr. G. observed, that the act of 1818 was the first which allowed a drawback upon refined sugar, unconnected with an internal duty.

Mr. G. said he had been thus particular, in order to show more clearly that the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) was mistaken, in supposing that the policy now contended for had been adopted during the first Administration of the Government. He said he would now attempt to show that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) was mistaken, in supposing that the export of refined sugar had decreased in consequence of the drawback being no more than four cents.

The export of refined sugar entitled to drawback was,

" 1819,	- - - - -	47,788
" 1820,	- - - - -	18,044

From which statement it appeared, (said Mr. G.,) that so far from the export having lessened by the operation of the present law, more refined sugar was exported during the last year than any other year since the passage of the law in 1818. Mr. G. observed, that he supposed the object of the drawback at present allowed, was, to enable the refiners so to extend their business, as always to have an ample supply for the home market, and in case of the accumulation of any great surplus, to enable them to export without loss. This object was fully attained by the present duty. But, said Mr. G., that object was a very different one from what the advocates of this bill wish to effect by its passage. They desire so to model our revenue laws as to direct thereby the application of a portion of our capital and labor to the manufacture of an article for exportation out of materials of foreign growth. Hitherto, the advocates for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, by means of our revenue system, have confined their views to the supply of the home market. of such manufactures as were made of materials the growth or production of our own country. The present bill goes farther. It designs the creation of a manufacture of foreign materials, and for the foreign markets. He said, that, whenever the situation of the people of the United States enables them to manufacture for the foreign market, without the aid of the Government, they will have the right to do so; and the Government cannot constitutionally restrain them. But the Government (Mr. G. said) had no right to create a manufacture by bounties, nor was it politic to do so, if it had. The Government, he said, had the power to lay imposts, and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. There was no other power granted to it by the constitution, by which the bill could be passed. The creation of a manufacture within the United States cannot be considered a regulation with any foreign nation. And it would be equally absurd (Mr. G. said) to call a bounty of five cents a pound upon refined sugar exported, an impost or a tax for the purpose of revenue. But (Mr. G. said) he did not intend to enter at large into the discussion of this part of the subject. He wished it not to be agitated during the present session. The question of policy he considered of great importance, not so much from any consequences that would follow from this particular bill, but from the principle it would recognize, and the practice that would follow, in relation to other subjects.

Mr. G. admitted that this bill would not affect injuriously the productions of domestic sugar, and that its general effect would be to add some wealth to the country. He admitted that the five cents bounty to be paid, must however be previously secured by the Government, from the duties on raw sugar, which would not otherwise be imported. Mr. G. said, it might seem, from this admission, that he ought not to apply the term "bounty" to the five cents to be paid upon exportation rather than drawback. He justified himself from the circumstance of this five cents being paid in a manner that would not authorize the payment of a drawback upon any other article; and he called upon the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) to say whether this was not so. The sugar which the refiners use is not imported nor entered for the benefit of drawback. They refine, indiscriminately, from the mass of sugar imported for the home market, and do not send it abroad until some favorable foreign market is offered. Mr. G. said there was one circumstance with which he had been particularly struck; and that was, that all the zealous advocates of this bill were gentlemen who represented the great cities upon the Atlantic, (Mr. GORHAM, from Boston, Mr. CAMBRELENG, from New York, Mr. SERGEANT, from Philadelphia, Mr. BARNEY, from Baltimore, and Mr. DRAYTON, from Charleston.) These gentlemen, no doubt, represented the interests of their constituents; but (Mr. G. said) it would be well worthy of consideration, whether that interest was not, in this instance, peculiar, and such as had little connection with the interest of the nation. The manufacture of refined sugar for exportation, and almost entirely that for home consumption, must necessarily be confined to the large importing cities upon the seaboard, because sugar is too heavy an article to be carried into the country, refined, and then returned for exportation. Mr. G., therefore, felt himself authorized to say, that the great object of this bill was, to give employment to an increased capital and labor, in the cities on the Atlantic. Mr. G. said that he had admitted that the consequences of the passage of this bill would be an increase of wealth. But, said he, wealth is not the sole source of the strength of a Government, or the happiness of a people. He doubted, himself, whether any manufacture, within the United States, solely for foreign exportation, and created by the forced action of the laws, would be beneficial to the country. He believed that such an interest would always require as great an expense to defend it as it was worth.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

Mr. SILAS WOOD, of New York, observed, in reply, that the gentleman from Georgia was certainly mistaken in supposing that drawback in relation to the present article was intended for revenue, by way of excise. At the time the law was originally passed, there was an excise duty, as well as an impost, and if the object had been to raise a revenue from refined sugar, by way of excise, when the impost was remitted by granting a drawback, the excise duty would, of course, have been continued; but the fact was the reverse. The excise duty was remitted as well as the impost. The object of the law was entirely different: it was intended to foster and increase the commerce and navigation of the country.

The article of sugars forms an essential article in our commerce. Our exports to the West Indies, by which we paid for them, amounted to upwards of $4,000,000, and three-fourths of these exports consisted of the products of agriculture; there was not an article in all our list of imports which tended more directly to encourage the agriculture of the country. It furnished a market for three millions of dollars' worth of our own products, and a vast proportion of that amount consisted of bulky articles, such as lumber, live stock, and fish, the transportation of which gave employment to much tonnage, so that this branch of trade gave encouragement at once to the agriculture, commerce, and navigation of the country. From the beginning of the Government the policy of the drawback system had been to make the drawback equal to the duty; but experience had proved that such was not now in fact the case. The duty was three cents per pound upon the raw sugar, and including what was lost in the process of refining, every pound of clarified sugar required two pounds of the raw material. The loss in refining was found to amount to something less than a cent; to indemnify the refiner, therefore, the drawback ought to be something more than five cents. The bill, however, fixed it at five; and in so doing, it but continued the policy heretofore invariably pursued from the foundation of the Government. For want of this equality, the business was found to languish, and the true reason why it had not flourished and increased of late years, as it had done formerly, was, that the Government was drawing from the pocket of the refiner a portion of the proceeds of his industry—it was sharing with him the profits of his business. In all other commercial countries, the drawback fully equalled the duty paid; the consequence of which was, that sugar refiners were able to undersell, and actually do undersell, those of the United States, and thereby monopolize the foreign market. In Great Britain this branch of manufacture was husbanded with assiduous care, as furnishing a valuable branch of commerce; its amount, there, fluctuated from 20,000,000 to 28,000,000 of dollars, averaging 24,000,000 annually; and while they import 24,000,000 of dollars' worth of the article in a raw state, they export in the same state only seven millions, while of refined sugar they export the same amount of seven millions, the balance going to home consumption. Now the British manufacturer is less favorably situated than the American, for he is at a greater distance from the sugar market; and yet, there, they export by millions, while we only by thousands. Why cannot we manufacture as much of the article as the English? The true reason is, that the English manufacturer has his whole duty remitted, while the American only has a part; the one enjoys his whole profit—the other shares his profit with the Government. If, then, the effect of this bill will be, to encourage a branch of business favorable at once to manufactures, to commerce, and to agriculture, why would gentlemen refuse a bill so evidently advantageous to the country? As things stood, while Great Britain exported seven millions, we exported but twenty-seven thousand. The business, therefore, was in a languishing state; nor could any one wonder at this, when he considered that the Government were retaining in their own hands, nearly one-third of the duty. The manufacturers had invested a large capital in buildings. Their business was beneficial to the country, and injured nobody. Their request was reasonable, and to comply with it would, in his apprehension, be both politic and just.

Mr. WEEBS said he was in favor of the bill, and would briefly assign the reasons which induced him to support it. He considered the carrying trade as important to agriculture, and held it to be a duty of Congress to encourage it—not, indeed, by granting it a premium; but he did not consider the drawback allowed to sugar refiners as a premium at all. He entirely concurred in the very able view of the subject which had been presented by the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. SPRAGUE.) It was merely a paying back to the importer what he had paid in the shape of duty. It could make no difference to the Treasury whether the Government paid this back to the importer himself or to a third party. The importer, when he sold to that third party, would, of course, include in its price, the duty he had paid; and when the article left the country, the duty ought to be remitted to whoever happened to be the holder. He could see no reason why such a manufacture ought to be encouraged; would to God that all the partiality lately exhibited by the Government in the encouragement of manufactures could be justified on ground as solid as this.

Mr. TAYLOR said he had been anxious yesterday to obtain the floor, merely to call the attention of the House to the facts of this case, as they were exhibited in the documents in possession of the House. So far as he knew, it was not proposed by any gentleman to repeal the existing drawback; the propriety of the principle seemed to be generally admitted. The only question before the House respected the rate at which it ought to be fixed. Now, if gentlemen would turn to the history of this manufacture, they would find that its results presented a singular anomaly in the progress of American commerce and enterprise. It was a branch of manufactures, which, at an early date, had obtained complete possession of the American market; and though it had existed for twenty years since that time, it had scarcely advanced a step beyond the ground it then possessed. It retained the domestic market still, but it could not compete with the foreign article in any other country in the world. In this respect, it was unlike every other manufacture which had grown up in our country. In the year 1816, we had first commenced the manufacture of cotton, and at that time the House was very gravely warned that the youngest member then on the floor would never see the time when the cotton manufacture would reach the point of supplying our own demand. Yet, it was only four or five years before the American market was fully supplied, and we began to export to a large amount. The channels of commerce required the article, and it went into competition with the foreign all over the world. The same thing was true of the manufacture of hats and of boots, more especially since the markets of South America have been open to us. As to the article of refined sugar, if gentlemen would consult the Treasury returns, from 1821 to 1826, they would find that what we imported amounted to almost nothing. [Here Mr. T. quoted the amount of duties in each of those years.]

The American market was fully supplied by our own manufactures, while at the same time we re-exported so great a quantity of crude sugar, that the drawback on it amounted to a very large sum. [Here he again quoted the tables.] This shows that there was more raw sugar brought into the country than was consumed, and of this, doubtless, a large proportion would have been refined had that branch of manufacture been duly encouraged. Why was it that this article alone should remain stationary, or nearly so, while all others were rapidly advancing? Was it owing to any want of capital? This could not be the reason: for it had just been stated that the sugar factories were seated in the very heart of all the capital in the country. We possessed all manner of facility for such a manufacture, and, from our mere local situation, were better fitted for carrying it on than any other nation in the world. The articles which we exported to the sugar markets were such as found a market nowhere else. What reason then could be assigned why such a manufacture should languish? The reason already stated, was undoubtedly the true one. The Government put into its coffers a part of the profit which ought to go into the pocket of the manufacturer. Very exact calculations had been made, and they went to show that the drawback should be nearer six cents than five. He would consent to fix it at six cents, but as the Committee of Commerce had thought fit to report it at five, he should not insist, but hoped that that amount would meet with general approbation. As to the present exports of refined sugar, they were very inconsiderable. [Here Mr. T. referred to the returns.] This was a mere drop in the bucket; it was as nothing in comparison to the amount of crude sugar re-exported.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following amendment:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to the drawback allowed by this or any former act of Congress, unless the refiner of the sugar shall make oath that the refined sugar which is proposed to be exported was not manufactured from sugar made in the United States."

Mr. McDUFFIE said that, in offering the amendment he had submitted, he was governed by an apprehension which he had already expressed, that this law will, at some future time, not distant, become the means of enabling the refiner of sugar to obtain a bounty upon the exportation of his manufacture, under the pretext of obtaining merely a drawback of the duty paid upon imported brown sugar. As the law now stands, the exporter of the refined sugar is required only to swear that he believes the sugar exported was made from a raw material which had been imported, and on which the duty had been paid. Now it is extremely apparent that the exporter of refined sugar may very conscientiously swear that he believes it was made from brown sugar that had been imported, upon no better grounds than the statement of the refiner—the very person most interested to deceive him. It will not certainly be imposing any inconvenient trouble upon the exporter to require him to state positively, what he has the means of knowing with positive certainty, that the manufactured article is not made from brown sugar of domestic growth. I am inclined to believe, that, in five years, the domestic production of brown sugar in the United States will be equal to the whole consumption of the country. It will, then, be exceedingly convenient for the refiners of sugar to receive five cents a pound upon its exportation, where there will not be the slightest ground for considering it a drawback. And it is to provide against this approaching state of things, (said Mr. McD.) that I am anxious to throw every guard which prudence can suggest around this new system of drawbacks.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he certainly should not oppose the gentleman's amendment; it was merely re-enacting, substantially, the act of 1816. He would, however, suggest the propriety of some modification. The exporter ought not to be called upon to swear to that which he knew nothing about. The refiner was the only person who could take such an oath. He considered all these provisions as inoperative. The domestic raw material could not be used in refining for many years to come. He had great respect for the judgment of the gentleman from South Carolina, and although he knew that the revolutions in agricultural industry were quick, still he could not believe, with him, that the Louisiana planters would, in five years, supply the whole consumption of the country. He should recollect that it is more than twenty years since we commenced the cultivation of sugar, and that our population is rapidly increasing. He should be mistaken, if the planters did not, for twenty years, find it more profitable to continue in the business they were now engaged in, than to undertake to manufacture for the refiner. Discoveries in refining may produce an earlier change, but extended cultivation will not.

The bill was ordered to its third reading, by yeas 117, nays 71.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

The engrossed bill "allowing an additional drawback on sugar refined in the United States and exported therefrom" came upon its passage.

Mr. GURLEY, of Louisiana, said: Much as had been said by some gentlemen as to the injurious effect of the bill upon the sugar grower, he, so far as he represented the sugar-growing interest, should entertain no fears as to the effect of the bill, for some years to come. That interest would not, at present, be affected by the bill, either one way or the other. It certainly could have no direct influence on the growth of domestic sugar, and its only influence would be of an indirect kind, operating in a way which he would shortly explain. In the meanwhile, he could not but express his amazement that a bill like this should receive the approbation and support of the friends of what was denominated

"the American System." Here is an instance in which the nation has within itself the raw material. What is the policy advocated by the friends of that system, constituting, as appeared, the majority of this House? They had uniformly maintained that, in such a case, the true policy of the country was to foster the manufacture of the domestic article, by keeping out foreign competition; and yet here they advocated a bill which went on a policy directly the reverse. He had said that this measure would indirectly affect the sugar-growing interest, and it would do so by retarding the period when the domestic article could be produced and furnished of a quality fit, in all respects, to supplant the foreign article, and to supply the whole demand, not merely for the purpose of table consumption, but also for the use of the refiner: for there was no foundation whatever in the assertion, which had been so confidently advanced, that the American sugar was, in its own nature, improper for the process of refining. It was true that the domestic article is not at present employed for that purpose; but why? The foreign article yielded the refiner a drawback of three cents a pound, and, of course, so long as this was the case, the foreign article would be preferred. This alone was sufficient to account for the fact.

Mr. J. S. STEVENSON said, the passage of this bill is insisted on upon the ground that the existing law, giving a bounty of but four cents, does injustice to the refiner of imported sugar; and its advocates claim the sum of five cents per pound from the Treasury, on the exportation of a pound of refined sugar, alleging that a sum equal to this had been paid as duty on the imported brown sugar used in the manufacture. This allegation is in the face of the facts, as the refiners of sugar admit that one thousand pounds of good brown sugar will yield 510 pounds of refined sugar, and leave 230 pounds of unrefined (equal in value to the brown used) and 80 gallons of molasses. Now the 1,000 pounds of brown sugar pays a duty of $30; deduct $6 90 from this on the sugar remaining, but unrefined, and 10 cents a gallon, the duty on molasses, equal to $3, and allow a drawback on the exportation of 510 pounds of refined sugar, at the rate of 5 cents, equal to $25 50, and the whole amounts to $35 40, or an excess over the duty paid of $5 40. This, all must admit, is an actual charge on the citizens of the United States for the benefit of the sugar refiner. He is, in fact, enabled to sell refined sugar in the foreign market at four or five cents a pound less than he can sell it to our own citizens. Surely it is a strange perversion of legislation to tax our own citizens, and expend that tax in a bounty, to enable foreigners to use refined sugar at a lower price than our own citizens, who pay this tax. The principle of the bill is also objectionable in this: that, by giving a bounty to the refiner of foreign sugar, and refusing it to those who manufacture that of your own country, you make it largely the interest of the refiner to purchase foreign and refuse domestic sugars; and he who does so, can drive the refiner of domestic sugar from the foreign market, by your bounty for refining foreign materials.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, said, that he hoped the House would excuse him for trespassing upon their attention at this period of the discussion; that it was unusual for him to force himself into debate, and nothing but the peculiar attitude in which he stood, as a representative of the sugar-growing interest of Louisiana, could now have called him from his seat. A strange state of things had occurred; and (said Mr. B.) I find myself voting against the passage of this bill with those gentlemen who avow their hostility to its passage, because they fear it may encourage the domestic growth of sugar in Louisiana. I have come to a very different conclusion, and am opposed to it because I believe the bill will give a preference to the foreign sugar imported into the United States, over the domestic sugar of our own country, and because it repeals the law imposing a duty upon the foreign article to a certain extent, and to that extent comes in competition with our domestic sugar, and because, in its effects, in some degree, the faith of the nation, under which our sugar manufactories have grown up, will be violated. Can gentlemen doubt that this bill gives a preference to the foreign sugar over the domestic? It is a well-known fact, that the Louisiana planter sells his sugar at this time for three cents of profit per pound more than the seller in the United States of the foreign article, owing to the duty paid by the latter; and if this duty be repealed so far as to allow the refiner of foreign sugar to be repaid the duty on every pound of foreign sugar refined and exported, is not this placing the foreign article not only upon a footing with the domestic, but giving it a preference? as it is well ascertained that the foreign sugar is manufactured at less expense, and can be sold lower, when made, than ours. But, say gentlemen, Louisiana ought not to complain, she has no right to do so, "because there is not enough sugar made in the United States for home consumption; and even should there be, the sugar of Louisiana cannot be refined." I ask the same gentlemen who make this statement, if such was their reasoning when they urged a protecting duty for hemp, iron, wool, &c.? It was not pretended by them that these articles were made in sufficient quantity for home consumption at that time, but their argument was, that our country had the capacity to supply them. That fact, they told us, was all that was wanted to be ascertained; and having ascertained it, they urged the protecting duty to encourage the establishment of their manufactories. Is not this the case with our sugar establishments? Experience shows that we can grow the sugar at home; and as to our capacity to supply it, every year develops the rapid increase in that article manufactured at home, to an extent to justify the opinion that, in a few years more, we shall not only supply our home consumption, but can, with proper encouragement, become exporters of the article to foreign countries. I ask the attention of gentlemen to facts. I well recollect that, during the session of 1824, when the tariff was under discussion, we were then told that Louisiana could never supply one-third of the sugar necessary for home consumption. I then endeavored to remove that erroneous opinion; and what have the last three years shown? Why, facts have answered those assertions—let them speak. In 1824, there was exported from New Orleans, 40,000 hogsheads of sugar; in 1827, three years afterwards, there was exported 71,000 hogsheads from the same place, besides the exportation from Nova Iberia, on the Teche, and what was used for home consumption, supposed to be about 6,000 hogsheads more, making in all about 77,000 hogsheads of sugar made in Louisiana, in 1827, and nearly doubling the amount made in 1824; and from every information I can obtain, the present crop of cane now manufacturing into sugar in Louisiana will increase the manufacture of sugar for 1828 to at least 90,000 hogsheads, within 40,000 hogsheads of all the sugar necessary for home consumption and foreign exportation in the shape of refined sugar. If then, in the last four years, the manufacture of that article has increased 50,000 hogsheads, is it not fair, is it not irresistible, that, in the next four years, we shall make more than we can use at home, if we had the lands to cultivate? and, as to that, I state that there are in Louisiana alone, within what is called the sugar region, 800,000 acres of land, adapted to the culture—a quantity of land enough to supply for ages to come all the sugar that will be wanted for any purpose in the United States. This is no visionary scheme. You are not called upon to believe these things from statements made by interested persons. The documents upon your tables, your official treasury reports, show what I say to be true. Have we not then capacity to make the sugar? Certainly we have, and if so, I invoke the advocates of the duties upon foreign hemp, wool, iron, molasses, &c., to oppose this bill, and thereby to be consistent in their principles. But some gentlemen have said, and particularly the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) that the sugar of Louisiana will not answer to be refined. I would ask, why? Is not our sugar as good as the foreign, and is it not preferred for domestic purposes? If the refiner of brown sugar has not used it for that purpose, it is not because we cannot make it to answer, but, because, by your allowing a drawback upon the foreign article, the refiner buys it cheaper than ours, and we can get no encouragement to make it for the refiners. Why cannot the sugar of Louisiana be made to answer? I should like some reason to be given for it. The gentleman (Mr. CAMBRELENG) can give none. I say it can be made as fit for that purpose as the sugar of any other country. The fact is, in Louisiana, the sugar is so far preferable for ordinary uses, to the West India and other sugars, that the purchasers buy it up and throw it into market so soon as it is made, while the foreign sugars remain for months on their plantations during the summer heats, cleansing and separating itself from the molasses, leaving only a firm and hard grain. Let our sugars undergo the same purification, they will be equally good. This must sooner or later be the case: for once that we make sugar enough for home consumption, our manufacturers will become rivals at home in its sale, and the market will not be so briak; and then our sugar, like the sugars of other countries, will be left to cleanse and harden in the purgeries. If gentlemen's preference to this bill is founded on such fears, I trust and hope they are dispelled, and they are satisfied that we possess, in Louisiana, the capacity to supply sugar for any purpose wanted; we can make sugar to supply the refiners, and this law enables them to prefer foreign sugar to ours. Does it not injure the manufacturer of sugar in Louisiana? If this drawback was not allowed to the refiner of foreign sugar, he would be obliged to use for that purpose our domestic sugar.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

It is equally clear that, to the extent foreign sugar is refined in the United States, the present bill will repeal the law imposing three cents per pound upon that article. The law imposing a duty upon foreign sugar intends that no foreign shall be brought into the United States unless subject to that duty. The present bill intends that, if the foreign sugar be brought into the United States, and refined here for exportation, it shall pay no duty at all—that the duty shall be returned—drawn back; so far then the former law is virtually repealed; and, as a Representative of that interest the protecting law is intended to foster and encourage, I must vote against the passage of this bill.

Sir, the manufactories of sugar in Louisiana have grown up under the existing laws of the country imposing a duty on the foreign article, with a view to the revenue. To do any act at this time to injure that interest, would be a violation of public faith. If there be an interest that ought to be protected and encouraged beyond any other, it is the interest of the sugar planter. It is the only manufacture in our country that has shown that it can be perfected; and whilst the enterprising and industrious cultivator of that article, after having encountered every difficulty, is succeeding to an extent to answer the consumption of our country for every purpose, as wise legislators we ought to do no act which might, in the remotest degree, impair that interest.

Do gentlemen reflect upon the principle embraced in this bill? If you allow a drawback of the duty upon foreign sugar, refined for exportation, why not, with equal justice, allow a drawback upon foreign wool, hemp, iron, molasses, &c., manufactured in this country for exportation? The principle is precisely the same. During the discussion upon the tariff, at the last session, honorable gentlemen, who now advocate this bill, defended the duty upon foreign wool, &c., upon the ground that it would exclude the foreign articles, and compel the manufacturers of wool, &c., to use the domestic article grown in our own country. It was right to compel the manufacturer to purchase the domestic growth, in preference to the foreign, if you compelled the domestic grower to purchase from the domestic manufacturer. This was fair; but, as relates to sugar, pass this bill, and you do not do it. Let me appeal to the justice of the growers of wool, hemp, &c., and ask them, if a bill was now before Congress, to allow the drawback of the duty upon those foreign articles to the manufacturer of them, for exportation, if they would not oppose it? and, if so, why not extend to our growers of sugar the same justice and protection? I can add nothing, upon this subject, to the judicious and patriotic remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEVENSON,) who has just taken his seat. They are too full and conclusive to receive any lights from me.

An honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) has said, that Louisiana is more protected than any of the States in the Union, and that she requires it less: for that he had been informed the sugar planter there cleared $800 to every laborer on his plantation, and that labor there cost only twenty cents per day.

[Here Mr. McDUFFIE said his statement was, that, in the cotton-growing States, labor cost only twenty cents per day.]

Mr. BREWER continued. I did not understand the gentleman; I thought he stated it to be the cost in Louisiana. I know not what it may be in the other cotton-growing States, but I assure the gentleman that, in Louisiana, it cannot be procured, if you hire slave labor, for less than 56½ cents per day, and if white labor, for less than $1, including maintenance, &c. With the finest climate in the Union and the best of lands, the planters of Louisiana have difficulties and expenses, and heavy ones too, to incur, in cultivating the soil. We make cotton and sugar, too, in abundance, and equal to any in the world, but, at the same time, we purchase the provisions and clothes for our laborers from our Western neighbors. This alone subjects us to a heavy diminution for what is made. Our crops of sugar, to be sure, are abundant, and repay the planters for their toil and labor, but not equal to what the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) has represented them. The gentleman who gave him the information exaggerated the picture. All that I can say is, that I most sincerely wish the fact was as he represents. It is not necessary for me to show the incorrectness of that statement; it has been fully done and in a much more able manner than I could do it, by my friend and colleague, (Mr. GURLEY.)

Mr. SERGEANT said he begged leave to make a brief statement of facts in reply to the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia yesterday, (Mr. GILMER,) and from his colleague (Mr. STEVENSON) to-day. The former of those gentlemen had contended that the view presented by the friends of the bill, as to the decline of the sugar-refining business, was not a correct one, and the latter had insisted on the same idea, and had carried it even farther than the gentleman from Georgia, insisting, from the returns exhibited by the Treasury, that there had been more done during the year 1827 than for many years previous. It was very true that, if the year 1827 be compared with any one of the last three years since the drawback had been reduced to four cents, that the amount of fine sugar exported would be found to have increased. He acknowledged that, under the discouragement arising from the diminished drawback, the business had nevertheless increased somewhat within the last year. But still its amount was nothing: for, with all the increase, it amounted to no more than $84,000. But the true method of ascertaining whether the business was declining, would be to take the average of these last three years, while the drawback bore a less proportion to the duty, and compare it with an average of those years in which the drawback had been fully equal to the duty. It would then appear that the business, during one of these periods, had been four or five fold greater than the other. The amount of drawback paid on refined sugar exported, from the year 1795 to the year 1803, was 85,258 dollars, averaging, for each of those years, 9,478 dollars, whereas, an average of the last three years amounted only to 1,733 dollars; but, as at this time the drawback was four cents, and not five, he would add one-fourth to make up for this difference, which would put the average for the last three years at $2,166 per annum. Here then was the comparative result. While the drawback was equal to the duty, the export average for nine years, was more than $9,000 a year. But, when the drawback was made less than the duty, the average export was but a little over $2,000. That is, less than one-fourth of what it was in the former period. If this showed no decline in the business, he was at a loss to conceive what could be called a decline.

When the last law on this subject was enacted, the drawback was fixed at four cents per pound. The refiners were, however, dissatisfied, and contended that, as sugar paid a duty of three cents per pound, two pounds should entitle them to six cents drawback. The refiners of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other seaports, made application to Congress to raise the drawback from four to six cents. The subject was submitted, by the Committee of Commerce, to the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Crawford, who, after carefully investigating the subject, recommended that five cents should be the amount of drawback. The ground upon which he rested his suggestion of five cents was, that, from all the intelligence he could collect, on the question submitted to him, he found that the refuse molasses, &c., was worth nearly, if not quite one cent. It is, therefore, upon Mr. Crawford's report, supported by the inquiries of the Committee on Commerce, that the present bill is now before the House for its sanction.

Mr. WILDE said that, having given this subject some reflection, he was inclined to believe that the bill ought not to pass, although he did not consider its operation a matter of so great importance as it appeared to some gentlemen. He understood that the greatest amount of refined sugar exported for some years past, was but $34,000, on which the drawback was but $11,000 or $12,000. It was said, however, that the business had greatly declined, if compared to its condition from 1795 to 1803. Admitting the fact to be as stated, it might nevertheless be doubted whether this decline was chargeable to the decreased proportion of drawback. During that period, one of our principal markets for the article had gone, for the French Republic cut off our means of paying for the sugar imported. Where was now our market for refined sugar? Not in Great Britain, for there it was completely prohibited by enormous duties. The same state of things existed in France. Nor had we the market of Russia: for they preferred using the article as refined by themselves. The decline in the trade was therefore not the effect of any want of drawback, but was mainly owing to other circumstances. As to France, she had succeeded in again obtaining the raw article from her former colony of St. Domingo, and upwards of twenty millions of pounds of the refined article was annually made in that kingdom. The sugar lands in the United States were abundantly sufficient for the supply of our own market, and it was a great error to suppose that the sugar grown on them was essentially unfit for the use of the refiner. The great reason why sugar of domestic growth was not used for refining, was to be found, not in its quality, but in the bounty allowed on the foreign article imported. This completely prevents all competition. The sugar at present used for the process of refining, is the Havana clayed; but Cuba and Louisiana do not differ in climate, nor can any good reason be assigned why the plant should not thrive as well in the one as in the other of these countries. The clayed sugar of the Havana undergoes a process which is not employed at all either in the British West Indies, or in the United States. It is not pursued in the British islands, because sugar prepared in that manner is obliged to pay a very high duty when carried to England. It was formerly used in the French West India islands, but the practice has declined. The sugar is said to be clayed, because it is drawn into coolers, and then mixed with clay, the subsiding of which partially clarifies the sugar with which it is mingled, and of course leaves less to be done by the refiners who make it into loaf sugar. Mr. W. said that it appeared to him that the benefit of drawback on refined sugar had been considerably increased by the tariff law of last session. [In support of this view, he quoted various statistical statements from the report made by the Committee of Commerce last year.]

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said that he believed that the proposed measure would be beneficial in its results, and whether it was considered as a tariff measure or not, was to him a matter of entire indifference. What were the objections which had been brought against it? There was one which had been urged with great vehemence by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. BREXET,) who insisted that the bill was going to injure the sugar-growing interests. Was this objection well founded? If he thought so, he should certainly be opposed to the bill. But it did seem to him perfectly demonstrable, that the effect of this measure could not possibly injure, but, on the contrary, would greatly benefit that interest. Let gentlemen look at the state of facts. The domestic and the foreign sugar meet in our market, and nowhere else. The domestic article does not supply that market, and the deficiency is made up by the foreign. If, indeed, there was a foreign market for our domestic sugar, then the effect of the bill might be injurious. But establishing the fact that our own sugars had no other but the home market, and was not produced in sufficient quantity to supply even that, it was manifest we must look abroad for the supply of our factories; and what evil effect could result from re-exporting the surplus which they did not consume? Supposing, for the sake of illustration, that our laws allowed no drawback at all, then the American merchant, when he imported foreign sugar, would have to be careful lest he overstocked the American market. But, cautious as he might be, it must nevertheless happen, in the unavoidable fluctuations of business, that there would sometimes be a surplus beyond the demand; and as there was no outlet allowed by drawback, and as the foreign market would not bear the duty, that surplus must be retained in the country, and its inevitable effect would be to depress the price of the article. Now Mr. M. held it to be good policy to guard against such fluctuations.

Mr. CAMBRELENG (in reply to Mr. WILDE) said, that if that gentleman would examine once more the statements he had read to the House, he would perceive that the drawback was calculated at five and a quarter cents; if this difference was deducted, he would find that there was still a surplus of $2,600 in favor of the Treasury. The bill proposed a drawback of only five cents. Mr. C. said that when he introduced the bill he had no idea it would encounter any opposition whatever; he had not been able to conceive any possible grounds on which it could be objected to. As to the fact just stated by the gentleman from Louisiana, if the person referred to had erected a large establishment in New Orleans for refining sugar, he would advise him to use for that purpose the white sugar of Havana, as he would find his establishment, in that case, a far more profitable concern.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, explained, in reply to Mr. SERGEANT, and insisted that what he had stated as to the increase of the sugar-refining business, within the last three years, was strictly true. The export of refined sugar had risen in those years, and under the reduced drawback, from 50,000 lbs. to 230,000 lbs. It might be true that the amount in money appeared greater in some former years, but then the drawback was at a higher rate.

The bill was passed without a division.

TUESDAY, December 23.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceeded to the consideration of a bill to authorize the occupation of the Oregon River.

Mr. FLOYD, Chairman of the Committee on the Oregon Territory, then addressed the committee in explanation and support of the objects of the bill, in a speech which occupied the committee till three o'clock. Mr. F. commenced with the principle, that the best way to settle a new country was to leave it to the enterprise of private individuals, merely extending to them the arm of national protection. After adverting to the manner in which the population of the Atlantic States had advanced to the interior, he referred to a former report made by Mr. Baylies, of Massachusetts, when chairman of the same committee, to which gentleman he paid a just compliment on that subject. He next called the attention of the committee to certain ordinances of the British Government, extending the jurisdiction of their courts west of the bounds of Canada; therein including the citizens of the United States, over whom the British Government had no legitimate authority. After briefly referring to a claim recently set up by some British lady, to lands lying immediately south of the boundary of the Russian possessions on the north-west coast, he descanted for some time on the value of such a port as was furnished by the mouth of the Oregon River; dwelt on the great value of our commercial interests in the Pacific Ocean, and the importance of immediately taking possession of a post so important to our trade. He next proceeded to show the amount of that trade in its three branches, of the north-western, the South Sea, and the Canton trade. He reprobated the policy of prohibiting the exportation of specie to Canton, and referred to the experience of England on that subject. He presented a detailed statistical statement of the results of our commerce in those seas. He then entered on the general subject of the fur trade, now principally in the hands of the British, and insisted on the evidence which goes to show the high value set upon it by Great Britain. He dwelt upon its importance to the United States, notwithstanding the many and great disadvantages under which it was conducted. He next referred to the extent of our whale fishery, and the amount of naval force which its due protection would require to be constantly kept up in the Pacific Ocean, and thence inferred the value of a harbor at the mouth of the Oregon, for the watering and refitting of our ships of war. Mr. F. then proceeded to remark on the value of such a station in case of future wars with Great Britain, as a point from which to annoy her East India trade. After describing the nature of the coast, the physical advantages of the harbor, the mildness of the climate, and the fertility of the soil, he expatiated on the excellence of such a spot for the purposes of colonization, and the ease with which every interposing difficulty would be overcome by the hardy enterprise of the citizens of the West. All they needed was an adequate military force for their protection, the extinguishment of the Indian title, and liberty from their own Government to prosecute schemes of individual emolument; and, on this part of the subject, he adverted to a petition now before Congress, of a company of persons in New Orleans, offering to commence a colony at their own expense; on the leader of which company, a former school-fellow of his own, he bestowed the highest praise. After referring for illustration to the liberality of the Government of Mexico, in offering liberal terms for the settlement of their unoccupied territory, Mr. F. concluded his speech by showing, from the estimates of the Navy Department, that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, with which he had proposed to fill the blank in the appropriating clause of the present bill, was amply sufficient to cover all the expenses of the undertaking.

Mr. GURLEY made a short speech in further explanation of the views and purposes of the company who had memorialized Congress for permission to engage in the settlement of this territory, and concluded it by moving an amendment which went to secure to them certain privileges, together with the grant of a tract of land forty miles square.

Mr. EVERETT did not directly oppose either the bill or amendment, but, with regard to the latter, stated that, in that part of the country from which he came, there was an association of three thousand individuals, respectable farmers and industrious artisans, who stood ready to embark in this enterprise, as soon as the permission and protection of the Government should be secured to them; and expressed a doubt whether an exclusive grant of forty miles square to the Louisiana company would have a just and proper bearing upon other settlers equally enterprising and meritorious. Mr. E. animadverted on that clause of the bill which went to fix the northern boundary of the territory at 54° 18' north, and reminded the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) that, in a late negotiation with the British Government, we had offered to accept of 49° north, as the limit of our claims, which offer had been rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN was not unfriendly to the bill, but thought its language ought to be studied with great care, lest the nation should inadvertently compromise its own rights. He disliked that feature in the amendment which proposed a monopoly to one company of forty miles square; and, believing that the subject required more mature consideration, moved that the committee rise, and it rose accordingly.

WEDNESDAY, December 24.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the occupation of the Oregon River.

The amendment yesterday offered by Mr. GURLEY was modified by striking out that part of it which provided that the Government should extinguish the Indian title to a tract of land forty miles square, in favor of John M. Bradford and his associates, (a company of adventurers proposing to set out from New Orleans;) and also by inserting the names of Paul and J. Kelly, and his associates, (a similar company from Massachusetts,) and Albert Town and his associates, (a company from Ohio,) as entitled to the permission granted by the bill for the erection of a fort on certain conditions.

Mr. WOOD thought the bill, as modified by the amendment, exceptionable in its form, as attempting to reconcile two incompatible schemes for the settlement of the country on the Oregon; one by the Government and the other by private individuals. One or other of these plans ought to be fixed on, and then the whole bill put in a form to provide for that plan.

Mr. GURLEY defended his amendment at some length, contending that it granted to these settlers nothing more than might reasonably be asked by pioneers forsaking the privileges of improved society and going into a wilderness.

Mr. REED rejected the idea of the proposed settlement being required by the interests of the whale fishery in the Pacific. He thought the harbor in the island of St. Juan de Huga far preferable to the mouth of the Oregon, and if a sea fort was to be erected, it ought to be built there.

Mr. FLOYD, without denying the merits of the harbor mentioned by Mr. REED, contended for the importance and value of that at the mouth of the Oregon.

On his motion, the 8d section of Mr. GURLEY's amendment, which contained the approval by Congress of the compact of the Louisiana company, was stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR opposed the amendment generally, as granting nothing of any value, while it had the aspect of giving exclusive privileges to one class of settlers over other citizens of the United States.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, after some statement of facts, and a few general observations on the importance of the bill, and the necessity of having its provisions fully matured from a view of all the facts bearing on the subject, suggested that the present was not a suitable moment to go into a consideration of a subject so extensive, and moved that the committee rise.

MONDAY, December 29.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill for the occupation of the Oregon River.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said that as he had moved the rising of the committee, when the subject of the bill was last under consideration, it would, no doubt, be expected that he wished to deliver his sentiments on the question. He did wish to give utterance to his opinion on the bill, though he was not sufficiently versed in the forms of the House to know, if the amendment offered on Wednesday by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LYON,) might be understood as leading to a consideration of the general merits of the question. He apprehended, however, that as that amendment was proposed as a substitute for, or a modification of, the previous amendment, it would not be out of order for him to take a relative view of the case in some of its principal bearings; and, under that impression, he should proceed as if the whole subject were before the committee, and open to discussion. If he understood rightly, the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. GURLEY) went to grant, to the persons enumerated in his amendment, peculiar and exclusive rights, different in their nature and degree from those granted to other citizens of the United States, who might be disposed to migrate to the Oregon country. He protested against the adoption of any such exclusive system; for he would ask the House if it did not actually amount to the establishment, by Congress, of a proprietary government, similar to that which existed in some of the States of the Union prior to the Revolution? It went even further—it went, in point of fact, to sanction the policy of foreign colonization, as must be apparent to all who would take the trouble to investigate the matter. It had been maintained by many of their greatest and wisest men, that one paramount excellence of their unrivalled constitution, was, that it could be extended to any limits, and embrace any number of independent States, within the great scheme of social polity which it laid down. Now he fully subscribed to that opinion, provided there were one continuous population connecting the various States with each other; provided there were no great break intervening between the projected new territories and those already established; but, at the most distant extremity of the continent, it must be evident that the settlers and the country itself, instead of being under the superintendence and guardianship of the General Government, would be entirely dependent upon the will of the individuals for whom such great and exclusive powers were asked. There was another very solid ground of objection to the proposed measure, which should not be lost sight of; the wild, the lawless, and the desperate part of the community—those whom society cast from her—would, allured by the prospect of impunity for crime, and the hope of advancement where they were unknown, seek a refuge exempt from all salutary control, in the bosom of that wilderness, to the exclusion of peaceable, regular, and orderly settlers. He strenuously opposed the system of what he would term a half incorporation—the giving to individuals, or associations of individuals, vested rights in large districts of lands, upon which, at any future period, Congress would be debarred from laying their hands; and all this, too, without any correlative obligation on the part of those to whom such munificent gifts were proposed to be made. He felt it his duty, also, to oppose equally the proposition which went to grant permission to the settlers to purchase lands of the Indians, and acquire, by that means, the right over the soil, &c. Such a course would be an overturning of the system which had been adopted and pursued, with respect to Indian lands, for more than forty years; it had always been left to the Federal Government to extinguish Indian titles, and the wisdom of such a policy was obvious, not only from the experience of that long period, but also from the very nature of the thing itself. He did not profess a deep knowledge of the laws of nations, and he therefore was not prepared to say in what light these associations were to be viewed; certainly it appeared to him, either as colonists, (and from their distance, and the natural obstacles to an intercourse with them, he would say foreign colonists,) or as a nation in miniature. But what was to be done after these settlers had obtained possession of the land, and erected their fort? Whether to defend themselves against the savages, or against a Russian or an English fleet, he could not say. Why, the President of the United States would be required to supply guns, arms, and munitions of war, and to commission the officers of their militia! Whereas the United States had no militia, except, peradventure, a few within the District of Columbia; all the other militia in the Union were local, and appertained to their respective States. He objected to the bill on that ground also. In direct connection with that scheme of proprietary government, came the consideration of the establishment of a territory under the protecting arm of the Government. Since the first session of the north-west territory by Virginia, the principle had been laid down, in the establishment of new territories, formed, as they all were, with a heterogeneous population, collected from all parts of the world, that the term necessary for them to remain before their admission into the Union as States, was a period of probation, to teach them to govern themselves, previous to a participating in the blessings of the Union. The practice had been invariably in strict conformity with the principle. Now, what would be the consequence, supposing the bill to pass, and thereby to give a social existence to that country? They had, from the Missouri to the salt water of the ocean, thirteen or fourteen hundred miles; and from the mouth of the Missouri to the head of navigation, say two thousand five hundred miles. There was then the rugged and almost impassable belt of the Rocky Mountains; and nineteen-twentieths of the space between the Missouri and the Pacific Ocean, beyond the culturable prairies, which were not above two or three hundred miles, was a waste and sterile tract, no better than the desert of Zahara, the traversing of which, even during the best seasons, was attended with the extreme of difficulty and danger. After describing the tedious, laborious, and hazardous mode of navigating the river Oregon, which was not, he contended, navigable for more than three hundred miles, he observed that he had received a letter from Mr. Wilson P. Hunt, a gentleman who was well known to many of the members of that House, and who was perhaps as well acquainted with that country as any man in the Union, which gave a frightful account of the horrors attending his crossing the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Hunt and his companions suffered, from starvation, as much, perhaps, as human nature could endure. He related one instance, in particular, wherein, after famishing for several days, he had suddenly fallen in with an Indian encampment, and perceiving a half-starved horse wandering near, directed one of his men to kill it; he had afterwards purchased the slaughtered animal from the Indians, for the extortionate price of a handful of bread; and finally, in continuing his route across the mountains, had been compelled to feed upon the hide, which his party carried with them, cut up into thongs. Such (Mr. B. observed) were the hardships always to be encountered by those who crossed the Rocky Mountains from the source of the Missouri. Farther to the south, towards the Colorado, or near the Bonaventura, they could be crossed with comparatively little difficulty; in one place, he had been given to understand, there was to be met with merely a single mountain. The country west of the mountains merited, he must remark, more of their attention than his former allusions to its barrenness could possibly call forth. The principal part, in the vicinity of the mountains, was composed of rocky and stony ridges, interspersed occasionally with spots of ground, giving life to nothing but the spruce, the hemlock, and other trees of a similar description. The soil, where there was any, in the lower ground, was formed merely of the rotten pine leaves, and even that was swept away by the inundation which periodically covered the country on the banks of the river. To-day, the extremity of drought would prevail; to-morrow, all, except the hills, would be submerged in the floods.

He then proceeded to speak of the insurmountable difficulties that attend the navigation of the Oregon River, as it opened into the ocean; of the disadvantages of its harbor; and of the danger incurred by vessels from the high, rocky, and iron-bound coast immediately contiguous to it. It was visited regularly by the monsoons; and most vessels passed by, for fear of being dashed to pieces in making the harbor, or being wind-bound when there. They preferred going many degrees farther to take in wood and fish, the only supplies the country produced. The very names described the place better than any words of his could. The North Cape of the harbor had been called Cape Disappointment by an English vessel, which, for a long time, attempted to get in, but in vain; and it was never afterwards discovered till the year 1798, when Captain Gray, of Boston, visited it, and entered the harbor. With respect to what had been said on a former day, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) as to the fertility of the country, the House must pardon him if he troubled them with a short statement of facts from the most indubitable authority. The party sent out to that place by that most respectable merchant, Mr. Astor, of New York, and to which party the gentleman, Mr. Hunt, whose letter he had occasion to cite, was attached, had tried to raise articles necessary for their subsistence and comfort; but, after three years, could only succeed in growing radishes, turnips, and a few other esculents, of a like description. So much for the fertility of the soil, and the ample returns which it made for the labor of the agriculturist. Mr. B. then proceeded to draw a picture of the miserable condition of the wretched natives of the country. There was no game in the country, with the exception of, occasionally, an elk or a bear; the Indians could not depend upon the chase for subsistence; they had not even shoes in which to pursue it. They lived, he might say, upon the water, upon the fish which they caught in the river, and the roots and berries which they obtained in the woods. Their huts were in the ground, and their condition, altogether, was distressing and miserable beyond all conception. It was his firm belief that, if the settlement were to be made, and agriculture attempted on any scale, large or small, and with any means, they would not remain there two years; they could not endure the incessant rains of four months' duration; they would quit the country for California, or for that most delightful of all climates of the South, the Sandwich Islands, which would be but fifteen days' sail from there. In that manner would their exertions in the settlement be of no value to themselves, and their energies would be forever lost to their country. Suppose, (said Mr. B.,) for the sake of argument, the objects of the bill fully accomplished—suppose the paternal care of the Government had fostered the infant settlement into a vigorous maturity—could it be supposed that a brotherhood of affection, a community of feeling and of interests, would prevail between that distant and solitary member of the family, and those which remained firm and united together at home? Look at that territory, with habits, localities, and associations, altogether different from the rest of the Union. Look at its neighbors: on the south, the new republics of South America; on the north, Russia; the vast ocean in front; separated from those to whom it should be bound by the closest political ties, by an almost interminable desert. Look at these things, and then say whether that territory could enjoy those blessings which the constitution dispensed to every member of the American Union. The habits of the territory would be acquired by an intercourse with those republics of the South. Those republics, which were based upon an ancient if not upon a solid foundation, would engross its commerce, and, in all probability, secure its alliance; and though he would not venture to predict that such would be the case, yet he feared that it would ultimately be the occasion of setting a formidable example of a disruption of the Union. He should not digress on points of honor, with respect to permitting either Russia or England to interfere in any arrangements with respect to the settlement or other disposition of any part of the country in question. Such matters must, of course, operate on the minds of gentlemen, according to their different individual feelings. He must confess, that, with him, they weighed but little. A question had been raised of rather more importance; that was, how would the proposed bill operate on commerce? And that question he would endeavor to answer in a few words. The British Northwest and Hudson Bay companies had long been actively and indefatigably engaged in pursuing the fur trade in the extensive regions of the West. The darkest recesses of the mountains were annually explored by their numerous agents; and the natural consequence of the unremitting pursuit of the game was, that it was, and long has been, rapidly thinning. He had been credibly informed, that the beaver trade, in particular, was diminishing daily. But little property was now made in it, except incidentally, by great good fortune, in stumbling on particular spots which had not previously been visited by the hunters; and these, as every person at all conversant with the business must know, were "few and far between." He himself, though residing at a place which brought him immediately in contact with persons engaged in that pursuit, knew but one person who had made a fortune by it. He alluded to Gen. Ashley, of St. Louis; and even in that case, it was to be attributed solely to the superior enterprise and good fortune of that gentleman, and the sagacity which led him to take the best and least frequented routes. Gen. Ashley's party consists of about one hundred men, and from three to five hundred horses; he shapes his course three or four degrees south of the line usually followed, crosses the belt of mountains at a place where he meets but one or two inconsiderable mountains to oppose his progress, and, in three or four months, finds himself on the Salt Lake, west of the Rocky Mountains. He (Mr. BATES) then held in his hand a letter from that gentleman, which would give some idea of the research and enterprise necessary to render such pursuits successful and profitable.

But to resume his argument as to the barren and inhospitable face of the country generally. It was precisely of the same description at the source of the Columbia River. He had received a letter on the subject from a respectable gentleman who knew the country well; the authenticity of the information which it contained was indisputable, and, with their permission, he would read an extract from it. The following was the passage to which he begged to call their attention:

"The navigation of Columbia River, from the Great Falls, with the exception of two portages, is, on the whole, good; but the country, by land, for one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles, is impassable for mules or horses. It is annually inundated by the melting of the snows from the mountains, and is entirely barren. There is no game nor vegetables, with the exception of hemlock, spruce, and a little moss. On the whole, nothing about the river is desirable, but its navigation and the harbor at its mouth."

Such (observed Mr. B.) were the views entertained of it by an eye witness, fully competent, by experience and knowledge, to form a correct judgment in such matters. He further thought, that, if a settlement was determined upon, the best site for it was about one hundred miles south of the Columbia River. Mr. B. repeated that such information was of a nature to be implicitly relied upon. It was sought after and obtained by the gentleman referred to, with a view to actual profit; it was not merely theoretical or speculative, but practical, and intended to be acted upon at a future period.

When Lewis and Clarke went on their celebrated exploring expedition, they labored, of course, under every possible disadvantage; passing through an unknown country, where the foot of a white man had never before trod; with no guide but conjecture; exposed to the attacks of savage and hostile tribes; and aided only by men, who with a few exceptions, were no better qualified for the arduous service in which they were engaged, than so many soldiers of the United States army would be. Those distinguished travellers gave a most deplorable account of the whole country; an account fully concurring with what he had been saying upon the subject. Lewis and Clarke say that the only good land they saw was at a place they called the Wapattoo Valley, and that it was enough to sustain about forty thousand agriculturists! The whole plan was wild and impracticable. They might, indeed, build a fort for the purpose of self-defence, but those within it would have nothing to defend but themselves. The bill proposed the small sum of fifty thousand dollars for that purpose; now, that sum would not purchase the bark from off the logs necessary to construct it, and pay for the transportation of that bark to Missouri. Fifty men, it was true, might build the fort; but three or four hundred would be required for it: for less than that number could not defend it against the attack of two Russian frigates. In the year 1819, it would, no doubt, be recollected, that an expedition was sent to build a fort on Yellowstone River. Men were taken out, he believed, at an expense of near five hundred dollars per man; and that undertaking, which resulted in a complete failure, cost the nation, he understood, nearly half a million of dollars! And yet it was seriously proposed to build a fort on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, at the very western edge of the American continent, for fifty thousand dollars, only one-tenth part of the sum thrown away upon the other. If it were considered necessary to fortify the mouth of Columbia River, it would be necessary to enlist a peculiar kind of men for the service there. He meant the boatmen on the rivers and lakes; men who would never think of asking for salt or for bread, when a thousand miles in the depth of the wilderness, and who conceived themselves fortunate when they could feast on a piece of hard venison, or a fat dog.

They must not, he said, expect bread in their rations; for every pound of bread stuff in their settlement must come from California or even further south. He wished it to be observed also, that the little trade that existed there, was not on the coast, but in the upper part of the country, among the spurs and branches of the Rocky Mountains, where, and where alone, the furs were found. There was still another objection, which, in his opinion, ought to have great local weight. The trade in furs, in particular of the sea furs, was principally carried on with China and the East Indies. A considerable portion of the land furs found a market in Europe. Now, if a place of deposit and shipment were established in the mouth of the Columbia River, the whole of the furs from the Rocky Mountains would travel in that direction; and the long and fructifying stream of commerce which flowed through the United States, leaving such a rich alluvium behind it, would be diverted into another and an opposite channel. He had no hesitation in saying, that not a single beaver skin would be brought from the Rocky Mountains to the Mississippi. Reverting to his former argument, concerning the difficulty, nay, almost the impracticability of the communication between the Missouri and the coast of the Pacific, across the Rocky Mountains, he observed that even Boston was much nearer the mouth of the Columbia River, in point of facility of commercial intercourse, either by doubling Cape Horn, or by crossing the Isthmus, provided the permission of the Spanish republics could be obtained for the better course. It was not nearer, certainly, for the transmission, if he might so call it, of men; but a man, with a stout heart, and a good rifle on his shoulder, might go to any place where there was animated nature, and find a subsistence.

There was at that present time a gentleman in the city, whose personal knowledge on the subject was great, and who agreed with him (Mr. BATES) in almost all his views of the question. He was particularly well acquainted with the seaboard of that country, and had emphatically described to him the horrors of that barren desert, and the disastrous effect of those heavy and continued rains to which he had before alluded, as beyond the possible endurance of the settlers. That gentleman had remarked, that the winds, loaded with the accumulated vapors of 20,000 miles of ocean, drove the clouds against the rocky steepes of the coast; and he had often, from the sea, seen them, through the vista of the river, bursting, when past the first barrier of mountains, falling in torrents, and overflowing the country. After some farther observations with respect to the difference of climate of the American and Asiatic coasts in the same parallel of latitude, 57°. Mr. B. repeated his protest against the establishment of a foreign colony: for such, he contended, would be the proposed settlement. The very country itself, in which it was to be located, was a disputed country; and though he fully agreed with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) as to the justice of the United States claims to it, yet the fact was, that the right to it was a subject of dispute between America and the British Government. Great Britain, it was well known, never conceded a single point which she could possibly maintain; and would gentlemen, he must ask, risk the chance of a long and sanguinary war, for the sake of making an experiment on the hemlock forests of the Columbia coasts? In private life, he knew, that, if a man desired to vindicate his own rights, it was sometimes necessary to cavil about the ninth part of a hair; and, perhaps, the case might be the same with respect to nations: however that might be, he could not repress the utterance of his solemn wish, that the base of the Rocky Mountains were an ocean bounding the United States, instead of the vast wilderness which extended beyond them.

To speak of the profit derived from these barren regions. They received furs to the amount of two or three hundred thousand dollars annually; that trade, to be sure, might give life and activity to a little town of five or six thousand inhabitants, St. Louis, which was the principal seat of it. But, was a trade of that confined extent worth incurring the heavy expenses attending a settlement, even if no other part of the question were taken into consideration? Was it worth paying for? Was it worth fighting for? Was it, in fact, worth caring for? [Mr. B. continued.] If they wished to proceed with prudence and circumspection, they would send out a party of exploration. A hundred good riflemen might traverse the continent from the Russian settlements, in latitude 57° 40', to California. No arms could compete with theirs; no savage valor, however desperate, could withstand their disciplined bravery. Let them collect a mass of information on the country, and the available advantages it held forth to settlers; and let Congress afterwards arrange, digest, and act upon that information. He would answer for it that such a course of proceeding would produce more practical good effects, and cost much less, than the premature erection of a fort, and establishment of a territorial government. The very name of the place appeared to him expressive of its poverty and sterility. He knew but little of the Spanish language, but had been informed, and thought the conjecture probable, that the river derives its name from an herb, resembling pennyroyal, or perhaps approaching as nearly hyssop, growing near the coast, and called in Spanish oregano. From this fact it was rational to suppose that it had been visited by the Spaniards at an early period of their adventurous career of discovery, and abandoned as not worth the trouble of settling.

He thanked the committee for their attention; and, in concluding, begged them to pause before sanctioning an expenditure, for a purpose perhaps dangerous, certainly useless.

Mr. POLK rose, he said, chiefly for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the existing treaties between the United States and Great Britain; and particularly to the convention of the 20th of October, 1818, and of the 6th of August, 1827; and if, on examination of them, it shall be found that we cannot pass this bill, either in its original shape, or according to the amendments proposed, then there is an end to this discussion. Gentlemen who had participated in this debate had confined themselves to the expediency of the measure, and have had no reference to the present state of our negotiations in reference to the preliminary question of title to the country.

The third article of the convention of the 30th of October, 1818, contains this agreement between the two countries: "It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party, on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years, from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects, of the two powers." The question is not now whether it was wise to make this treaty, but, having made it, what is its spirit and meaning?

The convention of August 6th, 1827, extends and continues in force, for an indefinite period of time after the 20th of October, 1828, the provisions of the third article of the convention of 1818, but contains this additional article: "It shall be competent, however, for either of the contracting parties, in case either should think fit, at any time after the 20th of October, 1828, on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party, to annul and abrogate this convention, and it shall in such case be entirely annulled and abrogated after the expiration of the said term of notice."

These are the stipulations of the existing treaties between this Government and that of Great Britain. Whilst they continue in force, they are declared by the constitution to be the supreme law of the land. Now we have not given the notice of twelve months to annul or abrogate them, and until we do, or receive such notice from them, they are in full force, and are obligatory upon us. Did this bill or the amendment offered to it, violate their provisions? The bill proposed to establish a territorial Government over the whole country between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean; to occupy it with a military force; to erect a fort; to erect a port of entry; and to grant donations of lands to emigrants. Now, sir, (said he,) can we take exclusive possession of any portion of this territory; occupy it with a military force; establish a territorial Government in it; and create a port of entry, thereby excluding all others, unless subject to our revenue laws, consistently with the provisions of these treaties, by which the parties have agreed that the country shall be "free and open" "to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers," until annulled by notice given? Can we do it without first giving the twelve months' notice required? Admit, if you will, that, upon the face of the treaties, it may be a matter of some doubt what their true construction is: we are left in no doubt what is the construction put upon them by the British Government. They hold that neither party has the right to take exclusive possession of any portion of the country; that the right to do so is suspended by mutual consent, during their continuance in force, by the terms of these treaties; that both parties have a right, during their continuance in force, to a common occupancy of the country, for the purposes of hunting and traffic with the natives. That the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States have an equal right, until these treaties are abrogated or annulled, to hunt in the country as they have heretofore done; to take furs and traffic with the natives in the interior; to take fish in the neighboring seas, bays, and harbors, and export them for market to China, or any other part of the world they might choose. They did not claim themselves the exclusive right to occupy any portion of this vast, unexplored region, nor did they deny to us the right of common occupancy with them, for the purposes he had stated. Their Hudson's Bay Company now hunt in the country and trade with the natives. All American citizens who choose do the same. And at this moment, all American citizens, all associations and companies of individuals, had the right by the terms of these treaties, without the aid of Congress, to go into any portion of the country for the purpose of hunting or traffic. They had the right, both by land and sea, without our aid, to have free ingress and egress to and from the country. Such of our adventurous citizens as are disposed to penetrate into the unexplored wilds west of the Rocky Mountains, have the right to do so. Great Britain has not, as yet, established any military posts, and has avowed her intention not to do so unless we do. Her hunting companies may have private defences and temporary fortifications.

Mr. EVERETT observed, that he did not rise to enter at length into the present debate, in which he had not intended and was not prepared to take an active part. His attention had been turned to the subject by the circumstance, that he had been called on by a constituent, (at the head of an association which wished to emigrate to the region in question,) to submit a memorial to Congress, at the last session, which in his own necessary absence, Mr. E. stated, he had done, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) of whose meritorious efforts, in bringing forward this subject, the committee were the witnesses. His thoughts had been in this way directed to the subject, and he confessed he had formed a very favorable impression of the general nature of the proposed measure; although his views were not sufficiently matured to authorize him to obtrude them, at a great length, on the House. He would, however, make a few remarks, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, who had just taken his seat, (Mr. POLK,) on the bearings of the proposed measure upon our relations with Great Britain.

Sir, (said Mr. E.,) like the gentleman from Tennessee, I am fully persuaded of the validity of our national title to the territory in question. That point has been argued with an ability which leaves nothing to be wished, by our ministers, Mr. Rush and Mr. Gallatin, in their negotiations with Great Britain, and by the present Secretary of State and his predecessor, in their instructions on this subject. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, that the right is ours, by every title by which a right to an unsettled region can accrue to any Government. What then is the state of the question, on this admission? It is this: that here is a region, extending more than twelve degrees of latitude from south to north, and more than a thousand miles from east to west, to which we have a clear title, and on the possession of which we may not enter. It is not merely an extensive region, but, as I have no doubt, notwithstanding what has been so forcibly stated by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) a fertile one. If there are rough and barren portions, as there naturally must be, in so extensive a tract of country, bounded by one lofty ridge of mountains, and traversed by another, parallel to it; there can be no doubt (even if we had not, as we have, abundant testimony of the fact,) that other portions—the bank of the rivers, some of its numerous islands, and the valley between the two ranges of hills, are fertile. In that part of the globe, and in that vicinity to the ocean, if the region be as sterile as it has been just described, it is without example in geography. But documents, officially in possession of the House, (I allude particularly to the two able reports of a colleague in the nineteenth Congress, Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts,) contain abundant and positive testimony that a portion of this region is a perfect garden. The importance of its position I will not dwell upon. It lies in the rear of our entire western settlements, and it contains the only ports we can ever have on the great Pacific Ocean; the only ports in which our immensely valuable trade on that ocean could ever seek the protection of a national fortress, in time of war. Such is the region to which it is agreed, on all sides of the House, we have a clear right, and on the enjoyment of which right a rival power says we must not enter: not that this power claims it as hers, but on the ground that it is a vacant region, of which the jurisdiction belongs to no power. This certainly is an important question, and ought to be settled. If the territory is ours, let us have the use of it; if it is not ours, let us give up our claim to it; and if it be doubtful, let us ascertain, as soon as possible, whether it is ours or not.

A convention was framed between the two Governments, in 1818, of which one article provided for the joint occupancy of this region, and that article was renewed at a separate convention, in the course of the past year, to be terminated by either party on twelve months' notice to the other. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. POLK) says the provisions of this bill are inconsistent with the stipulations of the convention.

There are two main points in the bill—the erection of a military post, and the establishment of a civil jurisdiction. With respect to the first, it certainly does not violate the convention. It was recommended by Mr. Monroe, in 1822, and by the present Chief Magistrate, in December, 1825, under whose instructions this convention had been negotiated. The British have taken military possession of the country. If I am not misinformed, they have an unbroken chain of posts from the mouth of the Columbia to Upper Canada. Mr. Gallatin, in his letter of 2d December, 1826, to the Secretary of State, says: "I understood it to be the opinion of the British plenipotentiaries, that there could be no objection to the establishment of military posts, or to a jurisdiction conferred, by each power, to its own citizens or subjects." Again, in his letter of 20th December, he says: "The establishment of military posts, provided they do not command exclusively the Columbia, is not objected to." The first point of the bill does not, therefore, seem attended with essential difficulty.

DECEMBER, 1828.]

Occupation of the Oregon River.

[H. OF R.]

The second point, that of jurisdiction, is unquestionably more delicate. I would certainly be among the last to propose the infraction of the convention, or to recommend a measure that would involve a hazard, or hold out a menace of war in any case, unless the interest or the honor of the country imperiously demanded it. In the present case, I have no other wish than to protect our citizens, who now resort to this region in pursuit of their lawful industry, and to go pari passu with Great Britain in asserting a right to the country. The British have their posts there; let us have ours to protect our citizens from the violence to which they are now exposed. The British, by an act of Parliament, of 1821, have extended their civil and criminal jurisdiction to all the parts of America, not belonging to other powers, and not within the civil jurisdiction of any of the United States. What shall we do to keep pace with this measure? The British Government has objected to the establishment of a territorial government, and yet Mr. Gallatin, in one of his letters, observes, that "it was suggested (by him) and seemed to be acquiesced in, that the difficulty might be obviated, provided the erection of a new territory was not confined exclusively to the territory west of the mountains; that it should be defined as embracing all the possessions of the United States west of a line that should be at some distance from land east of the Stony Mountains."

The truth is, something should be done to keep pace with the British settlements, and to protect our hunters and trappers. The territory is now overrun with the servants of the Hudson's Bay Company. Under a nominal joint occupancy, they monopolize it. They are there in great numbers: armed, of course; supported by a chain of forts; and whenever the American trappers, comparatively few in number, and unsupported by any forts, make their appearance they are driven off, and if they make resistance, are killed. I have been, within a few days, informed by a gentleman, whose name, if I felt at liberty to give it, would command the respect of every member of the committee, that among the latest accounts from this region are, that eight Americans have been shot by the British hunters. If it has happened in the skirmish that a British hunter has been shot by an American, (of which I have no information,) the act of Parliament of 1821 would warrant the British hunting parties to arrest the American, and carry him for his trial to the seat of justice in Upper Canada. This act of 1821, while it excepts Americans from the operation of the monopoly of the trade granted to British subjects, does not except them from the civil and criminal jurisdiction conferred by that act on the British courts.

Will, then, those courts protect our citizens? Ought we to leave our citizens to their protection? Ought we to forbid our citizens from going into the territory? And this, while British subjects are protected in a free range? I am, sir, for allowing our citizens to go, and for protecting them while they are there: and though there must be some difficulties and anomalies, in the arrangements to be made, in a region so circumstanced, it cannot be that the convention was intended to debar this Government from protecting its citizens, in those privileges stipulated by it, and now monopolized by the hunters of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Our negotiator strenuously refused to agree to any express stipulation, which should prohibit us from taking possession of the territory, now in reality possessed, and exclusively possessed, by a powerful chartered British company. But if it should appear, that the other party to the convention denies our right to do what it has done, and is doing itself, then the course to be pursued is open. The bill names no time when the possession shall commence. And the convention stipulates for a mutual liberty to either party, to recede, at twelve months' notice. Should we thus recede, we shall stand in no respect worse, and in some respects better, than we now stand. The territory is, on the theory of Great Britain, unoccupied, and open to the first comer; and she admits our right to establish any settlement, which does not interfere with any settlement of hers.

Should the suggestion I had the honor to make in the committee, some days ago, be approved by the House, and the northern boundary be brought down from the 54° 40' of north latitude, to the 49°, the bill will, in fact, be a very conciliatory one. Our undoubted right to the whole territory, from 42° to the Russian boundary, is admitted by every gentleman who has spoken on the subject. If we fix the boundary at 49°, we in fact give up nearly one-half of the territory.

My opinion is clear, that something decisive ought to be done by the way of vindicating our title. The British Government disclaims the design of colonizing the country, but it is rapidly settling by their hunters. The British official statement, annexed to the protocol of the sixth conference with Mr. Gallatin, sets forth, that, "in the interior of the territory in question, the subjects of Great Britain have had, for many years, numerous settlements and trading posts; several of these posts on the tributary streams of the Columbia itself; some to the northward, and others to the southward of that river." Into this territory, in fact, an American citizen cannot safely enter. This we know, from the nature of things; from the history of the contests between the two rival companies in Canada, before their junction; and from positive testimony. With such a joint occupancy, Great Britain may well be satisfied; but it is, in fact, an abandonment, on the part of the United States, of the whole territory.

I am clear, then, that the opinion of this Congress ought to be heard. As yet we have done nothing but negotiate. The gentleman from Tennessee says, perhaps a negotiation is now on foot. It is possible; but we have no particular reason to suppose that such is the case. And if it were, what will it avail us? The Executive alone cannot settle this question. Foreign Governments know very well the organization of ours. They know that the Executive has no power, unsupported by Congress. What can we gain by a protracted negotiation, unsupported by the expressed opinion of the Legislature, and of the people as represented in it? For these reasons (said Mr. E.), we ought to take the matter in hand. I am willing, for the present, to confine myself to those acts of occupancy in which the British Government has preceded us, and of which, of course, it cannot complain. If it should (which I will not believe) go farther, and insist on turning into a monopoly by right, which has been too long a monopoly in fact, I should then feel prepared to renounce the convention, in the manner prescribed by its stipulations, and take proper measures to maintain the title of the nation, and the rights of our citizens in the territory.

TUESDAY, December 30.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill to authorize the occupation of the Oregon River.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, it could not be pretended by any advocate of this bill, that our country is oppressed by an excessive population, too dense for the extent of our territory, and hence, that it has become necessary to give an outlet to those restless spirits, who, as appears, are willing to go into that sterile, snowy, and mountainous country, fit only for the abode of mountain goats, and wild beasts the most ferocious—a country inhabited by the most degraded of human beings; roamed over by a set of beings who live by accident rather than by design, and who are constantly engaged in combating the elements and the wild beasts of the forests, their common enemy—a country where nothing was to be procured, and where nothing awaited the infatuated adventurers who visited it, but wretchedness and ruin, and all the horrors of savage life. When (said Mr. M.) we contemplate that vast extent of fertile territory which spreads to the east and south of the Rocky Mountains, adapted to all the purposes of agriculture, and inviting to industry and enterprise, we may well be led to wonder what can induce any adventurer to seek the inhospitable regions of Oregon, unless, indeed, he wishes to be a savage; to cut loose those silken cords, and rend asunder all those golden links which bind man to the enjoyment of civilized society, and to take refuge among the refuse and outcasts of Asia, Africa, Europe, and America; to forsake the haunts of civilized men, and find his pleasure in the pursuit of the elk and the bear. We are told that, in that country, there is a body of adventurers, a thousand strong, who have come from the organized Government of England, and whose object, doubtless, is much more to rid themselves of what they considered the burthen of the yoke of civilization, than to reap any fancied benefits which they derived from the vagrant life they lead in that sterile and desolate region. At what period do gentlemen suppose that the population of this happy republic will have filled up the extent of fair and fertile territory which spreads within our present boundaries? At what distant day will the pursuits of agriculture, and all the train of the mechanic arts, have fully taken possession of this immense region? Sir, that period is so distant that no gentleman of the most prolific mind can ever look forward to it. Not even within the reach of fancy itself can the advocates of this bill point out the time when the Oregon territory will require to be organized as a receptacle of an overflowing multitude, which finds itself too closely pent within the limits of the present States and territories of our happy Union.

But it has been said, by some gentlemen, that we ought to take possession of this territory, because, if we do not, some other power certainly will. Well, sir, and suppose they should, what shall we lose? What disadvantage shall we suffer? It is a territory which we ought never to inhabit, and which I hope we never shall inhabit. Why? In the first place, because it is situated at such an immeasurable distance—hundreds, yea thousands of miles from our seat of Government; insomuch that there never can, or will be, any intervening links sufficient to unite it with the residue of our country. It is utterly impossible to conceive, if we ever do plant a colony there, that it will ever form a part and parcel of this Government. I do not wish to characterize the project with harshness, nor do I intend any personal disrespect to its friends, when I am constrained to declare that, to me, it appears a wild and visionary project. It is a country that we can never have any thing more than a parental care over, and one which will return us no benefits at all commensurate with the expense and sacrifices indispensable to our settling and holding it. Grant that it should be possessed by some other power, what harm can result to us? What valuable interest have we there, which requires our taking possession of it? As to hunting, that our citizens can and do engage in at present; and as to the immense quantities of oil and fur that have been talked of, and the action, still more ridiculous, of its giving us a commercial outlet to the Asiatic coast, it has but little weight in my mind. From hence to the Oregon River is a distance of five thousand miles. It is a country from which we shall never export any thing of value, or import to any considerable amount. We may, indeed, bring some small amount of goods into the narrow and miserable strip of territory which intervenes between the mountains and the sea; but it is a trade which can never be disseminated in its benefits through the United States. The vast profits of which we have been told, never will be realized. But, if they could, will they be equal in amount to the vast expenditure inseparable from setting up and maintaining a colony in such a country and at such a distance? An expenditure, not of money merely, but of human life; of the lives of our enterprising citizens, whom we ought not to gratify in the mad ambition of seeking an early grave.

I never doubted the validity of our title to that territory. It is founded on the provisions of our treaties with Spain and Russia, and strengthened by the fact of the priority of our discoveries. Our claim is, in my judgment, perfectly incontrovertible, from latitude 42 to 49, and consider it as good even to the latitude of 54° 40' north, although, with respect to this latter part of the coast, I do not view our title as quite so clear. But is there any necessity for our occupying all the territory we claim? If that were necessary, why did not the old thirteen States send our troops to take possession of the valley of the Mississippi? For that, too, be it remembered, was claimed, and partially occupied, by a foreign power. But they did no such thing. They believed their title was good and sufficient, and they did not consider it necessary to strengthen it by actual possession. And I ask you, sir, what power is there which is now attempting to hold the country at the mouth of the Columbia? Not Great Britain: for she formally surrendered to us the only post we claimed to possess in that country. Nor does she hold possession of it against our efforts: for there have no persons come from the United States to occupy it. The British occupy it in no other way than the Asiatics do, and the French, and the Hollanders, and all other people, who are there, leading a roaming and unsettled life without any fixed habitation. It is true, that, at the suggestion of Capt. McKenzie, a visionary, Great Britain did confer certain rights upon the Northwest or Hudson Company; but she claims no right of possession as against us, and, by the treaty of 1818, she stipulates that the country shall be left open to both parties. Our claims can be fully substantiated, and let them be settled by amicable negotiation. This is far better than to attempt to maintain them by planting a colony in that inhospitable region. Such a colony, once planted, must be protected. If you hold out to your citizens inducements to leave their homes, in the bosom of civilized society, by making to them donations of land in a distant region, you are bound when they accept your offer, to protect them in their new possessions, and this protection must be sufficient to guard them against the attacks, not only of all foreign powers, but of a body of more than two hundred thousand Indians, who are wandering in the region beyond the Council Bluffs. It has, indeed, been said that these are nothing but unarmed savages, naked, imbecile, and worthy of no consideration. But, sir, so it was thought by those who attempted the conquest of South America. They too were unacquainted with the use of fire arms and ignorant of European tactics. Yet they made up by their numbers for the want of arms, and, like swarms of mosquitoes, though individually feeble, were enabled, from their numbers, to harass their opponents; and in coming down in endless multitudes upon a handful of men, however well armed, they succeeded in utterly exterminating them. A similar fate would threaten your colony, and before you could render them any effectual aid, starvation would have destroyed what the enemy had spared. Besides, Mr. Chairman, look for a moment at the vast expense of planting, arming, and maintaining a colony, at such a vast distance from the rest of the republic. Who has forgotten, or can forget, the expedition once projected to the Yellow Stone River? The result of that project stands as a beacon before our eyes. But three boats ascended the Missouri; they travelled a distance of six hundred and fifty miles, carried three hundred men, and in all but two hundred and twenty tons burthen, and this cost the United States two hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars; that is, eight hundred and fifty dollars a head. No one who would not be desirous of preparing a premature grave for their followers, would think of taking less than four hundred men a distance of between three and four thousand miles from the mouth of the Missouri, to take and hold possession of the country. To send less than that number would be totally useless: for we have heard it stated that the British have in that country a body of men more than a thousand strong, besides all the Indian forces over whom they exert an influence. Send the lightest pieces of artillery that you can procure, and send with them provisions to support the garrison for twelve months, and the expense will not amount to less than one million two hundred thousand dollars—an expense which never will be repaid by those imaginary benefits with which gentlemen had amused themselves and the House. Believing this, I am utterly opposed to the whole project.

Mr. GORHAM, of Massachusetts, said, the substantial question for the committee to determine, he took to be this: Whether any such change has occurred in the relations of this country to England, or to any other portion of the world, as required us to assume a new attitude, and to pursue a different policy from what we had hitherto done, in relation to the country on the northwest coast of this continent? It seemed to him extraordinary, after the recent confirmation of the convention of 1818, and while no complaints are made of any infraction of the terms of that convention by England, that gentlemen should urge this Government, with so little notice, to take a new stand in relation to the Oregon River. Gentlemen who called on Congress to take such a step, were surely bound to bring forward some good reason in support of it. In his judgment, it was reason enough for voting against such a bill as this, that all things respecting the territory in question are now precisely in the same situation as they have been for twelve years past. If gentlemen have any new information on the subject, if they can lay new and important facts before this committee, Mr. G. said he was prepared to give them all the attention they deserved. If they went to show that our trade in those seas called for new and additional protection, he should be willing to accord it; but as now informed, he was inclined to believe that, so far as the mercantile interest in New England was concerned, the people were perfectly satisfied with the existing state of things. It was impossible they should be so with the project contained in this bill.

As to the Columbia River itself, it was well known to be a stream of the most difficult, hazardous, and impracticable navigation; and the coasts at its mouth was a region of storms and tempests—a rocky, iron-bound coast—the dread and terror of the mariner. To talk of a fort in such a region, for the protection of our commerce, was idle. If any fort was to be erected there, instead of being at the mouth of the Columbia River, its true position was in 48° or 49° north, in what was called the Sound or Straits of St. John de Fuca. There, there was, indeed, a good harbor; but as to Columbia River, he was told by one of the most intelligent navigators he had ever known, and who was experimentally acquainted with the navigation of that entire region, that there was no harbor of more dangerous entrance. Great difficulty was almost always experienced, either in entering or in leaving it; and vessels had been lost in the attempt. So far, therefore, as this fort was intended for the protection of our trade by sea, the project must fail entirely. For the fur trade, no such fort was needed. The committee had witnessed a decided opposition in the representative of that interest, (Mr. BATES, of Missouri,) to the whole plan. This was enough for him. If the very people who are engaged in this pursuit, and who ought to be the best judges of their own interests, express not only indifference, but actual opposition to the bill, there can surely be no need that the nation should take a new attitude with foreign powers to protect them. If the object is to give a Government sanction to the fur trade in that region, all that was necessary would be to pass an act authorizing the Missouri Company, or the hunters of Michigan, to trade on the Columbia River. At any rate, it will be easy to give to some fur company the privilege of the trade; and, in so doing, you will go as far, and not farther, than Great Britain has done. This would meet the case which his honorable colleague, (Mr. EVERETT,) with whom he reluctantly differed in opinion, supposed to exist, viz: that the British fur traders do now exclude those of the United States, and exercise an exclusive jurisdiction over the country.

Mr. RICHARDSON said, it was always with reluctance that he occupied a moment of the time of the House; but having been a member of the committee who reported the bill under consideration, he deemed it his duty to state his reasons for assenting to it. To settle, in my own judgment, the question of right to occupy, as proposed, the Oregon River and territory, I examined with care the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain, relating to that question. The evidence in the case led me to the conclusion, that the right of the United States to those possessions was perfect. After availing myself of all the accounts given of the river and territory by navigators and travellers of the most respectable character, I could not doubt the expediency of the proposed occupation. But the descriptions given yesterday, by gentlemen on the opposite side, of the Oregon River and territory, have almost shaken my confidence in the correctness of the judgment I had formed. They have described the territory as a region of desolation, the river unnavigable, the whole claim as worse than worthless, and, as it would seem, even reproachful to its author. How are these contradictory statements to be accounted for? Those who have navigated the river and traversed the regions from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, have represented the country as luxuriant and beautiful. Sir, I am old enough to remember having read the speeches in Congress on the question of the acquisition of Louisiana, when that question was pending. The most horrible pictures of that country were drawn in Congress, and spread before the Union, to deter the Government from the acquisition. And, sir, I have read accounts published by foreign travellers, and which were spread through Europe, describing the whole of the United States as a country fit to be inhabited by none but wild beasts and savages. Of such accounts there were latent causes, which time has unfolded. Before the face of the world, events have contradicted those accounts. Surely the statements of gentlemen on all sides, of what they have not seen, are to be received with caution.

The facts and arguments which induce me to support the bill, I will give in as few words as practicable. The evidence on which this Government rests its claims to the Oregon River and territory, demands the first attention. The bill proposes to occupy a territory bounded by the United States in an extent of more than twelve degrees of latitude, and spreading, in the same extent westward, to the Pacific Ocean, embracing about sixteen degrees of longitude. The contiguity, situation, extent, and resources, of that territory, render it necessarily an object of great interest to the United States. The right of the United States to the Oregon River and territory having been strenuously controverted by the British Government, and they being now in the actual occupation of that Government, the measure proposed by this bill requires sound deliberation and a patient examination of facts. The claim set up by this bill will expose this Government to a controversy with no other than that of Great Britain. France, Spain, and Russia, have, by treaty, expressly relinquished their claims in favor of the United States, and a claim the Spanish Government had vesting an incontestable right. This Government is, then, required to establish its right to that river and territory against any claims set up by Great Britain.

[H. or R.]

After examining all the sources of evidence to which I could find access, I am satisfied of the right of this Government to the extent of territory claimed by the bill. Admitting the right of sovereignty, as claimed by the bill, to be established, this question next presses upon the attention of the committee: Is it expedient now to pass this bill? To settle this question, a comparison of the value of the possession claimed, with the cost of the enterprise, ought to be made. The territory of Oregon is nearly eight hundred miles square; or, in other words, its area contains not less than six hundred and forty thousand square miles. Captains Lewis and Clarke describe the branches of the Oregon as passing through extensive basins of land, resembling the table lands in South America. The great basin of the Oregon proper is nearly nine hundred miles in length, and four hundred miles in mean breadth. Is that country, as has been repeatedly asserted on this floor, of no value? What is the testimony of the most impartial witnesses, who, with their own eyes, have seen the country, and in circumstances by no means flattering? The different navigators and travellers, of highest respectability, who have visited the northwest coast, concur in their descriptions of the climate, soil, and productions, of that fine country.

The forebodings which were opposed to the acquisition of Louisiana, have been, as I conceive, happily answered by experience. Had not Louisiana been in the possession of the United States, there is great probability, that, ere this time, powerful rival States would have existed there, to vex this Union with the vicissitudes of war and revolution, and with all the troubles that ambitious and turbulent neighbors have power to cause. A glance of thought on the course of events cannot but awaken feelings of veneration for the name of that great statesman to whose wisdom this Union is so much indebted for results so happy as have been realized, in our own time, from the acquisition of that country. Sir, I do not believe that a wise system of Government—a system well balanced and adjusted—loses strength by being extended. The principles of self-government are capable of universality. They are in concert with the laws of the moral universe, and are applicable to communities on the broadest scale. True, indeed, the territory proposed to be occupied will be a great distance from the seat of the General Government. Will this be a disadvantage? Why may not Missouri or Maine derive as much real benefit from the General Government as Maryland, or even the district of Columbia? Do they not actually derive as much? In my heart I believe they do. Improvements of this age have greatly increased the facilities for travelling and intercourse. By the aid of these, the traveller goes on his way, day and night, at the rate of twelve miles an hour. He is transported from clime to clime as by magic art.

Mr. DRAYTON said that, although he concurred with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) in the general principles of the bill which he had reported, he differed from him in some of its details. The bill assumed that the territory described in it, within 42° and 54° and 40' of north latitude, belonged to the United States. This was in dispute. Our Government has offered, by way of compromise, to relinquish that portion of it which lies beyond the 49th parallel of latitude. Their offer was not accepted; Great Britain denying our right to any part of the country on the northwest coast of America westward of the Stony Mountains. I presume (said Mr. D.) that our Government can establish its claim to the whole of it; but as the question has not been decided, and as, in the third article of our convention with Great Britain, of 20th October, 1818, it is stipulated that the whole country should remain free and open for ten years, (which term, in 1827, was extended to a further term of 10 years,) were the United States to erect it into a territory, to be regulated by their laws, they would, manifestly, commit a breach of their treaty. Congress has no authority to ascertain and define the boundaries of territory in dispute between the United States and a foreign kingdom; this must be effected by diplomatic negotiation and by treaty; until then, no exclusive legislation can be exercised, either by America or by Great Britain. Whilst I object to our converting a country in dispute into one of our territories, I do not agree with the gentlemen from Tennessee and from Massachusetts (Messrs. POLK and GORHAM) that the main object contemplated by this bill would impugn our convention with Great Britain. That convention leaves the contracting parties in the situation in which they were, at the date of its ratification; at that time, a common and undivided possession existed. Both nations may then retain the possession which they had, at the date of the convention; and the subjects and citizens of both may continue to inhabit it; the sole restriction under the convention being, that neither the United States nor Great Britain shall change the political condition of the territory from what it was when the convention was ratified. 'Tis an unquestionable principle of the laws of nature and of nations, that governments are bound to protect their citizens—'tis for this purpose that governments are formed. All that I propose to accomplish by this bill is, to afford the protection of the Government to those of our citizens who permanently or temporarily reside in the territory referred to. The protection which is due to its citizens by the Government, is not impaired by distance, by inhospitality of climate, or sterility of soil. It prevails amidst the wilds of the forest, and the frozen shores of the Pacific, as powerfully as in the fertile plains of the West, and the populous cities of the North. The United States, under its influence, have established forts and garrisons to protect the persons and property of our citizens upon the frontiers; and they annually despatch squadrons, for the same object, to the Mediterranean, the West Indies, and the coast of Brazil. Whether an American citizen be traversing the ocean, or driving his ploughshare into the ground—whether he be in pursuit of gain abroad, or cultivating his farm at home, he is equally entitled to the protection of his Government. The British settlers, in what I shall term the territory of Oregon, (for the want of a known appellation distinguishing the territory upon the northwest coast of America in dispute between Great Britain and ourselves,) are already protected. They have the security which is furnished by soldiers and by fortresses; whether these fortresses be garrisoned by regular British troops, or by the armed men of chartered companies, is immaterial—both are equally the soldiers of Great Britain. Protected by them, British subjects are now, not only engaged in the commerce of our country, but they almost engross it. Should similar protection be afforded to our citizens, (which our Government has the same right to grant as Great Britain has,) there can be no doubt, from their hardihood and sagacity, that they would divide with the British the profits of a lucrative traffic. Without protection, our citizens must relinquish their pursuits, in a barbarous region, where they would be regarded as formidable competitors, and consequently be exposed to all the injuries which they would be subjected to from unrestrained cupidity and power. We have recently heard of eight Americans having fallen victims to the bloody vengeance of rival traders. Such examples must put a stop to their progress.

Before the late war, the Americans nearly monopolized the trade of the territory of Oregon. Upon the bank of the river was a settlement belonging to an enlightened and enterprising citizen of New York, which was surrounded by fortifications, and defended by armed men in his pay. This gentleman carried on an extensive commerce with the natives, until a British force landed and expelled his men from their possessions, the site of which had been purchased from the Indians. His agent, unfortunately, from an apprehension of personal danger, or from some other motive, sold the site to a British subject; consequently, although, under the treaty of peace, all the country which had been conquered by either party was mutually restored, yet these possessions, being private property, were retained by the British purchaser. Since then, comparatively few of our citizens resort to the territory, and nearly the whole of its profitable trade has passed into the hands of a chartered British company, exercising there the sole military power, and an unlimited sway over the Indian inhabitants. The Indians, instigated, as has been strongly suspected, by the arts of this company, have frequently murdered our defenceless traders. Were our traders sustained by the military arm of the Government, they would resume their former avocations, and if they could not again acquire the largest share of the advantages peculiar to these regions, they would doubtless possess themselves of a considerable portion of them. That the exports from thence are of great value, is a fact not controverted. This has been very satisfactorily proved to us by the statements of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) and by the reports of other gentlemen of this House, who have formerly been members of the committee of which he is chairman. It being undeniable, that our citizens, whose speculations lead them to the territory of Oregon, are entitled to the succor of their Government; and it being equally undeniable that the interest to be protected is one highly important to individuals, and therefore to the nation, opinions must be unanimous that the protection required should be granted. By granting it we do no more than the British have done, who cannot complain of our following their example. It does not suit the genius, and it is inconsistent with the spirit of our constitution, to create chartered companies, with civil or military privileges. We ought to interpose in a mode which would be legitimate, which would be subject to no cavils or exceptions, and which, at the same time, would accomplish what is desired. No mode appears to me to be so appropriate as occupying commanding positions in the country, fortifying them, and defending them with United States soldiers. If we resolve to give aid of this kind, it ought to be efficient. An inadequate force will provoke aggression, and diminish instead of adding to personal security. I allude not here exclusively to the violence of a chartered company, but to that of the Indians. Our citizens, in the prosecution of their lawful pursuits, in a country which is claimed as rightfully belonging to the United States, should be equally protected from the tomahawk of the savage and the bayonet of the regular. To effect this, it might be proper not to concentrate our troops at one spot, but to place them in two or three eligible positions. With our imperfect knowledge of the country, before these military positions can be judiciously selected, further explorations might be necessary. A discretion should, therefore, be vested in the Executive, to designate the posts for the troops, and the fortresses to be garrisoned by them, after he has acquired better local information, through the means of reconnaissance, which he should be authorized to direct; it being provided that the number of soldiers for the expedition should not exceed a specified number. It is to be desired, that man should always be under the restraint of laws and civil regulations, yet there are situations in which this desideratum is impracticable; this, at present, is the case in the territory of Oregon. It might be said that the laws of Britain prevail there; but they can only be co-extensive with her dominion; and as we do not acknowledge her right to any portion of the country, her laws cannot control our citizens. However it may be deprecated, it is nevertheless certain, that the only protection which can be yielded is that which is derived from physical force. In the territory of Oregon, the Indians must be awed, and the lawless traders of a chartered company be kept in check by the military, which ought, therefore, to be sufficiently numerous for these purposes. Until then, our citizens must either retire from the country, or be exposed to every commercial disadvantage, and to personal danger in their intercourse with the Indians. Having granted this protection, we should not now proceed any farther. When the question of title shall be decided, we may then determine what other legislative measures may be expedient, in order to give to this territory a government better adapted to the condition of civilized man.

Mr. POLK moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the Oregon bill, and to commit it to the Committee on the Territories, with instructions to report an amendment having for its object, 1st. The extension of the civil or criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the territory of Michigan over all citizens of the United States who are or may hereafter be in the country west of the Rocky Mountains, and between the latitudes of 43 deg. and 44 deg. 40 min. north and west to the Pacific Ocean; and, 2d. An exploration and survey of the Northwest Coast of America, between those latitudes, its bays, inlets, and harbors, and of the Columbia River and its tributaries.

Retrenchment.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, it was

Resolved, That the report of the Select Committee, entitled "A report on Retrenchment," made at the last session, be committed to a Select Committee, with instructions to report, by bill or otherwise, touching the several subjects submitted by that committee to the House.

In offering this resolve, Mr. H. said that he felt it his duty to remind the House that a report had been made at the last session of Congress, by the Committee on Retrenchment. That report had been presented at a very late period, because the committee had had such a mass of investigation before it, as to be perfectly overwhelmed by its labors. In presenting that report, he had stated to the House that the committee had not sufficient time left to prepare the various bills which would be the legitimate consequence of the investigation they had made; but he had farther stated, that a motion would be made, early in the present session, to recommit the report, with a view that the necessary bills might be prepared in conformity to it. He was now aware of the shortness of the present session, but would assure the House that the requisite bills should be prepared with all possible expedition. It was not, however, the intention of the committee to press these bills with any improper importunity. The House could take up such of them as it might deem valuable, and would, in this respect, act its pleasure. The committee had conceived it proper that the accounts of the printers to this House, for eight years past, should be investigated, as it had been supposed by some that the terms of the contract under which the printing was performed had not been strictly complied with, inasmuch as the size of the page had been somewhat curtailed. It was, however, due to the printers to state, that they contended that this alteration in the dimensions of the page had been made as much from regard to the convenience and advantage of the House, as to their own, and that the slight difference which it occasioned had been abundantly made up to the public by the manner in which other parts of the contract had been performed. Under these circumstances, he had, at the last session, offered a resolution that this account should be fully investigated; and he believed that it was the understanding, both of the House and committee, that a thorough examination of it should be had during the present session, when time and opportunity would be afforded for taking the depositions of the witnesses, under the solemnity of an oath.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Occupation of the Oregon River.

The Oregon bill, together with the motion of Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, to commit the same to the Committee on the Territories, with instructions, coming up,

Mr. STRONG, of New York, said he was sorry to be obliged to differ in opinion from the very respectable gentleman (Mr. FLOYD) who had brought the bill into the House, as well as from any other gentlemen who were its friends, and for whose judgment he felt great deference. And lest it might be supposed by any that his difficulties arose from any secret doubt he entertained as to the validity and justice of the American title to the territory, he would take this opportunity to say, that, so far as he had been able to examine the subject, and was capable of judging, his decided opinion was, that the title is in us: for, briefly, it seemed to be admitted, generally, that the elder and better title to the territory was in Spain and Russia. The convention, in 1790, between England and Spain, in relation to Nootka Sound, contains no cession of sovereignty of such a kind as to draw after it the use and ownership of the country. As we, therefore, have the title of Spain and Russia, the better title must be in us. But this is not now the question before us. That is a part of the general question, which this committee cannot touch. In 1818, the United States and Great Britain entered into a convention, the substantive terms of which are, that the country around the Oregon River, with all its ports, harbors, bays, creeks, and inlets, is, and shall be, secured to the vessels, citizens, and subjects, of both powers. The convention says, in terms, that the country shall be "free and open" to the vessels and citizens of both powers.

But it is said that this stipulation did not prevent England from extending, in 1821, the jurisdiction of her laws, so far as respects recovery of debts, and the punishment of crimes, over the whole of this territory, and that this is virtually an act of sovereignty, and amounts, in fact, to a taking possession of it, and appropriating the country as her own. It does not so strike me. But, at all events, the convention was renewed subsequently to that act, and as renewed, it expressly says that the country shall be free and open to the vessels, subjects, and citizens, of both powers, and, thereby, Great Britain solemnly renounces any intention to have taken exclusive possession of the territory. These terms of the convention are to remain binding for an indefinite time, unless twelve months' previous notice shall be given by one or the other of the contracting parties. This is subsequent to all the other acts of England, and, therefore, none of those acts can be pleaded as annulling the convention, as made in 1818. It is not my wish, said Mr. S., that we should even appear to violate the faith of the nation. Now, what does this bill propose? To put up a military power in the territory, under the sanction of this Government. Possibly, under some restrictions, this might be done without contravening the terms of the convention; but this bill lays no such restrictions. It defines the boundaries of the territory as covering the whole extent in dispute, and going from 42° to 54° north. It then goes on to appoint a regular Government, with judges, sheriffs, and all other officers, including custom-house officers, and proceeds to make donations of the soil to American citizens.

But the convention says the country shall be free and open alike to the citizens of both countries. It does not say it shall be open to the action of both Governments—but open to the citizens and subjects of both. Now, if the United States shall interpose its power, and give away parts of the country to American citizens, does it not thereby exclude all others? But the bill goes beyond that; it erects a civil territorial Government, extending its authority over the entire extent of the territory, even to 54° north. There is this marked difference between the erection of a local military establishment and the erection of a civil Government: the former is transient, and may be withdrawn at pleasure; it may be sent, and may be recalled, without affecting, in any degree, the sovereignty of the country; but when the United States sets up an established civil Government over that territory, and your citizens go and settle and form establishments under its protection, can you, in good faith to them, again withdraw and annul it? You have pledged the national faith, induced them to form their settlements there, and thereby you have bound yourself to protect them. May you at pleasure take away their Government? May you leave them ungoverned and unprotected? I think not. If you shall go on to put up in Oregon a military power in subordination to a regular organized civil Government, what will Great Britain say? Can we pretend that this is not assuming the sovereignty of that country; that it is not assuming it to our own exclusive use? Certainly we cannot. And suppose Great Britain should answer us in the same way. Suppose the British Parliament shall set up their territorial Government; that she should appoint her Governor and all her train of officers, and should fix her establishments at some other point near the coast, say at the Straits of San Juan? Can gentlemen persuade themselves that these two Governments can go on peaceably side by side; that one of them will not soon exclude the other; and thus bring the two nations into direct and open collision? Sir, I said that I would not enter upon the merits of the bill, nor attempt to discuss the policy or expediency of practically assuming the exclusive right of occupancy in the Oregon territory. I shall keep my promise. If the honorable gentleman can so modify this bill, that it shall not conflict with the terms of our convention, nor thereby compromise the faith and honor of the nation, I do not know that I shall oppose it; but even admitting that the time has arrived when it is our duty to take possession of this country, I would still forbear to act in the matter, until the stipulated twelve months' notice shall have been given to the British Government. Then, when they are fairly warned, I would go on to legislate. If the bill shall receive any modification which shall leave the subject for the present as it now stands, I do not know that I shall oppose it. One thing I am decidedly in favor of. That is, to explore the country thoroughly. At present we know less about this country than we do respecting any other part of the territory claimed by this Government. If the country is but half as important as it has been said to be, this is obviously the first step we ought to take. Let us know the truth of the matter before we commit ourselves. Before we move, let us know where we are going. If we want to build a fort, let us know with certainty where is the best place to build it, and let us not allure our citizens to leave the comforts and blessings of an improved country, and encourage them to undergo the privations and sufferings inseparable from the condition of early settlement in a new and distant country, till we know what they are to meet, what will be their prospect of support, and what the probability of ultimate remuneration. As the bill now stands, I cannot support it, because, in my apprehension, it proposes a violation of the national faith.

Mr. GURLEY said, the principal objections urged against it were, that it was granting to those companies a monopoly; that it authorized them to extinguish the Indian title to the land; and that it approved and ratified their articles of compact and union. These were the objections of the member from Missouri, (Mr. BARNES;) but, if that gentleman had examined the amendment, as modified, he would have found no place for his argument. It so happened that no such power was proposed to be granted. They had no right, under the amendment, to extinguish the Indian title. There was no monopoly granted: for they were to receive lands, as other emigrants, under the 8d section of the original bill; and that part of the original amendment which approved and ratified the compact of union submitted by Bradford and his associates, had been stricken out. The only plausible objection he had heard, was from an honorable member from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR,) that it literally conferred nothing. He preferred the original amendment, but consented to modify it to make it acceptable to his friends. He admitted that, in its present form, it took nothing from the Government, but conferred something, (though not as much as he wished it did.) It at least gave them our consent to go, and our good wishes to accompany them. The United States are to supply their fort with artillery and munitions of war; but was this, trifling as it is, without a bonus? Do they not agree, on their part, to explore the country, and report to the Government; to carry seeds and the implements of husbandry, into that savage and yet unexplored territory; to cultivate peace with the natives; to keep an armed force, not only for their protection, but for others that may go there? They propose to be the pioneers in the settlement of the country; to take upon themselves the dangers, hardships, and privations, incident to the new establishment. Is this nothing? He thought that the amendment did not interfere with the principles of the bill, and that it should be adopted. He would adopt it as evidence of our good wishes, and to protect them from the odious epithet of squatters, often applied to the best and most useful class of our population.

He would say a few words, in answer to the objections made both to the bill and amendment. It had been said, that the provisions of the bill would violate our convention with Great Britain. He thought this a mistake. The convention placed both Governments on the same footing. It confers reciprocal rights, and imposes reciprocal obligations. Great Britain has given a practical construction of the convention. She has erected forts, and, in 1821, extended her laws and civil jurisdiction over the country. He thought that the United States might do the same. If Great Britain had violated the convention, it was no longer binding on us; if she had not, neither should we by the passage of the bill. He differed from gentlemen who predicted war from the adoption of this measure. He was sure it would give no just cause of offence to Great Britain. It was doing only what the other party had done. He valued the public faith above all things else appertaining to the Government. He would observe it most scrupulously. But, at the same time, he would not abandon our rights, even at the expense of war. Great Britain had as much to lose by a war as we had, and she had too much prudence and foresight to engage in it unnecessarily. If, however, an unprovoked war, as it surely would be, was to be the consequence of this measure, he would meet it as we did the last, and furnish new evidence to the world of our ability to defend ourselves in a just cause, and in vindication of our rights.

He was decidedly opposed to the exploration of the country before the occupation of it, as was suggested by the gentlemen from Missouri and New York. They should be simultaneous. He could see no possible object in it, unless we were prepared to surrender it, if it did not equal our expectations, which he presumed all would disclaim. If it was as barren as the deserts of Siberia, we should never surrender it, and he would do nothing that could be so construed, as would necessarily be such a proposition. He said we could not surrender the territory if we would. We were already committed on this subject, having long since made and published to the world that no foreign power should plant a colony on this continent. We could not, therefore, without violating our own honor, truth, and sincerity, voluntarily surrender this territory to any foreign power. He respected the power and resources of Great Britain. He held sacred our national faith; and if he could believe for a moment that this measure would violate the latter, he would abandon it. The former he did not fear. We had come out of two wars with that nation, with honor both at home and abroad; and if it was the will of Heaven that we should again be involved in that calamity, the same result would follow.

Mr. WREMS said, that he had waited to the last moment, in hopes that some one better able and more conversant with the subject, might offer that view which had appeared to his mind most important, at this time, to be taken of it. That, however, not having been done, he felt himself constrained to claim the indulgence of the committee for a very few minutes, intending to confine himself, at this stage of the debate, almost exclusively to the amendment, the effect of which, as presented to his mind, (he hoped he should be pardoned for the term,) he could not but look at with abhorrence. Sir, what is the amendment? That you shall authorize, by a solemn charter, a private company to purchase out the Indian title to forty miles square, (he believed it was, however, the quantity was not material,) to erect a fort, &c., and then to furnish them, forever thereafter, protection. That, when he looked around and beheld these poor miserable Indians—the aborigines of this hemisphere—the natural owners of that moiety which we now claim as our rightful domain, even to the Pacific Ocean, he could not but feel for their miserable condition. Most of the new States, and some of the old, have tribes, or parts of tribes, remaining in them, all of whom must, sooner or later, be driven out. It is true, sir, said Mr. W., we profess to make treaties with them, and to be disposed to treat them humanely and justly; nay, sir, we even go farther: we invite them to consider our Chief Magistrate their political friend and father, and to come here to have talks with him, and to get justice done them; and we declare to the world that our feelings towards them are kind and paternal, whilst, at the same time, we are lending a favorable ear to propositions like the amendment, which, if adopted, must and will prove their certain destruction, without a possibility of escape. Now, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. W., what are Indians? Are they not men, although I admit they are “wild men—whose hands have been prophetically pronounced to be raised against every man, and every man’s hand raised against them—archers, who were to live by their bow,” and pronounced, on this floor, to be living by accident; still they are men—human beings—and as such, accountable, according to the light afforded them; and although not blessed like ourselves with the Gospel, yet “they have a law written upon their hearts,” by an honest and correct attention to which, they too are to be saved. I am aware, sir, said Mr. W., that I am subjecting myself, not here, but elsewhere, to the charge of fanaticism, for such opinions: but that is of little consequence; I feel it my duty to endeavor to enlist a feeling in their behalf; and wherever duty points the way, I trust I shall never be found unwilling or afraid to pursue it.

I do, therefore, most earnestly entreat this august assemblage—this the American nation, in her representative character—by all those obligations growing out of the laws of Christianity, morality, and of honor, to save those poor, illiterate, unfortunate inhabitants of the wilderness from total annihilation. And how are we to do this, unless we preserve, in our own right, some portion of this immense territory as their asylum—their last dernier refuge! And where so suitable as those distant regions, now so coveted by white men, that we, to gratify them, shall unnecessarily enter into obligations that shall hereafter oblige us, in good faith, to protect them, to the destruction of the whole Indian race? Will gentlemen attempt to justify this, by the plea that our ancestors did it before us? And to discontinue the warfare would be to denounce their conduct. If so, I will beg leave to ask such, if there be no difference between our situation and theirs! They fled to this, then a western wilderness, not only from starvation, but from a religious persecution, even worse than the dangers they had to encounter; whereas we have already more lands than we know what to do with, the States refusing to take, almost gratuitously, that which is owned by the United States within their several geographical limits; possessing freedom and every other blessing most desirable, and nowhere else to be found, at least so extensive, together with the right of worshipping God under our own vine and fig-tree. Whilst thus situated, we can have no excuse, certainly none from the example and the conduct of our ancestors, until our situation has become like theirs. Then the plea, that “necessity has no law,” may be raised, but surely at this time it cannot. I repeat the call upon this committee, by all that is desirable to us as a nation, and as men, religious, moral, and honorable, to cultivate something like charity towards this unhappy, illiterate, helpless people, and not to enter into an obligation that is to be the foundation of their murder. I have no objection, said Mr. W., to take possession of this whole territory, if it be necessary, so soon as it can be done consistent with our treaty stipulations; but upon this branch of the subject I will not trouble the committee.

Mr. DEAYTON proposed to amend the bill, by striking out all after the enacting words except the last section, and in lieu thereof, to insert—

“That the President of the United States be hereby authorized to erect a fort or forts on that part of the Northwest coast of America which is situated west of the eastern base of the Stony Mountains, between forty-two and fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of North latitude, and to garrison them with a competent number of the United States troops, not exceeding four hundred.

“Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the aforesaid territory to be explored by such officers of the corps of engineers as he shall select, and that he may delay sending thereto any of the troops of the United States, until after such exploration shall have been made.”

In supporting my amendment to the bill under discussion, said Mr. D., I shall trespass very little upon the time of the committee. My objections to some of its details I have already submitted; upon some other parts of it, in consequence of observations subsequently made, I will offer a few remarks. As I propose to retain only the leading feature of the bill, which is to be found in its second section, in order to express my meaning clearly, it becomes necessary to strike out all the sections of it, except the last, in which the appropriation is contained.

The third section allows to settlers, being citizens, certain quantities of land. In the existing state of things, this is unattainable. Unless the sovereignty over the territory, and the ownership of the soil, be in the United States, they cannot grant a title to any part of it to individuals. However we may regard the sovereignty and the ownership of the United States, to be capable of the plainest proof, yet Great Britain contests them, and we have stipulated, by treaty, that, until the question between us be decided, neither party shall be acknowledged as sovereign or owner, but that the whole of what is mutually claimed, shall remain "free and open" to the subjects and citizens of both nations. Whilst this stipulation continues of force, we would not admit that Great Britain could confer a title to any part of the territory upon a British subject; and if she cannot, as, by the treaty, she is placed upon an equal footing with us, neither can we. Were this bill to become a law to-day, it is obvious that no title could be given to an American settler; nor is it possible that any can, until the sovereignty be vested in the United States. When that event occurs, the United States alone can extinguish the Indian title. This power, so far as relates to lands occupied by Indian tribes, out of the limits of a State, but within the territory of the United States, belongs to the United States; it is exclusively granted to them by the constitution, and they cannot delegate it to others. At present, then, all grants to land in the territory we are speaking of, must be utterly void. To promise them, by any act of legislation, would be premature and delusive.

That the execution of the fourth section of the bill would be a violation of our treaty with Great Britain, has been so fully shown by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) that I shall not incur what he has said, by adding to it any arguments of mine. My reasons against the fifth section I stated upon a former occasion; I will, therefore, not be guilty of a repetition of them. The amendments which I now offer will provide for all the objects necessary to be acted upon. They will ensure a protection to our citizens in the pursuit of their distant traffic, and enable the Executive, by being possessed of the knowledge required by a scientific exploration, to select the most eligible positions for military posts. It is contemplated that the engineers to be appointed for the expedition shall be accompanied with a suitable escort, that they may conduct their operations in safety. For that purpose, I shall move, at a future time, to fill the blank in the 6th section with an adequate sum.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said that he felt it incumbent on him to rise in support of the bill, which he had the honor to bring before the notice of the House. Misconceptions had prevailed relative to its nature, and misconstructions had been made as to its object and purport; and it was therefore necessary that the committee should be put in possession of the real facts of the case, and of the advantages to the Union generally, with which the proposed measure was pregnant, before the House was called upon to legislate upon the subject. He could not but observe, in the first place, that some of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) were not, according to his conception, authorized by the British act of Parliament of the year 1821. He held in his hand, at that very time, the act of Parliament which gave that extensive power to the Anglo-American courts. It provided for the punishment of offenders in all parts of North America, not within the limits of Upper or Lower Canada, or amenable or subject to the civil jurisdiction of any State or Territory in the United States. That provision of the British law, it must be perceived, was susceptible of an indefinite extension. The authorities of British North America might, by virtue of that act of the British Parliament, exercise a sovereign control over all the citizens of the United States residing in that large tract of country which remained unsettled, or which was not organized into States or Territories, between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains. He might there also correct an error of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) which would not admit of so speedy an explanation as the former one, which he had alluded to. There was no such company in existence, then, as the British Northwest Company; the affairs of that company had, from some cause or other—mismanagement it might be presumed—become embarrassed, and the shares of it had been purchased by the Hudson Bay Company. The former was merely a private association of individuals, engaged in the fur trade for their joint and mutual benefit. The latter was an incorporated body; the objects of both companies were now pursued, and their business transacted by virtue of the Royal Charter. Much had been said by gentlemen, in particular on the part of the honorable member from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) as to the insignificant amount and unprofitable nature of the trade in furs and peltry; but what appeared to be the circumstances with respect to the question, from which a correct result could be deduced?

The statement of a plain and simple matter of fact would show that, more fully and explicitly than he possessed language to depict

The shares in the Hudson Bay Company, which originally were of the value of £20 each, were now selling in the market at the enormous price of £200 sterling. Would anybody, in the face of such a decisive and self-evident argument as that, have the hardihood to say that that was not a valuable stock; and that the trade which paid the interest upon, and returned the profit for, the enormous amount of capital employed by the Hudson Bay Company, was not of a highly lucrative branch of commerce? It appeared perfectly clear to him, and he was confident must be equally apparent to that House, that the persons who negotiated that convention or treaty with Great Britain, were either deplorably ignorant, or entirely regardless of the best interests of the nation relative to that important and necessary article of furs; and in saying that, it was not his intention to enlarge upon what the British called a waiving on the part of the United States, of what he, (Mr. FLOYD,) in common with every gentleman in that House, who would reflect upon the subject, considered their incontestable rights of sovereignty. The committee should bestow on every branch of the subject that attentive consideration to which its importance, in every point of view, rendered it so eminently entitled. There was a tract of country nearly nine hundred miles in extent each way; from the western base of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, and on the seaboard from the Russian settlements in the latitude of 54° 40' north, down to 42°. Was not that vast region, containing, as it did contain, six or seven hundred thousand square miles, worth their notice and care—notwithstanding the fact might be as represented by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) that some portion of the country was rocky, barren, and unproductive? But they should not omit to bear in mind, that it was the only country which produced furs in any considerable quantity; it was the only part from which the United States could obtain those valuable articles, which were alike necessary for home consumption, and for the carrying on of that great staple of American commerce, the trade with China. Was the committee aware of the fact, that the duty paid in England, during the last year, on the importation of foreign furs alone—foreign furs only, it must be observed—amounted to upwards of eleven hundred thousand dollars? The preceding year the same duties poured into the British treasury more than one million seven hundred thousand dollars. For foreign furs only, he could not too often repeat; entirely independent of the vast supply furnished by that active and powerful body corporate, the Hudson Bay Company. And yet the House must be gravely and seriously (if the extraordinary assertion did not defy all powers of gravity and seriousness to listen to it) told, that this trade was not worth the caring for. It was of no value. It amounted to but a very small sum, some two or three hundred thousand dollars annually; and that the expenses of carrying into execution the bill then before them, would only involve the nation in great expenses, unattended by any corresponding advantages? Such was the argument, if argument it could be called, which was advanced by the opponents of the bill in the very face of plain facts, of official statements, of figures, which demonstrated the benefits of that trade to Great Britain—of that Britain which was their great commercial rival on every sea and in every market of the world—of that Britain, finally, from whom America must purchase furs for her own use, at whatever price might be put upon them, if she tamely consented to the surrender of a country which was justly hers by virtue of the great basis of all valid titles—discovery, occupancy, and treaty; and which was as necessary for the security of her western boundaries, as it was desirable for the best interests of her commerce. He was really at a loss to account for the peculiar objections made to the bill. The principal one was merely an incessant reiteration of the cry, "What will England think? How will England receive the intelligence that we mean to occupy the territory in question?" Why, what was it to them, as the Representatives of a free and independent nation, what England thought, or whether she condescended to think at all about the matter? Were they to sit in that House and legislate for a great nation under fear of the displeasure of England? He knew and appreciated the power and influence of the British empire; but he did not fear it: for, as to giving cause of displeasure, that country had, it was indisputable, as much reason for apprehension on that score as the United States could possibly have.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said he was right glad that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DRAYTON) had thought proper to offer his amendment. It meets, said Mr. B., my views in the most essential particular, and removes many of my objections to the bill. Indeed, when I first had the honor of addressing the committee, I suggested the propriety of substituting for the original bill a scientific exploration of that immense region, of which we yet know so little. Many positive advantages might be gained to the nation from such an exploration, and we should at least be saved from the probable evils attendant upon a leap in the dark. As yet, we know little of the geography of that extensive country, and almost nothing of its topography and geological peculiarities. The natives, too, are strangers to us. We are very imperfectly informed as to their localities, their numbers, their tempers, whether peaceful or warlike, and their general character and habits; and I consider it of great importance that we should acquire a competent fund of knowledge on these particular subjects of inquiry, before we attempt the establishment of social and civil institutions among them. My objections to the military occupation of the country are fewer, and of a less decided character, than to the establishment of a territorial Government, and the extension of our civil polity there. The former may be a dangerous, and certainly will be an expensive experiment; but the latter is, in my judgment, pregnant with evils of an alarming character: for I should consider it nothing short of an entering wedge to a system of foreign colonization.

If the object of the military occupation be the protection of the fur trade, it seems to me that the coast is an improper location of the troops: for, if I am rightly informed, most of that traffic is carried on far in the interior, on the tributary branches of the Columbia, and in the distant valleys of the mountains. Some of the outposts were, formerly, at least twelve hundred miles from Astoria. These outposts must be, in a greater or less degree, fortified, not, indeed, by works capable of resisting the assaults of English or Russian cannon, but in a manner strong enough to repel the attacks of the ignorant and ill-armed savages that surround them. It is at these interior positions that the fur is collected from the Indians, and afterwards concentrated at the mouth of the river for exportation. A party for the interior exploration of the country of the Columbia, should be composed of very different materials, and organized in a very different manner, from one destined to make an examination and survey of the coast. Indeed, the latter is wholly unnecessary: for the coast is already known in its general aspect, and I believe every bay and harbor, from Cape Disappointment to Cook's Inlet, has been surveyed and sounded. Not so with the interior; of that we are still lamentably ignorant.

Mr. B. said that he should have forbore any further remark upon this subject, but he felt called upon to make a brief reply to some observations of the gentleman from Virginia, the original mover of the proposition, (Mr. FLOYD,) who seemed to have misunderstood him in several respects, and, in his argument, to have confounded several matters that had no necessary connection with each other. Any man, said Mr. B., at all acquainted with the northwest section of this continent, or with the routes commonly followed by the fur traders, and other explorers of that extended region, must know that the country, as a whole, is very imperfectly known, and that every general characteristic description ought, in common justice, to be received subject to many petty exceptions. If, therefore, the gentleman from Virginia had succeeded in showing that there are some exceptions to the sterile and inhospitable character of the country, it would avail him nothing in the argument. He might prove a thousand little green spots, at distant intervals, in that extensive desert, and still the country would remain a barren and cheerless waste—still my account of it would remain unimpeached. I believe it is perfectly just, and I know it is in accordance with the most respectable testimony.

The gentleman from Virginia has recently received from General Clarke what he considers a favorable account of the Oregon country. General Clarke is a good witness on this subject, and I take it for granted that his best evidence is embodied in his book, Lewis and Clarke's Travels; for the facts there related are ascertained by ocular observation. Examine that book, sir, and you will find a most appalling description of the country. They say that the only good land for cultivation, in the valley of Columbia, is sufficient to support about forty thousand agriculturists! And I have it on the authority of Mr. Hunt, a gentleman surpassed by few in intelligence, and by none in respectability, that even this meagre exception is subject to annual inundation in May and June.

The gentleman is utterly mistaken in his version of the information which I gave the committee, as derived from my enterprising townsman, General Ashley. His route lies far south of the sources of the Columbia. Crossing the range of the Rocky Mountain, where it subsides almost into a plain, presenting few obstacles to wheel carriages, and none to pack horses, he makes his trading post at the Great Salt Lake, which I suppose to be the reservoir of the Bonaventura. I am sorry the gentleman did not listen to my former remarks more attentively. If he had, he would not have confounded what I said of an exploring trip of one of Ashley's men from the Salt Lake, southwest, towards the Gulf of California, with the description which I attempted of the gloomy mountains and pathless valleys of the Oregon—valleys which, I say again, and on the best authority, are impracticable for horses or mules—valleys where the natives travel on the water, and live in the earth.

The gentleman from Virginia has so long and so zealously dwelt upon this subject, that he seems to have arrived at the conclusion that nothing is wanting but a little aid from the Government, to make this river of his adoption a great channel of North American commerce, and the establishment at its mouth the great entrepot of Eastern and Western intercourse. To swell the magnitude of the enterprise, he draws into his calculation the total exports of furs and peltries from the United States and Canada; he presses into his service the Hudson's Bay Company, Lord Selkirk, and Mr. Astor; and embraces in his compendious view the coast of the east and the west, from Labrador to Mexico, and from Oonalaska to California. And, not content with monopolizing the whole fur trade of the continent, for the intended province of Oregon, the gentleman stretches his commercial views to other sources of wealth and power; the intended people of that country are to drive a thriving trade in ginseng and sandal wood! Sir, it may be so; ginseng grows almost everywhere on this continent; but, as for sandal wood, who ever heard of a chip of it at the Oregon? It grows only between the tropics, about 23° of latitude south of this favored river. With all respect, I must be permitted to say, that these calculations are ideal and visionary. Let the Government put forth all its strength, and pour out all its treasures, it cannot change the character of the country or the river; the one will remain sterile and inhospitable, and the other will continue hard to enter, and still harder to navigate. No furs will seek an outlet through the Columbia, but those caught upon its own waters, or their immediate vicinity; and if you establish on that river a province with a population as dense as that of China, and build a fortress as strong as the seven towers of Constantinople, you can draw no more: the physical difficulties of the country forbid it.

The whale fishery, too, it seems, is to be made tributary to the commercial importance of the intended territory. Ask any gentleman from Massachusetts—ask your Nantucket whalers—whether any one of their ships ever touched at the Oregon, and they will tell you that, if one was ever there, it was driven there by some calamity. Yet, who, that knows the character of that wonderful people, will doubt that, if there was any thing desirable in the harbor of the Oregon, their sagacity would have discovered it, and if it were worth contending for, their enterprise and courage would have made it their own? They are the best navigators in the world, and not bad judges of their own interest. In their bold pursuit of wealth, they have already discovered about one hundred and fifty islands in the trackless waste of the Pacific, whose bays afford them every convenience in the pursuit of their vocation, and secure shelter in times of danger. I am not surprised at the different and contradictory accounts given of the Oregon, as a harbor for ships; and I attribute the disagreement to the different seasons of the year at which it was visited, or the prevalence of particular winds, when it was entered or departed from.

I have been accused, said Mr. B., of blowing hot and cold, as to the value of the trade of that country—of pretending, at one time, that it is worthless, and, at another, that it is very important. Surely I need not take the trouble to explain, if the gentleman does not already perceive how a particular branch of trade may be very important to a few dealers, in a little town of five or six thousand people; and yet, when viewed in connection with the general interests of a nation of fifteen millions, sink into comparative insignificance.

The gentleman speaks of the transportation of troops and munitions to the mouth of Columbia, as if it were an enterprise of daily occurrence, and easy to be performed. Sir, he is egregiously mistaken; it is an Herculean task, full of toil, and danger, and privation; and its successful accomplishment requiring the exertion of great and peculiar talents. The ordinary material of the army is, in my judgment, but little qualified for the extraordinary purposes of such an expedition. The common men are disqualified, by education and habits, for a service so novel and peculiar; and even the talented and valuable officers furnished by that admirable institution, the West Point Academy, would find all their elaborate science and skill of little avail in a scene so novel, and so wholly different from the general course of military movements. But the gentleman gets over all these difficulties by the assumption of a very flattering fact. It seems to me, we are all fit to command the armies of the republic. We are all born generals. I am sure, sir, that I possess little or nothing of this military inspiration; and I cannot help fearing that the honorable gentleman has been led into the charitable error of imputing to all his countrymen the possession of these high qualities of command by his own consciousness of possessing them. It is related of King Philip of Macedonia, that he was astonished at the wonderful abundance of military genius among his enemies, the Athenians, who annually elected ten generals to command their troops, by diurnal rotation; whereas his majesty of Macedon could find, in all his dominions, no man but Parmenio, fit to command his armies. I cannot tell whether we most resemble the subjects of King Philip, or the citizens of Athens; but I am strongly inclined to the opinion, that we are not quite all generals, fit to be intrusted with the safety of the blood and treasure of the nation. Were I about to plan such an expedition, I would authorize the Executive to enlist a corps for the special purpose. I would empower him to choose men, both to command and to serve, whose former vocations, whose habits and peculiar qualifications, would afford some guarantee of ultimate success. It is not the business of a day; it takes two seasons to convey troops from the Mississippi to the Oregon. The first winter must necessarily be spent on the Upper Missouri, near the country of the Mandan Indians, where preparations must be made for the toilsome and perilous journey of the next season. All the privations of a wilderness of three thousand miles in extent, must be encountered, and numerous tribes of the wild natives must be passed, all of whom must be either conciliated or subdued. In such a service, the labored acquirements of military science would be of little avail, and the impetuous ardor of insubordinate valor would be impertinent, and worse than useless. The commander of such a corps should be habituated to the wilderness; he should possess a calm, cool, and forbearing intrepidity, and a deep acquaintance with the workings of untutored nature. By the exercise of some of these valuable qualities, Clarke saved the whole party of which he was the second in command. The private men, too, should be selected for their particular aptitudes and qualifications. And, for such employment, where will you find men to compare with the hunters and boatmen of the North and West—the hardy sons of the forests, the lakes, and the rivers, whom no dangers can daunt, no toils exhaust, no privations subdue! Men whose adventurous steps have measured every prairie in the boundless West, and whose bark canoes have traced every stream in the dark valleys of the mountains. Such are the materials of which the expedition should be composed; and without such, the enterprise will begin in doubt and hazard, and will probably end in disappointment and mortification.

I am not, said Mr. B., so entirely opposed to the military occupation of the country as to resist it in every form; but I do believe that the provisions of this bill are not adapted to the end proposed, and cannot possibly accomplish the design. Can it be that one or two little forts, garrisoned by a handful of our ordinary troops, can afford protection to our traders throughout that extensive country; stretching, as it does, from latitude forty-two to fifty-four, and from the shores of the Pacific to the ridge of the Rocky Mountains? Sir, it cannot be.

One word, sir, on the subject of extending civil jurisdiction over the country, and I have done. Several gentlemen have dwelt with earnest emphasis upon the extension of the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts, by an act of the British Parliament; and seem to consider that act as novel and anomalous in the practice of this continent. But, sir, they have overlooked our own statute book. The British Parliament has but followed in the footsteps of the American Congress. The jurisdiction of our courts has been long since extended over that whole country; and for the truth of this assertion, I refer to our own judiciary acts, and especially to the Indian intercourse law of 1802. I cannot refer at this moment to page and section, for I was unexpectedly drawn into this debate by the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) without any previous design of again addressing the committee. I have been a law officer of the Government on the frontier, and, as such, have been called upon to aid the court in the exercise of the power in question. I have prosecuted indictments for offences committed far beyond the civil limits of the States and territories; and I doubt not, that every Representative here from a frontier State can bear witness to the practical exercise of the same jurisdiction.

That our civil jurisdiction is extended to that country is beyond dispute; but I will not undertake to say that it is organized in such a form, and defined with such precision, as to afford a certain remedy for every instance of wrong. If our laws be defective in this particular, I will join the gentleman in applying an immediate remedy, by investing the frontier courts with all such powers as may be necessary to the protection of our citizens in every part of the national domain.

The progress of this debate has had, I believe, no other effect than to prove to the members of this House how ignorant we all are of the subject-matter of this bill, and how unfit we are, at this moment, to act understandingly, and with self-satisfaction, in taking any definitive course that may give direction and tone to the future measures of the Government. Sir, as yet, we have but a glimmering prospect of the promised land. We see it as through a glass darkly; and I do in my conscience believe, that any affirmative course that we may now take (beyond a simple exploration) will be adopted at the manifest hazard of the interest of the nation and the safety of the citizen.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. POLK, the House took up the bill "to amend an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and to perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to vacant and unappropriated lands in the same,' passed April 18th, 1806."

This bill had been under consideration during the last session, in Committee of the Whole, and had been laid upon the table during the pendency of an amendment offered by Mr. McLEAN.

This amendment Mr. McLEAN now withdrew, in favor of another, proposed to be offered by Mr. CROCKETT.

Mr. CROCKETT said that he had offered to the House the amendment to the bill, with the confident hope that, if he could succeed in convincing the House that this could not prove a precedent for its action in relation to other States, and that the land it proposed to give away would, if retained, be of no use or value to the General Government, they would adopt the amendment, and pass the bill. He regretted, on this subject, to be under the necessity of differing from his respectable colleague, (Mr. POLK,) but the House would remember that his colleague and himself were very differently situated. They had received instructions from the Legislature of their State, to ask Congress for a general grant of all the public lands remaining unpatented within its bounds for the purposes of education; and, having no prior obligation to conflict with those instructions, they were, of course, bound to obey them. He, it was true, as one of the Representatives of the State of Tennessee, was included within these instructions; but he had a higher authority, to which it was his duty and his pride ever to bow—his last instructions were from his own constituents, and these, in his estimation, took precedence of all others. The people who had honored him by making him their Representative, conceived that they were fairly entitled to the lands for which they had instructed him to ask this House, and which it was the object of his amendment to confer upon them.

He asked this, however, not on the ground of strict legal right; he presented nothing in the shape of a demand; but he presented such a case as he believed and trusted would not fail to awaken the sympathies of this House, and effectually command its liberality. The persons in whose behalf he pleaded were the hardy sons of the soil; men who had entered the country when it lay in a state of native wildness; men who had broken the cane, and opened in the wilderness a home for their wives and children. The most of these enterprising and industrious settlers had once possessed other and better homes than they now enjoyed; they had entered on fertile lands, under titles which they believed to be good, and were successfully pushing their humble but independent fortune, when they were unexpectedly driven from their improvements by the appearance of a stranger, bringing a warrant of older date than theirs. Some of them had suffered this cruel disappointment more than once; they had been driven from improvement to improvement, and from home to home, till, in despair of ever realizing their early hopes, they had settled on lands that nobody would claim—on scraps and refuse fragments of the soil, which remained after all that was valuable had been first selected and occupied. The country where their humble homes were situated had been thrown open to warrant-holders for eight years; floods of warrants had been issued, and armies of their holders had overspread the soil, picking and culling out all the good land as long as any was to be found; and it was the fractions, the odds and ends, the refuse which remained, in shapeless fragments, between the boundary lines of other tracts, that they now asked of Congress. The land was of poor quality, and of little value in itself; but it was dear to them, because it held their home, and was their all. The country thus situated formed but a small portion of the State, embracing the Congressional district from which he came, and part of another from which came his colleague on his right, (Mr. POLK.) The great mass of it lay in his own district, and, in fact, made up the whole of that district.

The House would, therefore, perceive how he was situated, and would appreciate the obligations under which he lay to press this amendment. It was impossible that the grant of fractions of land thus situated could ever operate as a precedent for grants in those States where the public lands were regularly laid out in townships and sections, by lines at right angles. This country had never been laid out at all. The General Government had never had a surveyor within its boundaries. It was thrown open in a mass for the satisfaction of the North Carolina warrants; and every man who had a warrant hunted out the best land he could find; and, in fixing his boundary lines, had respect only to the quality of the soil, and the quantity he had a right to take; and thus the tracts located were of every conceivable shape. On the intervals between these lines, the people for whom he was pleading had fixed their little homes. They had mingled the sweat of their brows with the soil they occupied, and by the hand of hard and persevering toil had earned the little comforts they possessed. Was it fair for the General Government to take away these humble cottages from them, and make a donation of the whole to the Legislature of the State, for the purpose of raising up schools for the children of the rich? I ask the House, said Mr. O., if to do this will be an act of charity to the poor? It is asked by the State as charity: will it be so in practical effect? I ask some of it, but not for the State—not for the sons of the wealthy; but for the poor and industrious men who have given it all its value by their toil. Give it to them, and you will bind them to their Government by an indissoluble tie. Nothing makes a people love their Government like such acts of parental kindness. Sir, these people, though poor, are of inestimable value in a free republic. They are the bone and sinew of the land; they are its strength and its bulwark; they are its main reliance in the hour of danger, and the first to breast the onset of an enemy. Will you take away their little all and give it to the Legislature to speculate upon? Or will you make to each of these meritorious citizens the donation of his humble piece of land, where he has at last found a refuge from the pursuit of more successful warrant-holders? It is dear to him, however humble; his children were born upon it; and there he has lived in peace and contentment. I ask you to give it him, and I ask with the confident hope that you will do it. Sir, my people think that those who live northeast of the dividing line have already made enough out of them. My district has had to pay one hundred thousand dollars towards the erection of colleges in the northeast part of the State. I think this is quite enough, but still more is now demanded, and I find myself under the necessity of defending one poor district against all the rest of the State of Tennessee. I shall do it; for I am dependent upon them for my station here; and so long as I hold a seat upon this floor, I shall take their part against all who would exact upon them. Three hundred and five thousand acres of the best land in the district have already gone to satisfy warrants which I never believed to be just in principle. The compromise between the States of Tennessee and North Carolina required, indeed, the satisfying of these warrants, but they had been issued to revolutionary soldiers, who were dead, and had no heirs living, and I ever viewed the arrangement as unjust and oppressive. When the measure was debated in the Legislature of my State, I opposed it to the best of my poor ability, but we were overruled and had to submit. According to that arrangement, the colleges got sixty thousand acres of our land. The University of North Carolina got one hundred and forty thousand acres more of it. After a little while, the demand for ninety-six thousand acres more was made. They demanded that this amount should be provided for and secured: that I also opposed. I could not, in my conscience, consent to it, because I did not think it right in principle. The measure, however, went into effect; and in a little while the ninety-six thousand acres had swelled to one hundred and five thousand. Yes, one hundred and five thousand acres taken out of one little district! You can readily believe that such a draught as that, made in twenty-five acre warrants, cut us up at an awful rate. The grant for the support of colleges drained us of fifty-two thousand five hundred dollars in cash. Ay, sir, in hard cash, wrung from the hands of poor men, who live by the sweat of their brow. I repeat, that I was utterly opposed to this: not because I am the enemy of education, but because the benefits of education are not to be dispensed with an equal hand. This college system went into practice to draw a line of demarcation between the two classes of society—it separated the children of the rich from the children of the poor. The children of my people never saw the inside of a college in their lives, and never are likely to do so. Those who passed the act well knew that we never should derive any good from it: but they insisted that the land should be given up, and they sent State surveyors to survey it. The expenses of that survey pressed heavily on my constituents—it drove some of them to their wit's end. Sir, I have seen the last blanket of a poor, but honest and industrious family, sold under the hammer of the sheriff, to pay for that survey. Ay, sir, the little furniture they had saved from better days, or earned by long and honorable toil, was torn from them to pay the fees of those surveyors. Exactions like these were made on men whose whole worldly estate consisted of some twenty or thirty acres of the poorest land. Sir, it is for such men that I plead. I ask, in my place, as their advocate and Representative, that you will make them a donation of that little property. Let it be their own. While they bedew it with the sweat of their faces, let them at least have the consolation of knowing, that they may leave it to their own children, and not have it squandered on the sons of a stranger. Such fragments of miserable soil can be of no use or value to this Government. You will never insist on retaining it in your own hands. You will never sell it, for it will never bear the expense of surveying. You must do something with it. Will you not bestow it as a boon upon the unfortunate people who have nothing else in the world? There they are living in peace—they can there make shift to bring up their children. Some of them are widows, whose husbands fell while fighting your battles on the frontiers. None of them are rich, but they are an honest, industrious, hardy, persevering, kind-hearted people. I know them—I know their situation. I have shared the hospitality of their cottages, and been honored by their confidence with a seat in this assembly; and base and ungrateful, indeed, must I be, when I cease to remember it. No, sir, I cannot forget it: and if their little all is to be wrested from them, for the purposes of State speculation; if a swindling machine is to be set up to strip them of what little the surveyors, and the colleges, and the warrant-holders, have left them, it shall never be said that I sat by in silence, and refused, however humbly, to advocate their cause.

Mr. POLK rose, and said he did not differ so much from his colleague as he imagined. The Legislature of the State of Tennessee, in anticipation of the relinquishment which they expected to obtain from Congress, had already provided that, when the relinquishment should be obtained, the actual occupants should have a preference of entry. He was confident, therefore, if the relinquishment was made, that the constituents of his colleague would not be molested in their possessions by the Legislature, but would have a preference of entry. He had prepared an amendment, however, to the original bill, (which, when it should be in order, he would offer,) which provided, in substance, that the Legislature, in appropriating these lands, should, as they had already by their acts avowed their intention to do, give a preference of entry to the actual settlers. This, it occurred to him, would embrace all the objects his colleague asked. He would ask how the object of his colleague was to be effected by the amendment which he proposed? How could the United States patent these lands without first establishing a land office in the country and surveying them? We know the United States never had a land officer in the State; no Federal officer had ever surveyed them; and without first doing so, how could they ascertain what lands were vacant, and what were not? The lands that remained vacant were in detached parcels and scattered pieces, and were the refuse lands. All the lands that had ever been granted in the State had been granted by State authority, and by State officers—by State surveyors, by State registers, and by the Governor of the State. All the records in reference to these lands were in the archives of the State. The Government of the United States had none of them; they had no power or control over the State officers. Would not the amendment, therefore, be a nullity, unless Federal officers, over whom Congress had power and control, are appointed to carry it into effect? He said he was as friendly to these settlers as any one, but preferred leaving their interests to the State, who had never failed to provide for others similarly situated. He read the amendment which he proposed to offer, for the information of the House.

Mr. MALLARY said that, throughout the debate, it seemed to have been taken for granted, on all sides of the House, as a matter of course, that Congress must cede these lands to the State of Tennessee, in one form or other; but the gentlemen from that State seemed to be quarrelling among themselves about the mode of dividing the spoils. If the House is determined on making the donation, it ought at least to be done according to the principles of justice and equity, and in such a manner as to retain the distribution of the land under its own control. One of the gentlemen was desirous of having the application of the gift reserved to the State Legislature. Mr. M. said he had no reason to doubt that the State Government would do justice in the case; but he preferred doing justice with our own hands, wherever this was practicable. Why should the House refer to others what it could as well do itself? He had no objection that the poor and industrious settlers should receive the gift of their little tracts; he believed that no gentleman in the House had any objection to it; and if so, why not give it them at once? As to the balance which may remain, some gentlemen contended that it would amount to almost nothing; others thought it would be very large and valuable. For his own part, he was of opinion that it would be best to ascertain first what it would be, and whether all the warrants had been produced which were to be satisfied out of it; when this was determined, it would be time enough to make the donation to the State. One of the gentlemen had objected that the amendment requires of State officers to do duty under the authority of the General Government. But the amendment does not require this at all. It merely says to certain citizens of Tennessee, if you will get your surveyors to lay out this land, you shall have it as your own. If they shall apply to their surveyors, and find them so very sensitive on the point of honor that they will not move in the affair, although their fees are offered them, why, then, (said Mr. M.,) I, for one, would say, the United States surveyors shall lay it out for them. But I am strongly inclined to believe that no surveyor in Tennessee will refuse to act.

Mr. MINER rose to inquire what was the quantity of land on which the bill proposes to act? Was it one million of acres, or four millions, or ten millions? He also wished to know what amount would be given by the amendment to the settlers for whom the gentleman had been pleading. He also wished to know why the United States should cede the public lands in Tennessee, to that State, any more than the public lands in Ohio or Illinois to those States? Was not this bill an entering wedge to the plan of getting rid of the whole of the public domain? What special reason applied to Tennessee, which did not apply to the other States where we had lands?

Mr. CROCKETT replied to these inquiries, that the public land in Tennessee had never been laid out into sections and sold at the land office, as in the other new States. These poor people cannot go and enter a section or a quarter section of land, as in Ohio and Illinois. The United States never had a surveyor within the State; and if they had, it would cost more than ten thousand dollars to bring these shapeless remnants into market. The land had been thrown open in a mass to the warrant-holders, and they had ransacked, picked and culled it, till every thing valuable had been already located. This land, lying between, in odds and ends of every form, was differently situated from any land held elsewhere by the United States; and therefore, this amendment was no entering wedge, and could operate as no precedent in the matter.

Mr. BUCKNER said that, when this bill had been up at the last session, he had been opposed to it, and had submitted his reasons at some length. The bill had been laid upon the table; from which it was to be inferred that the House judged the bill, as it then stood, ought not to pass. Mr. B. said he had heard nothing since that time which operated to change his opinion. If the House must give land away, he certainly preferred the amendment now under consideration to the original bill. He thought, too, that there was a great difference between the two amendments; and many gentlemen might vote for the one, who could not vote for the other. For himself, he never had recognized the claims of Tennessee to these lands; but a donation to these poor settlers would not go to settle the question, nor operate to commit the Government. The first amendment (Mr. POLK's) had, indeed, been amended, by the insertion of the words "without charge;" but, situated as those words were, they left the sense very indefinite. Without charge for what? For entry? for the preference of location? for the fees? Or did it mean without charge by way of consideration money? He presumed the latter to be the sense; but the words did not clearly convey it. As to the difficulty with respect to surveyors, it was purely imaginary; the surveyors would be willing enough to labor for their fees. The amendment says the land is to be granted "without charge;" but who is to pass the law to carry this provision into effect? The Legislature of Tennessee. But the time, the prescribed manner in which the preference of entry is to be obtained, and all the subordinate legislation, is left to the Tennessee Legislature. He did not say that that Legislature would not do, in the matter, all that was just; but certain it was that the preference of entry might be so encumbered, as to render it, in effect, of but little value. He, therefore, preferred the other amendment, (Mr. CROCKETT's.)

Mr. WEEMS remarked to the House, that a small spark often kindled a great matter. He viewed this bill and amendment, as of serious importance. It was true, that this is poor land, which would bring the Government in debt to survey it; and, as the settlers are very desirous of obtaining a valid title, it may perhaps be given them without any dangerous consequences. But if gentlemen would cast their eyes at the new States of this Union, and at the claims which some of them have recently advanced to the possession of the entire public domain, they would, perhaps, recognize the wisdom of the old proverb, "Give an inch and take an ell." They first petitioned for a part; but now they begin to claim the whole as a right. As to the present amendment, he considered it as harmless in its character. The amount involved was not great; but if the House concluded to bestow it, let them do it with their own hands: for here another excellent proverb applied: "If you want your work done, send your servant; if you want it well done, do it yourself."

Mr. CULPEPER said he was in favor of the present amendment. He had in general been opposed to giving land to persons settling without title; but these persons were differently situated. They were not squatters, but persons who once had title, but had been crowded out by elder warrants; this formed a case which was deserving of relief, and he hoped that the amendment would prevail.

Mr. BELL was desirous, if the rules of order permitted it, of introducing an amendment, by way of substitute for that of Mr. CROCKETT, the object of which was to give all the remnant of the United States land in Tennessee to the Legislature; then to allow the actual settlers, previous to December last, a pre-emption right to the lands they had settled on, at the rate of thirty-seven and a half cents an acre; and then to devote the residue to the construction of a road from Memphis to the Cumberland road at Zanesville.

Mr. LEE, advertng to the importance of the subject, and the manner in which it had been complicated by the amendments, and apprehending that some might inadvertently give a vote which they would afterwards regret, with a view to give time for further consideration, moved an adjournment; which motion prevailed.

Drawback on Refined Sugar.

Mr. CAMERLUNG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the amendment of the Senate to the bill allowing an additional drawback on sugar refined in the United States, and exported therefrom, reported the same.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MINKER moved the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas the constitution has given to Congress within the District of Columbia, the power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever;"

And whereas it is alleged that the laws in respect to slavery in the District of Columbia have been almost entirely neglected;

From which neglect, for nearly thirty years, it is alleged there have grown numerous and gross corruptions;

That slave-dealers, gaining confidence from impunity, have made the seat of the Federal Government their head-quarters for carrying on the domestic slave trade;

That the public prisons have been extensively used (perverted from the purposes for which they were erected) for carrying on the domestic slave trade;

That officers of the Federal Government have been employed, and derived emolument from carrying on the domestic slave trade;

That private and secret prisons exist in the District for carrying on this traffic in human beings;

That the trade is not confined to those who are slaves for life, but persons having a limited time to serve, are bought, by the slave-dealers, and sent where redress is hopeless;

That others are kidnapped and carried away before they can be rescued;

That instances of death, from anguish and despair, exhibited in the District, mark the cruelty of this traffic;

That instances of maiming and suicide, executed or attempted, have been exhibited, growing out of this traffic within the District;

That free persons of color, coming into this District, are liable to arrest, imprisonment, and sale into slavery for life, for jail fees, if unable, from ignorance, misfortune, or fraud, to prove their freedom;

That advertisements, beginning "We will give cash for one hundred likely young negroes, of both sexes, from eight to twenty-five years old," contained in the public prints of the city, under the notice of Congress, indicate the openness and extent of the traffic;

That scenes of human beings exposed at public vendue are exhibited here, permitted by the laws of the General Government—a woman having been advertised "to be sold at Lloyd's tavern, near the Centre Market House," during the month of December;

And whereas a Grand Jury of the District has presented the slave trade as a grievance;

A writer in a public print in the District has set forth, "that, to those who never have seen a spectacle of the kind, (exhibited by the slave trade,) no description can give an adequate idea of its horrors;"

To such extent had this been carried in 1816, that a member of Congress from Virginia introduced a resolution in the House, "That a committee be appointed to examine into the existence of an inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves carried on in and through the District of Columbia, and report whether any, and what, measures are necessary for putting a stop to the same;"

The House of Representatives of Pennsylvania at their last session, by an almost unanimous vote expressed the opinion, that slavery, within the District of Columbia, ought to be abolished;

Numerous petitions from various parts of the Union have been presented to Congress, praying for the revision of the laws in respect to slavery, and the gradual abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia;

A petition was presented at the last session of Congress, signed by more than one thousand inhabitants of the District, praying for a gradual abolition of slavery therein :

And whereas the ten miles square, confided to the exclusive legislation of Congress, ought, for the honor of Republican Government, and interests of the District, to exhibit a specimen of pure and just laws :

Be it Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to take into consideration the laws within the District, in respect to slavery ; that they inquire into the truth of the foregoing allegations, and report the facts connected therewith, and that they also inquire into the slave trade as it exists in, and is carried on through, the District : and that they report to the House such amendments to the existing laws as shall seem to them to be just.

Resolved, That the committee be farther instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the gradual abolition of slavery within the District, in such manner that the interests of no individual shall be injured thereby.

Mr. WREMS, of Maryland, moved the question of consideration : on which question Mr. MINER demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

The House agreed to consider the resolutions—yeas 104, nays 70.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that the preamble to the resolutions be stricken out. He had no objection that the proposed inquiry be submitted to the Committee on the District. He was no advocate for the trade to which it alluded : but the preamble of the resolution assumed as true, certain facts of which he knew nothing, and of which he believed the House in general knew as little as he did.

Mr. CULPEPER hoped the motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE would prevail. He had voted for the consideration of the resolutions ; but he was not in favor of the preamble. The gentleman might know something of the facts stated, but for himself, being entirely ignorant of them, he could not vote for a preamble which pledged the House for their correctness.

Mr. WREMS hoped the gentleman would consent to the omission of the preamble. It was entirely on account of that, that he had moved for the question of consideration : for his own part he did not believe one word of what it contained.

Mr. MINER now commenced a course of statements in support of the resolutions and preamble, which were interrupted by the expiration of the hour allotted for reports and resolutions.

Occupancy of the Oregon River.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill for the occupation of the Oregon—the following amendment which had been proposed by Mr. DRAYTON, being under consideration :

Strike out all after the enacting words, except the last section, and, in lieu thereof, insert :

“That the President of the United States be hereby authorized to erect a fort, or forts, in that part of the Northwest Coast of America which is situated west of the eastern base of the Stony Mountains, between forty-two and fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude, and to garrison them with a competent number of the United States troops, not exceeding four hundred.

“Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the aforesaid territory to be explored by such officers of the corps of engineers as he shall select, and that he may delay sending thereto any of the troops of the United States until after such exploration shall have been made.”

Mr. TAYLOR had moved to amend the said amendment, by striking out all after “President of the United States,” in the first section, and substituting the following :

“Cause an exploring expedition to be organized and executed, to consist of not more than eighty persons, including a corps of geographers and topographers, for the purpose of collecting information in regard to the climate, soil, natural productions, civil and political condition, harbors, and inhabitants, of the territory of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains.”

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, before the committee decided upon either of the propositions, it was important to have all the information that could be obtained. From a long and intimate acquaintance with the gentleman so frequently referred to, (Mr. Astor,) he had been made acquainted with many facts connected with the commercial and political history of the country beyond the Rocky Mountains. He was decidedly opposed to all plans of colonizing, to all grants of land, or the establishment of a territorial government. He was, however, of opinion that though it was a perplexing question, it was absolutely necessary that something should be done, and that promptly. The plan of sending out a topographical and geographical corps was not the measure required by the nature of the case, or demanded at this crisis. Although not concurring entirely with the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DRAYTON,) he was substantially in favor of it. He thought a military post best designed to secure the objects we had now in view, which were to protect our Indian traders ; gradually, through their agency, to regain possession of that country by pacific means and to prevent disputes between the traders in that region, which might lead to war with Great Britain. We have (said Mr. C.) acquired a title to that country, by the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida : our claim, at least to the boundary established by the Treaty of Utrecht, the 49th degree, he thought could not be questioned, and that was far north of the mouth of the Columbia River. Antecedent to the war, we held undisturbed and undisputed possession of that country. In 1810, one of our citizens, a merchant of enlarged mind and daring enterprise, projected a settlement on the Columbia. He sent the Tonquin, of 20 guns, with apprentices, mechanics, traders, &c.; and at the same time despatched an expedition overland. Both arrived in safety and founded Port Astoria. The company commenced and continued to enlarge its trade with the Indians; posts were established almost to the mountains, and a line was contemplated entirely across the continent. Mr. A. had engaged to furnish $400,000, and had made considerable progress in this bold, and, as it would have been, profitable enterprise, when the war of 1812 broke out. The Northwest Company, his great rival in the fur trade, as it was supposed, intimated to the British Government the propriety of sending out a vessel of war to capture Fort Astoria. They at the same time sent an agent overland to alarm the agent of Mr. Astor, and to induce him to dispose of the settlement and the furs collected. Unfortunately, the principal agent was absent, and the sub-agent sold an establishment, which was then worth two hundred thousand dollars, to the Northwest Company, for about forty thousand dollars. Thus was Mr. Astor, by an artifice, defeated in one of the greatest enterprises ever undertaken by any one individual. Our commissioners at Ghent were apprehensive of the fate of Port Astoria, and expressly provided for the restoration of "all territories, places, or possessions." In 1817, our Government despatched the Ontario to take possession of it. In 1818, Lord Castlereagh complained of this to Mr. Rush—not that he disputed our right—but that notice had not been given to the British Government, who would have given orders for its restoration, without which collisions might arise. He had, to prevent such disputes, requested Earl Bathurst and the commissioners of the admiralty to give orders to restore Fort Astoria, according to the Treaty of Ghent; his Lordship, at the same time, intimating that Great Britain had a claim to that country; but "admitting, in the most ample extent, our right to be reinstated, and to be the party in possession, while treating of the title." The Blossom was accordingly despatched from Lima, with the agents of the two Governments: and Fort Astoria (called by the Northwest Company Fort George) was formally restored to the United States.

As new pretensions are growing up, he would read this important document to the committee, viz:

"ACT OF SURRENDER AND ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

"In obedience to the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, signed in a despatch from the Right Honorable Earl Bathurst, addressed to the partners or agents of the Northwest Company, bearing date the 27th January, 1818, and in obedience to subsequent orders, dated the 26th July last, from Wm. A. Sheriff, Esq., Captain of his Majesty's ship Andromache, we, the undersigned, do, in conformity to the first articles of the treaty of Ghent, restore to the Government of the United States, through its agent, J. "Agent for the United Company."

Our agent in announcing this surrender, says, that the flag of Great Britain was lowered, and that of the United States hoisted on Fort George, "where it now waves in token both of possession and of sovereignty." He also adds, that the Northwest Company "will continue to occupy and protect it under our flag, until it shall please the President to give orders for their removal." Under what pretext then can Great Britain dispute our right to the possession of that country?

In the same month, (continued Mr. C.,) in a distant part of the world, a commercial treaty was negotiated between the United States and Great Britain. The British commissioners, appreciating the value of this trade, the advantages of the harbor at the mouth of the Columbia, and wisely foreseeing that this mixed question of boundary, Indian trade, and territorial dominion, would become one of magnitude between the two countries, urged it upon our commissioners. The latter seemed to view it with comparative indifference. Considering it unimportant, they admitted the third article in the treaty of 1818, leaving the boundaries, rights, and claims of the two countries as they were, and merely agreeing to a reciprocity in the Indian trade. This was an unfortunate concession to Great Britain; it was only a nominal reciprocity, and has operated as an actual surrender of that whole country to her traders. And however small this concession may have been, in the estimation of our commissioners, it may turn out hereafter to be large enough for the foundation of a future war with Great Britain. The Northwest Company ought to have been allowed sufficient time to close its concerns. A joint trade should never have been permitted with the Indians. That company were then in possession of the trade—whoever has that, must have the Indians; and whoever has them will have the country. Under that provision they have spread their trade into the interior. The two companies were united in 1821, and the Hudson's Bay Company was chartered for twenty years. Under the advantages of transferring their affairs from Hudson's Bay to Columbia River, the shares of that company have risen from sixty to two hundred and forty pounds sterling. Their returns have been annually increasing at the rate of from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars in each year, and the entire returns for the year 1828, estimated by one familiar with the value of furs, is about eight hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars. Under the operation of this unfortunate concession, another East India Company is growing upon our frontiers, spreading through a country to which our right of possession, at least, is undisputed, and reaching not only through our dominions, but extending from the polar regions to California.

Thus have we been actually dispossessed of the country beyond the Rocky Mountains. In what way can we regain it, without violating our obligations, and disturbing the harmony between the two countries? We must either discontinue our treaty according to its contingent provision, and take measures for removing the Hudson's Bay Company, or establish Government trading houses, on Mr. Jefferson's plan, or adopt the measure proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. The first would be unfriendly and expensive, and could be only gradually effected. We know, by experience, that the second would be more expensive than the last. There seems to be no practicable alternative but the establishment of a military post for the protection of your traders. Establish that, and they will fearlessly push their expeditions to the mouth of the Columbia. A depot would soon be formed there, under the protection of your post; an annual ship would visit that settlement to take out supplies, and carry the furs and peltries to Canton. Your traders would gradually exclude those of the Hudson Bay Company, for no nation can contend with us in equal competition; and you would, in time, peaceably regain the possession of that country. Our treaty can be in no manner violated by the establishment of such a post. That region is now free and open to the traders of both nations; but that is all we have conceded. We have given Great Britain no right to establish forts, and place garrisons in that country; nor have we surrendered to her our right to establish military posts in any region to which she admits our right to be the "party in possession while treating of the title." She may claim that country; so may Russia, France, Spain; but would either of them dispute our right to be the party in possession, and our sovereign right to fortify our possessions? Our purpose in establishing a military post is in strict accordance with the object of our treaty—the "only object" of that provision being, as it declares, "to prevent disputes and differences between the high contracting parties." These have already begun; some of our traders have been cut off, where, or by whom, is unknown, but it is not difficult to conjecture by whose agency. Plant your military post in the neighborhood of Fort George, you will hear no more of our traders being cut off in the interior; you will protect the traders of both countries, and prevent collisions between them. Great Britain certainly cannot object to a measure of precaution and humanity, while we do not go beyond that region to which she has solemnly conceded our right of possession.

Mr. EVERETT said he should deem it an unfortunate result of this debate, if an impression should be produced by it, and go abroad among the people of the United States, that the territory in question was of little consideration, in the judgment of the House. If, in consequence of misinformation, or want of information, such a result should be produced, the question on the territory would stand worse than if it had never been agitated. It was for this reason that he was induced to trouble the committee for a few moments. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) had yesterday put into his hands a work, which he had never before seen, written by an individual who certainly possessed ample means of information, and who, like the correspondent of the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) was one of the first company sent out by Mr. Astor to the mouth of the Columbia. The work in question appeared to be substantially the journal kept by him, from the time of his sailing from New York, in September, 1810, till his return home, after the dissolution of Mr. Astor's establishment. The work is the production of a Canadian Frenchman, and though without pretensions to literary merit, is probably the amplest account which has been published of Mr. Astor's establishment, and furnishes considerable information with respect to the country on the Columbia River. It was not Mr. E.'s design to go over the ground in detail, but, in casting his eye through the volume, he had noticed a few statements which he thought would be acceptable to the committee.

One of the most important considerations, in regard to this region, is that which concerns the harbor at the mouth of the Columbia River, and the entrance into it. Our navigation, and whale fishery, on the Pacific Ocean, are vastly important to the country; and, as he had stated, on a former occasion, unless we have a retreat into the Columbia River, or the other harbors in this territory, there is not, on all the coast of the Pacific, a port to which we could have recourse in time of war. The property, which, in the event of a war, would, on the Pacific Ocean, be at the mercy of the strongest naval power, would exceed by ten times the expense of fortifying the mouth of the Columbia River. Now, it had been represented, in this debate, that the harbor within the mouth of the Columbia River was nearly inaccessible, and that, particularly in the six winter months, it was, in consequence of the monsoons, entirely so. Mr. E. believed this to be quite an erroneous statement. The entrance to the harbor was undoubtedly one of considerable difficulty, which arose from the heavy surf on the bar, and this difficulty was of course greater in some states of the wind, than in others. But he was, he believed, warranted in saying, that the winds were variable in this region; and that the Columbia River might be entered at all seasons of the year. So far from being inaccessible in Winter, the vessel which carried out Mr. Astor's first company, the unfortunate ship Tonquin, (of whose fate a very interesting account is contained in the work just mentioned,) entered the mouth of Columbia, with considerable difficulty, it must be admitted, on the 25th of March; Capt. Gray, in the Columbia, entered it, I believe, on the 11th or 12th of May; the Beaver arrived on the 9th May, 1811; the Albatross on the 4th August, 1812; the Raccoon a British ship of war of twenty-six guns, on the 30th of November; the Pedlar, on the 28th of February. There does not appear any thing extraordinary or peculiar in the cases of the foregoing vessels, which seems accordingly to show that the river is accessible at all seasons of the year. It is to be borne in mind, that there is as yet nothing, or next to nothing, to facilitate the entrance. The mouth of the Columbia has not yet found its way into our coast pilots. Valuable soundings have been made; but even these, not to the extent to which they are generally made in the waters of countries long settled. There are no light houses, no buoys, no landmarks well ascertained, and no pilots. A strange vessel approaching almost any harbor, that of Boston, for instance, with imperfect charts, without a description of the channel, and without a pilot, might carry away the impression, that it was a very difficult harbor to make. What would the navigation of the Mersey, and the entrance to the port of Liverpool (the greatest centre of navigation) be, without any of the facilities alluded to? On this subject, I cannot but refer the committee to the statements made, and the authorities collected, by Mr. Baylies, of Massachusetts, in his report from a Select Committee on this subject, at the commencement of the first session of the nineteenth Congress. Whatever the difficulty might be, it was well remarked by Mr. Baylies, that it would turn to the advantage of the United States. Possessing the superiority of the local knowledge of the harbor, our small trading ships would find in it a secure retreat from foreign vessels of war, less acquainted with the entrance and less able to cross the bar. It will also be recollected, that all the objections made apply to the mouth of the Columbia River, and that Port Discovery, a degree or two further to the north and equally within our rightful limits, is universally admitted to be one of the best ports in the world. And even the mouth of the Columbia River, with all the difficulties and hazards of its entrance, is the regular inlet of the supplies, and outlet of the peltries of the region drained by the Columbia and its northern branches. The trade is as regular as any in the world. Neither is the climate as ungenial and dreary as it has been represented, or as gentlemen might infer from the high northern latitude. There is, on the contrary, no doubt that it is from six to ten degrees milder than the climate of the same parallel of latitude on the eastern coast of the continent. It is a fact, almost too familiar to be repeated, that, other things being equal, such is always the case on the western side of a continent, compared with the eastern. The island of Great Britain, for instance, portions of which enjoy an exceedingly mild climate, are comprehended within the same parallel as Labrador, one of the most inhospitable regions of the globe. The mouth of the Columbia River is very nearly in the latitude of the southern portion of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and while, from these latter waters, proceed the enormous mountains of ice so dangerous to the navigation of the Atlantic coast, when they have been carried down to a lower latitude, the thermometer, it is said, rarely descends below the freezing point, at the mouth of the Columbia. The writer to whom I have alluded above, makes the following remark:

"From the time of our arrival on the Columbia River, we had expected that the winter would be about as rigorous as that to which we had been accustomed in the same latitude. But we were soon undeceived. The mildness of the climate did not allow us to bring fresh meat from Wolamat to Astoria."

On a subsequent page it is observed:

"During three years that I passed at the Columbia River, the cold scarce ever went below the freezing point, and I do not think the heat ever rose above seventy-five or seventy-six degrees."

When we recollect that, in the same latitudes, on the eastern side of the continent, a long and intensely cold winter is followed by a short summer, during a part of which the thermometer sometimes rises above the one-hundredth degree, we must admit that, in this respect, the region in question is favorably circumstanced. The rainy season, instead of lasting six months, as I think it has been said in this debate to do, is said by this author to prevail from the beginning of October to the end of December.

In regard to the fertility of the soil, a considerable diversity of statement seems to exist. The gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES), on the strength of respectable authorities, had represented it as a region of almost unexampled sterility. Gentlemen who will turn to the reports of the Select Committee, in 1826, will there find representations, seemingly authentic, of an opposite character. The truth, no doubt, as to the general character of the country, will be found in a medium between the two accounts, and either account is probably correct, in reference to particular parts of these regions—the summits of mountains, the precipitous banks of rivers, and meadows overflowed by the tide, and of course unfit for cultivation. On the contrary, we have the best information that extensive valleys and tracts of level land, and some of the islands in the Columbia River, are well wooded, or otherwise evidently fertile. The writer whom I have already quoted, mentions some facts, from which we are authorized to infer that there is, in portions, at least, of the country, a soil which, under such a climate as we know to exist there, must be abundantly adequate to the purposes of husbandry. Thus, he says:

"The surface of the soil in the valleys consists of a stratum of five or six inches of dark vegetable earth, resting on another of gray earth, extremely cold."

This, certainly, will not compare with those regions of the United States which possess a vegetable soil of several feet in depth; but in New England, I believe, the farmers would very generally compound for six inches of vegetable soil, let the sub-soil be what it would. It is true, as was stated by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) and as is also stated in the work of Franchere, that Mr. Astor's party were not very successful in their agricultural attempts. Of the vegetables and seeds which they planted, nothing came to maturity but radishes, turnips, and potatoes. The turnips were of prodigious size: one of them was found to weigh over fifteen pounds. From the failure of their garden, Mr. Franchere draws the inference that the soil along the banks of the Columbia was not adapted to the purposes of husbandry. It would seem more natural, however, to ascribe this failure to a want of agricultural skill in the party; to their occupation in other pursuits; or to their having chosen a garden spot ill-adapted to that object. At all events, in a mild climate, it is not possible that a soil, covered with various kinds of forest trees which we know to exist in this region, should not also admit most of the other vegetable products of the temperate zone.

The general aspect of the country on the banks of the river is unquestionably that of fertility and beauty. Mr. Astor's party on arriving in the month of March, found the season forward. Speaking under date of the 12th April, Mr. Franchere says:

"The Spring, ordinarily late in so high a latitude, was already far advanced. The leaves had begun to appear; the earth was covered with verdure; the weather was superb, and all nature was smiling."

No doubt, as this author presently states, the long confinement of the party, in a wintry voyage around Cape Horn, made every thing appear doubly beautiful. They were last, however, from the Sandwich Islands. In describing an excursion subsequently made into the interior, he uses this language:

"Our guide made us enter a little river, on the bank of which we found a suitable place to encamp, under the oaks, and amidst flowers. Ascending the river the next day, we found a village, the most beautifully situated in the world, in a verdant plain, covered with every species of flowers, and enclosed by superb groves of oak. The freshness and beauty of this spot, which nature seemed to have adorned and enriched with her best gifts, contrasted in the most striking manner with the poverty and filth of its inhabitants, and I regretted that it had not fallen to the lot of civilized men."

I have gone into these references and citations, because no printed source of information seems more authentic than that from which they are taken; and because it seems to prove that, though the region watered by the main stream, the Columbia, is probably not one of extraordinary agricultural promise, it must be very far removed from that general state of desolation and sterility in which it has been described.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said that, many pointed allusions having been made, during the debate, to the observations which he had made on a former day, he should once more trouble the House for the purpose of offering a few words in explanation. It was entirely unnecessary to enlarge on the importance of the subject, for he would tell them to look at the map, and they would see that the bill proposed an extent of country almost as large as the whole of the old thirteen States; and comprised of regions, many parts of which, if inhabited at all, were inhabited by savages. Much has been said of the frequent recurrence of murders by the Indians; but he must say, that, though no man could deplore these melancholy events more than he did, (and he had cause to deplore them, many persons with whom he had been acquainted having at various times been massacred by them,) yet, nevertheless, he saw nothing to be surprised at in the circumstance. Many citizens had been recently killed by the Pawnee Indians, on the road between the Santa Fe and Missouri, close upon the frontiers of that State; why then feel amazement that such atrocities were perpetrated at a distance far removed from the reach of the arm of justice? And how could that House obviate the possibility of future occurrences of that description? What moral effect could their legislation upon the subject be attended with? Could it extend a salutary control over the unshackled minds and unshackled bodies of those wild barbarians? Certainly not.

There was another circumstance which deserved their grave and serious reflection, before they could arrive at the necessity of the bill. Most of those lamented events had been produced by the agency of causes which operated equally over all human nature—robbery was the motive. The irresistible temptation offered to those rude children of the forest to possess themselves of the property of the traders, was the motive of the destruction of many of the whites who perished in those regions. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) had alluded to the circumstances attending the loss of men attached to Gen. Ashley's party. That gentleman was a personal friend of his, and he was well acquainted with all the circumstances. Two of his men, who commanded small parties of fifteen or twenty individuals, were surprised by the Indians, and with the exception of one hunter, who was engaged at a distance in preparing breakfast for his companions, all massacred. The inducement to this horrid slaughter was the valuable cargo of furs, to the amount, he understood, of more than twenty thousand dollars, with which they were then returning from the country beyond the Rocky Mountains. It was an incontestable fact which, it would be seen, bore strongly on the question before the House, that more property was lost, and more lives were sacrificed, in one year, in the city of London, or even in the city of Paris, (the latter of which great cities bore no proportion to the former in the enormity and number of its crimes,)—it was, he said, demonstrable, that robbery and assassination were more frequent and prevalent in those two great capitals of the most powerful nations of Europe, England and France, (the latter of which, in particular, had always been celebrated for the unequalled vigilance of its police,) than in the wildest and most desolate regions of the North American part of the continent. Then why (he asked) should it be adduced as an argument in favor of that bill, that the measures proposed by it would, in the event of its being carried into execution, put a final termination to the excesses of those miserable and benighted savages? Mr. B. then referred to the statement of the individual from Montreal, and of Mr. Wilson P. Hunt. They might be true, said he, to a certain extent—but they were, if taken on the whole, delusions—not intentional or wilful delusions, he firmly believed. He, himself, might suppose, or even go near to admit the fact, that the valleys were beautiful in appearance; clothed with verdure; smiling with the earliest productions of Spring; perhaps, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had observed in his quotations, enlivened with the brightest of flowers, and irrigated by the most crystal of waters. But what was to be founded upon such bases? The bounty of nature in those regions was perfectly illusory. The excellences of soil and climate which he had feebly attempted to describe, and which certainly were confined to the raising of esculent roots, were limited in their extent, transitory in their nature, and brief indeed in their duration. Those valleys, of which so much had been said, were annually inundated—in the month of June they were invariably, as he had before stated, submerged in deep water, arising from the melting of the snow. The House should not confound that question with matters of commerce, with which it had no necessary connection, and thereby give a factitious importance to a subject in his opinion altogether worthless. After some further observations, Mr. B. said he cordially concurred in the propriety of diminishing the British influence over the Indians, with whom the citizens of the United States were continually in contact. But how was that to be done? Why, let them put an end to the intercourse carried on between the British and the Indians across the Canadian frontiers, and then that House and the country would hear no more of murders perpetrated by savages, armed with British rifles of recent manufacture—with rifles bearing on their locks the stamp of 1824. To return to the question before them. Let the House take the pains to collect the necessary information, before fixing upon a permanent basis their relations with a people comparatively unknown, and certainly wild, uncivilized and barbarous. Let them not establish a precedent, which, in after times, might be followed, to the destruction of the republic. In the course of those convulsions and revolutions to which, it appeared probable, their neighbors on the southern part of the continent would have to pass through, the ambition of the United States—if they might learn from the experience of past ages, even republics were ambitious—would, it was within the compass of human probability, lead them to look to a farther and wider extension of their power. Was there no such place as the island of Cuba—an island lying off the Gulf of Mexico, commanding the debouché of the Mississippi, and being, therefore, the key of the whole trade of the West? Were there not such fair domains to grasp at, as some desirable parts of Mexico and Columbia? He begged the House to reflect upon such things; to take into their most discreet and grave consideration the importance of that question, and the momentous consequences which might result upon it; and then to say collectively to the nation, and individually to their constituents, whether the passage of that bill would conduce to the interests of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR said he had no desire to undervalue the territory in question, although the most authentic accounts concerning it, which he had been able to examine, induced him to believe it widely different from the "terrestrial paradise," which it had been represented by the writer introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) The information communicated to this committee by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BATES,) was derived from sources of great respectability. It was sufficient, at least, to teach us caution; to send explorers before we take military possession of the country by the erection of forts. But, admitting it to be a good country, capable of rewarding the industry and enterprise of our traders, does it follow that we ought to erect forts and garrison them with troops? What is our actual situation in regard to this territory? The treaty of 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, failed to define the limits between the two Governments. Both claimed title to it, and to prevent disputes, it was agreed that it should remain free and open to the citizens and subjects of the respective powers for ten years. That provision has recently been renewed for an indefinite time, reserving to each Government a right to terminate it by giving twelve months' notice. Until such time, neither party is entitled to exclusive possession. Now, I ask, what possession can be more exclusive than that which consists in building forts with our national treasure, and garrisoning them with our national troops? I view this matter (said Mr. T.) very different from the defences erected by traders, to protect them in their business of trapping and hunting, against the violence of savages or rivals. Whatever may be the relative rights to this country, of the United States and Great Britain, so far as present possession is concerned, we have agreed to be tenants in common. No act can be rightfully done by one party, which may not with equal propriety be done by the other. If we may erect a fort on the Columbia River, Great Britain may do the same. The words of the treaty apply to every part of the territory. I pray your attention to the phraseology:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party, on the Northwest Coast of America, westward of the Stony Mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open to the vessels, citizens, and subjects, of the two powers, it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country, nor shall it be taken to affect the claim of any other power or state to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

Do gentlemen agree that Great Britain has a right to build a national fortress on the south side of the Columbia, and to garrison it with British troops? No, they do not. They protest against it. They talk of national honor, and defending our title to the last extremity. But they seem to forget that the question of title is in abeyance, if I may so speak, and must remain so while the treaty is in force regulating the possession. I compare this territory to a waste or open common, lying between two manors. The proprietors of each claim title to the whole; they attempt to agree on a division; various propositions are made and rejected; and finally it is agreed to occupy jointly, for the present, reserving a right to each, whenever he shall think proper, on reasonable notice, to dissolve the joint possession, and enforce his separate title in his own way. If during the continuance of this agreement, either party should enclose a portion of the common for his separate use, or strengthen himself in its possession, so that he could hold out against right, if the title should be adjudged in the other, in my opinion he would be a violator of the compact. In this, in our thrifless haste to colonize this ultima Thule of business, I think we are beginning at the wrong end of America—nay, not of America—but of the habitable earth; we seem to overlook the natural order of things. If the treaty is found to be injurious to the United States, nothing is easier than to get rid of it. A short notice to the British Government will enable us to take our own course in this matter, free, at least, from the imputation of bad faith. Suppose, however, the treaty to be set aside, and, confident in our title to the country, we determined to erect forts for the purpose of defending our citizens against aggression; what protection could a fort at the mouth of the Columbia afford to traders and trappers, four or five hundred miles distant, in a rugged and almost unpassable wilderness? Surely none, either against a savage or a British rival. Avarice and revenge, as heretofore, would continue to perpetrate deeds of blood, and find impunity in the deep recesses of the forest. Is it wonderful that murders are committed in the Indian country? Who does not know with what deadly hate the tread of a white hunter is heard by the Indian watching his traps? The deer and the buffalo fade away before the march of civilization, and the hungry savage, turning his back on the bones of his fathers, vexed by the ploughshare of his abhorrence, directs his indignant steps towards the setting sun.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied to his colleague, who inquired how a military post at the mouth of the Columbia could protect our traders hundreds of miles in the interior; how were they cut off? that it was by the secret agency of the Hudson Bay Company. Establish your posts in the neighborhood of Fort George, and our traders will not be missing. They will go in perfect security, from the mountains to that post, whenever the Hudson Bay Company know that there is a power at hand to protect them against the authors of such atrocities. Too much had been conceded to Great Britain in the debate; even more than she herself pretended to claim. The country, it was true, was, by the treaty, "free and open" to the traders of both nations; but the rights and claims of both parties were not changed in any manner whatever; our right to possession, which carried with it the right to establish military posts to prevent massacres in that region; and her mere claim, which gave to Great Britain no right whatever to establish a garrison, or place a cannon, within the boundaries of that country, the possession of which she had formerly conceded to the United States

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, to strike out the preamble to the resolution offered by Mr. MINER, on the subject of slavery within the District of Columbia—

Mr. MINER continued his remarks, cut short yesterday. Mr. M., in commencing his speech, observed that, as doubts had been expressed of the correctness of the allegations set forth in the preamble, it became his duty to the House to show that they were well founded. His purpose in presenting the matter in this form was, to arrest the attention of the House, by concentrating, in the narrowest compass in his power, some general principles and striking facts, bearing upon the subject. In the first place, (said Mr. M.) I have set forth the constitutional power of Congress over this District. On this point, I suppose there can be no difference of opinion. In article 1, section 8, of the constitution, it is declared that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States." The words are full, clear, and explicit. The power extends to "legislation in all cases whatsoever." We, therefore, are the local as well as general Legislature here. Maryland has no longer any authority; Virginia has no longer any legislative power within the District. If evils exist, we alone can remedy them. If injustice and oppression prevail, we are alone responsible.

And here (said Mr. M.) I would most earnestly impress upon the House, that those who suffer evils which they alone have the power to prevent, are accountable for these evils. The legislature that permits bad laws to remain in force, is not less responsible, before God and the world, for the injustice that results from them, than the legislature that enacts unjust laws, or the Government that perpetrates injustice. I am aware, sir, that the subject of slavery is one of great delicacy, exciting strong feelings whenever it is mentioned; but it exists here, and exercises a large influence in the District; yet, since the Federal Government was established in this place, it has been almost wholly neglected. Maryland, in the liberal spirit of the age, has softened the harsher features of her laws in respect to this class of persons. But the ameliorating influence in her statutes extends not within the limits she has ceded to us. The code of Virginia, I believe, has undergone salutary modifications. Our legislation has left the subject where we found it nearly thirty years ago. Gentlemen from the South did not feel it to be their duty to move in the matter; gentlemen from the north, seeing it created so much excitement whenever mentioned, have passed it by. In consequence of this neglect, as I shall show you, have grown numerous corruptions, leading to cruelty and injustice that ought no longer to be tolerated.

And here permit me to remark, sir, that the extreme sensitiveness supposed to exist whenever slavery is mentioned, ought not, in my judgment, to prevail. It is a great political interest in the country, which the prescient eye of the statesman cannot fail intensely to regard. Confining myself to this District, slavery exists here, and while it exists, must be regulated. Sooner or later it must become the subject of our legislation. Now, to my mind, there is nothing more clear than this, that every subject having a broad political bearing, or which it is our duty to regulate by legislation, ought in these halls, consecrated to the freedom of debate, to be spoken of by members freely, familiarly, and without even the apprehension of giving pain or offence. Certainly this, like every other matter, should be discussed in a suitable temper, and with a proper deference for the opinions, and delicacy for the feelings, of those who entertain different sentiments. As it regards slavery and the slave trade, as they prevail within this District, having examined the subject with care, having visited your prisons and other scenes of wretchedness, as one of the local legislature, I have felt it my duty to bring the subject to your notice, in a manner best calculated to awaken your attention to the evils that exist.

Among the allegations in the preamble, are these: That slave-dealers, gaining confidence from impunity, have made the seat of the Federal Government their head-quarters for carrying on the domestic slave trade; that the public prisons have been extensively used for carrying on the domestic slave trade; and that officers of the Federal Government have been employed, and derived emoluments, from carrying on this traffic. By papers furnished me by the keeper, it appears that there were sent to prison for safe-keeping, that is, as well understood, for sale, and imprisoned as runaways:

	Safe keeping.	Taken up as runaways.
In 1824, -	81	52
1825, -	124	58
1826 and 1827, 156	-	101
1828, -	91	79
	452	290

Debtors, and persons charged with criminal offences, of course are not included in this statement. So that it would appear that, in the last five years, more than four hundred and fifty persons had been confined in the public prison of the city—a prison under the control of Congress, and regulated by its laws—for sale, in the process of the slave trade. Such (said Mr. M.) is not the intention for which the prison was erected. Pennsylvania, so far as she is concerned, and her means are appropriated to repair and keep up the prison, I am confident in saying, does not, and never has, intended that it should be used for this purpose. On a former occasion, duty led me to make some statements respecting this matter, before the House, which it may be proper to bring to mind. Visiting the prison in 1826, and passing through the avenues that lead to the cells, I was struck with the appearance of a woman having three or four children with her, one at the breast. She presented such an aspect of woe that I could not help inquiring her story. It was simply this: She was a slave, but had married a man who was free. By him she had eight or nine children. Moved by natural affection, the father labored to support the children, but, as they attained an age to be chil-ble in market, perhaps ten or twelve, the master sold them. One after another was taken away and sold to the slave-dealers. She had now come to an age to be no longer profitable as a breeder, and her master had separated her from her husband and all the associations of life, and sent her and her children to your prison for sale. She was waiting for a purchaser, and seemed to me to be more heart-broken than any creature I had ever seen. I am free to say, sir, and I would appeal to every gentleman who hears me, to say, if it is proper that the public prisons under our jurisdiction should be used to carry on a traffic which exhibits scenes like this. Of the four hundred and fifty others I know nothing. I see no reason to suppose that there were not many cases of equal cruelty. Of the two hundred and ninety committed as runaways, many were delivered to their masters; some were sold for want of proof that they were free; and some proved their freedom, and were discharged. It seems to me a hardship, that persons born free in New York, Pennsylvania, or elsewhere, who perhaps never thought of a certificate of freedom, should, without any charge of crime, if they come within this District, be thrown into prison. Some proof, at least, ought to be made, raising a presumption that they are runaway slaves, before they should be deprived of personal liberty. A free man, poor, friendless, and ignorant, so arrested and confined in a cell of little more than ten feet square, would have but slight chance of asserting his rights. Five that were committed in 1826-'7, without any proof of their being slaves, were sold for their jail fees and other expenses. I could wish, sir, we knew what they sold for, and what became of the money. It will be seen, on a moment's reflection, how strong the motive, on the part of the slave-traders, and those who find it their interest to aid them, to seize upon persons who come into the District, to confine them closely in prison, to intercept their letters, to permit them to be sold, and to buy them in. The system naturally leads to fraud and injustice; in some instances to great cruelty. In August, 1821, a black man was taken up and imprisoned as a runaway. He was kept confined until October, 1822—four hundred and five days. In this time, vermin, disease, and misery, had deprived him of the use of his limbs. He was rendered a cripple for life, and discharged, as no one would buy him. Turned out upon the world as a miserable pauper, disabled by our means from gaining subsistence, he is sometimes supported from the poor house; sometimes craves alms in your streets. I cannot think that these things ought to be so. They appear to me as incompatible with our duty, and the interests of the District, as they are contrary to the principles of justice and the rights of humanity. For their services, it cannot be supposed that the Marshal, and his deputies, the keepers of the prisons, go unrewarded. They are, I take it, fedral officers, deriving their powers from the Federal Government. What is the amount of their fees and their perquisites, I have no means of knowing. Suppose fees and commissions on each person, of twenty dollars—that would, on  $452 \times 20 = 9,040$ —upwards of nine thousand dollars in five years. Half that sum would be something considerable. Double this amount, if the prison at Alexandria should yield as much more, would be a large sum. The same amount on the persons imprisoned as runaways would make a large addition to their receipts. If a free man is sold for jail fees, if those fees amount to fifty dollars, and he sells for three hundred, does the Marshal retain the balance of three hundred, or does it go into the public treasury? I see no such item in the account of receipts. I mean not, by any remarks I make, to impeach or cast a reflection upon the Marshal, or any officer under him. The Marshal I have not the pleasure to know, and have no intention to censure. The system is, I presume, as he found it. The system is ours; we are responsible; and if there is blame, it rests mainly at our doors. Of the keeper of the prison, I am bound to say that his deportment has been uniformly correct, so far as it has come to my knowledge. While he is faithful, he is yet humane. Since my remarks on a former occasion, the prison and its discipline appear to be much improved, and the miseries of the wretched inmates alleviated.

I have another case of hardship (said Mr. M.) to bring to your notice—a man was taken up as a runaway, and advertised for sale. He protested that he was a free man. No proof to the contrary appeared. As the time of sale approached, a good deal of interest was excited for him, and two respectable citizens interposed in his behalf. They asked the delay of a short time, that the rights of the man might be ascertained. They went so far as to offer security for the payment of the fees, if the sale could be delayed. But I will read the evidence of what I state:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, }
Washington County, } ss.

Appear before me, a Justice of the Peace in and for this county, Ezekiel Young and Josiah Bosworth, two respectable witnesses, and make oath, in due form of law, that, in the last summer, they were at the jail of the county of Washington, in the said District, in behalf of a black man called James Green, who stated that he was free, and could prove his freedom, and had written on for the purpose: That they did importune with the Deputy Marshal of this District to postpone the sale, and offered security for the fees; yet the said Deputy Marshal said he could not postpone the sale. He was then sold to a man who acknowledged himself a slave-dealer, but said he would continue the slave here a few days, but did not. He was sold without any limitation of time of service, and no security was required of the slave-dealer to retain him in the District.

Given under my hand and seal, this 28th January, 1828. JNO. CHALMERS, J. P. [L. s.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

So the man was sold, and sent off by the slave-dealers into hopeless bondage, though probably having as much right to freedom as we have. Will any one doubt but our laws need revision? Can any one who hears me question but that this whole matter needs to be looked into with a searching eye? If this event had happened in a distant country, how strongly would it have affected us! There is, in the public prints, an advertisement of a woman as a runaway, and that she will be sold for her jail fees. She is a yellow woman of about nineteen. She seems intelligent, and to have been well brought up. Her story is, that she is entitled to her freedom at twenty-five; but that her present master, who is a slave-dealer, is trying to make her a slave for life. In this case, I do not think the confinement is intended to aid him. But it will be seen in a moment that when the subject passes by unheeded, a dealer, owning a servant who has two or three years to serve, may cause him to be arrested as a runaway, let him be sold for jail fees, have a trusty friend to buy him in, and thus convert a servant for a term of years into a slave for life. A more expeditious mode of proceeding, by which persons having a limited time to serve are deprived entirely of their rights, is thus: They are purchased up at cheap rates by the slave-traders. They remove them to a great distance. It will be easily seen how small the chance that such persons would be able to preserve the proofs of their freedom, and how little would their protestations be heeded without proof. They are carried where redress is hopeless. Thus the slave-trade, as it exists, and is carried on here, is marked by instances of injustice and cruelty, scarcely exceeded on the coast of Africa. It is a mistake to suppose it is a mere purchase and sale of acknowledged slaves. The District is full of complaints upon the subject, and the evil is increasing. So long ago as 1802, the extent and cruelty of this traffic produced from a Grand Jury at Alexandria, a presentment, so clear, so strong, and so feelingly drawn, that I shall make no apology for reading the whole of it to the House. [Here Mr. M. read the following presentment of the Grand Jury:]

"January Term, 1802.

"We, the Grand Jury for the body of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, present, as a grievance, the practice of persons coming from distant parts of the United States into this District, for the purpose of purchasing slaves, where they exhibit to our view a scene of wretchedness and human degradation, disgraceful to our characters as citizens of a free Government.

"True it is, that those dealers in the persons of our fellow-men collect, within this District, from various parts, numbers of those victims of slavery, and lodge them in some place of confinement until they have completed their numbers. They are then turned out in our streets and exposed to view, loaded with chains, as though they had committed some heinous offence against our laws. We consider it a grievance, that citizens from distant parts of the United States should be permitted to come within this District, and pursue a traffic fraught with so much misery to a class of beings entitled to our protection by the laws of justice and humanity; and that the interposition of civil authority cannot be had to prevent parents being wrested from their offspring, and children from their parents, without respect to the ties of nature. We consider those grievances demanding legislative address; especially the practice of making sale of black people, who are, by the will of their masters, designed to be free at the expiration of a term of years, who are sold, and frequently taken to distant parts, where they have not the power to avail themselves of that portion of liberty, which was designed for their enjoyment."

The National Legislature were too much engaged, or from other causes did not interpose, and the slave trade continued to increase in extent and enormity. In 1816, a distressing event, which created great excitement in the city, occasioned a movement in Congress in respect to the matter. [Mr. M. here read an extract from the Journal of the House.]

"On motion of Mr. Randolph,

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the existence of an inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves, carried on in and through the District of Columbia, and report whether any, and what, measures are necessary for the putting a stop to the same."

If correctly informed, the immediate cause of the excitement was this: A woman, confined, among others, in the upper chamber of a three-story private prison, used by the slave-dealers in their traffic, was driven, by sorrow and despair at the idea of being separated from all that she held dear, to throw herself from the window upon the pavement. She was shockingly mangled, and lingered a long while in misery. I do not wonder that, in a humane and Christian community, such an exhibition should create excitement. It does not seem to me that the laws of Congress ought to cherish, or even permit, a system within this District, naturally productive of such scenes. This account shows the horror of this traffic, and from this we may infer the cruelty that is hid from us in those secret repositories of misery. There are several of these private prisons within the District—how many, I know not; but, from the information given me, I think the feelings of the House would be touched, could they see the cells, the fetters, and the chains they contain, without even a view of the victims that wear them. I hold some account of one of those prisons in my hand, said Mr. M., furnished me by a friend. I cannot read it without mentioning the names of several persons, and, as I wish to give neither pain nor offence to any one, in any thing I say, I will only advert to the matter generally.

In a series of essays published in a respectable print in the District, in 1827, this subject was treated of. I know of no motive for exaggeration. Published on the spot where the facts are known, it is fair to presume the picture of the slave trade, as it prevails in the District, is true to the original. Here Mr. M. read from the Alexandria Gazette of June 23, 1827, the following paragraphs:

"Some years ago," says our informant, "a colored woman, who had always been treated with kindness by her master, was sold by him to a person in this neighborhood, in order that she might be near her husband, who was also a slave. In the course of a few years she changed owners several times, and at length fell into the hands of the slave-traders, who were making up a company for the southern market. When these tidings were communicated to her, and she found that she must leave forever all the objects of her affections, to endure a life of misery in a distant land, she could not support the anguish it occasioned, and fell lifeless to the ground.

"Scarcely a week passes without some of these wretched creatures being driven through our streets. After having been confined, and sometimes manacled, in a loathsome prison, they are turned out in public view, to take their departure for the South. The children, and some of the women, are generally crowded into a cart or wagon, while the others follow on foot, not unfrequently handcuffed and chained together. To those who have never seen a spectacle of this kind, no description can give an adequate idea of its horrors. Here you may behold fathers and brothers leaving behind them the dearest objects of affection, and moving slowly along in the mute agony of despair; there the young mother sobbing over her infant, whose innocent smiles seem but to increase her misery. From some you will hear the burst of bitter lamentation, while from others the loud hysteric laugh breaks forth, denoting still deeper agony.

"The District of Columbia is now made the depot for this disgraceful traffic."

This traffic, and the views it exhibits, I beg the House to be assured, are as offensive to the people of the District as they are unjust in themselves, and impolitic in us to countenance. Can it be supposed otherwise without a reproach to the good sense and moral sensibility of its citizens? But the slave-dealers feel themselves secure. They do not dread any expression of your displeasure. These scenes have been exhibited here by the slave-dealers for nearly thirty years, under your eye, and Congress has not moved to arrest their course. Your silence gives sanction to the trade. If an evil, you alone can correct it. If you take no steps to correct it, does not your silence imply acquiescence, if not approbation? Is it then strange that the slave-dealers should gain confidence from impunity, and make this their head-quarters for carrying on the domestic slave trade? Sir, this is made the great market for the sale and purchase of human flesh. It is carried on by the sanction of our permission. I have said that the people of the District are opposed to the continuance of slavery here. I had at the last session of Congress the honor to present a petition, signed by more than one thousand respectable citizens of the ten miles square, setting forth the evils that exist, and praying for the gradual abolition of slavery within the District.

To give the House a just view of the actual state of things here, (Mr. M. said,) he would read an advertisement from the public prints of this city. It will show, not only the openness with which the slave-dealers proceeded, but it will also show that the sale of persons, men and women, at public auction, was a common practice, warranted by our laws, and permitted by the Federal Legislature. [Here Mr. M. read the following advertisement, published in this city.]

"We will give cash for one hundred likely young negroes of both sexes, between the ages of eight and twenty-five years. Persons who wish to sell would do well to give us a call, as the negroes are wanted immediately. We will give more than any other purchasers that are in market, or may hereafter come into market.

"Any letters addressed to the subscribers, through the post-office at Alexandria, will be promptly attended to. For information, inquire at the subscribers', west end of Duke Street, Alexandria, D. C.

'Dec. 15—w3m FRANKLIN & ARMPFIELD."

Aside from the injustice and cruelty to individuals, practised under the laws as they now exist, permit me (said Mr. M.) to consider the subject in a more enlarged and national point of view. We are acknowledgedly the principal Republic on the globe. Justice and equal rights are professedly at the foundation of our Government. The Congress of the United States, and their proceedings, are viewed with solidity by intelligent men throughout the world. Despotism must look with keen desire for our failure; the friends of civil liberty look with not less anxious hope for our prosperity and success. If we fail, the great cause of freedom will be lost forever. As we succeed, the sacred principles of the rights of man gain strength and will extend their influence. The people have confided to Congress exclusive legislation over ten miles square—a little spot from which local jealousies and sectional rivalries should alike be excluded. Within this limit the wisdom and the power of the Republic may operate with the most unrestricted freedom. Here, it might fairly be expected, should be exhibited to the nation and to the world a specimen of the purest laws and the most perfect legislation. Legal injustice and oppression should be unknown within the district. In relation to the moral power of this Government, in regard to the effect, at home and abroad, of our example, it would seem to me that we are called upon by the most weighty considerations to render the laws here as perfect as it is in human power and human wisdom to make them. Suppose a distinguished foreigner, of correct and expanded views, who has listened with interest to the accounts of our republic, and whose mind is imbued with the liberal principles of the age, is resolved to visit us. He leaves the despotical shores of the European continent with delight. He prays for impelling gales to waft him to this land of justice and freedom. The ten miles square, where the united wisdom and unrestricted power of the nation operate—with what elastic hope and anxious pleasure does he pursue his way to this city. And what objects are here presented to his view? At one market he meets a crowd; and, as he passes near, behold it is a constable exhibiting a woman for sale, subjected to the scoffs and jeers of the unfeeling! He is selling her for a petty debt, under the authority of the sanction of Congress! Well may he exclaim, "the age of chivalry is indeed gone forever!" To remove the painful impression, he takes up a newspaper of the District, and reads, "cash in the market, and the highest price" for men and women. He walks abroad and sees a gang of slaves handcuffed together, a long chain running between them and connecting the whole—miserable objects of horror and despair, marching off under the command of the slave-traders! What must be his feelings—what his report when he shall return! This District ought to be the best governed in the universe. It is absolutely governed the worst. It would not be going much too far to say, that there is more crime and more misery here than in any other spot of equal extent on the globe. In 1826 and 1827, there were not less than six hundred and thirty-four persons committed to the prison in this city for debt! What a horrible state of things must exist, when, in so small a population, more than six hundred persons, in two years, are deprived of their personal freedom, and degraded by being thrown into jail without pretence of crime. It is shocking! It is appalling! Within the same two years there were no less than three hundred and thirty-four persons committed to this jail for criminal offences. This is independent of those committed at Alexandria: for there are two public prisons in the District. Did anybody ever hear of such a thing in a Christian and civilized country? It would seem to me that such scenes are calculated greatly to weaken the moral power of the Government, and to impair the just respect in which it should be held by the nations of the earth. The reasons which may be supposed to operate in favor of the continuance of slavery elsewhere, do not exist here. The number is not so great as to present any formidable impediment to the extinction of the evil. Here are no rice lands to cultivate: nothing to be done but what might as well be done, and better, by a free white population, than by slaves.

Occupancy of the Oregon River.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

The question was put on the amendment offered on Monday by Mr. TAYLOR, to the amendment offered by Mr. DRAYTON, and decided in the negative.

Mr. INGERSOLL offered the following amendment to that of Mr. DRAYTON:

"And be it further enacted, If any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory or district of country lying west of the Rocky Mountains, south of 54 degrees and 40 minutes north latitude, and north of the 42d degree of north latitude, commit any crime, offence, or misdemeanor, which, if committed elsewhere, would be punished by the laws of the United States; or if any person shall, within such part of the territory or district of country as belongs to the United States, west of the Rocky Mountains, commit any such crime, offence, or misdemeanor, upon the property or person of any citizen of the United States, every such offender, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer the like punishment as is provided by the laws of the United States for the like offences, if committed within any place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The trial of all offences which shall be committed under this act shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or in which he may first be brought, and the Superior Courts in each of the territorial districts, and the Circuit Courts, and other courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each district of the United States in which any offender against this act shall be first apprehended or brought for trial, shall have, and hereby are invested with, full power and authority to hear, try, and punish, all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors against this act; such courts proceeding in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts."

Mr. INGERSOLL said, we have decided by the vote just announced, that, if any thing is done in regard to the Oregon country, it shall be more than sending a party to explore the territory. He was satisfied with that decision so far as it went: for, from every view he had been able to take of the subject, he was brought to the conclusion, that our interests in that quarter require some further legislation from Congress than the mere sending out an expedition to look at the country, and furnish us with the journal of their proceedings. There was, however, an embarrassment in determining how far we can legislate on this disputed ground, without conflicting with treaty stipulations. He was satisfied that the bill, as reported, would interfere with our existing engagements to Great Britain, and therefore he could not go for it in that shape. The convention so often alluded to, stipulates that the country west of the Rocky Mountains shall remain "free and open" to the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties, during the continuance of the compact, and neither can recede, without giving twelve months' notice to the other. The erection of a territorial government, therefore, and granting portions of the soil as a bounty to settlers, would be an exclusive occupancy on our part, in the teeth of the treaty. But while he was restrained from going that length, satisfied, as he was, that the title to the country is with us, he was not only willing, but anxious, that some decisive act should be done on our part, which should indicate our determination not to surrender one particle of our claim—leaving the question of a territorial government to be settled hereafter, when the existing convention would not be in our way. For the present, it is not necessary to advance a step farther than the British have gone; but the obligations of interests and duty require that we should go pari passu with them. They have erected, and now maintain, forts for the protection of their traders and hunters. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DRAYTON,) very properly proposes that we should do the same. But they have gone farther than this: they have covered the whole territory with their criminal and civil jurisdiction; and those who resort to it, are amenable to the courts of Canada for all violations of their laws. With this act of the British Parliament before me, (said Mr. I.,) I cannot for one refuse to send our laws along with our citizens, if they choose to go there, any more than I would to protect them by the erection of a fort. It was to meet the British legislation in all its bearings, that he had offered the amendment to the consideration of the committee; and he sincerely hoped we should not give occasion for its being urged upon us hereafter, that we have at this day waived any of our rights to the territory in question, by silently acquiescing in the foreign jurisdiction now exercised there, or by refusing to spread our flag and our laws co-extensive with our rightful claims. It was true that Great Britain did not, in her negotiations with us, claim to apply her jurisdiction farther than was necessary to protect her own subjects; but, on the contrary, disclaimed any other intention, though the language of the act of Parliament was certainly very general, and seemed to be applicable to all persons who might be in the territory. But the amendment he had offered had no such apparent bearing; it was confined to the protection of citizens of the United States, in their property and person. Can Great Britain complain of this? Surely, if the "free and open" intercourse with that territory, guarantied to the British by the convention, in common with ourselves, cannot be made secure to them, without carrying their laws along with their hunting expeditions, we have had abundant evidence, in the repeated murders of our own hunters beyond the mountains, that our citizens require at our hands a corresponding protection. Besides, Great Britain is estopped by her own acts from complaining of our going thus far in our legislation; and more than this he did not ask of the committee, but anything less would be injustice to ourselves.

Mr. I. said he was free to confess, that he never had formed a very flattering picture of the north-west coast of our continent—that is, of its attractions for an agricultural people. He preferred to see it remain a hunting ground, from which our fur-traders can draw some of the treasures that are now monopolized by the

Hudson's Bay Company, rather than see it erected into a sovereign State. But, whatever our preferences may be in this respect, it was our duty to protect our citizens whose enterprise may lead them there, and it was no less our interest to secure the harbor which the mouth of the Oregon offers to our hardy navigators who frequent the coast. He was not anxious to hasten the growth of a new State beyond the Rocky Mountains, for he was aware it would have but few ties, aside from its weakness and independence on our naval power, to bind it to this side of the continent. Its trade, if the country should ever be settled by a permanent agricultural population, as it must be before it can grow into a State, would not probably cross the mountains to come to us, but would naturally seek the waters of the Pacific. For all commercial purposes, India, and the islands of the south seas, would be to a thriving population there what Europe and the Atlantic islands are to us. But although he entertained these opinions still, when the question was put—and turn it as you may, it will come to this, whether we shall surrender this vast territory into the hands of the British, or maintain our own jurisdiction there, he was ready to give a positive and decisive answer. It should not, with his consent, go into the hands of a foreign power. That country once annexed to Canada, with its formidable Indian tribes in the train of the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company, would be to our advancing frontier, what Canada has been in all our Indian wars. Sir, we are not without experience on this subject. The history of our western settlements gives us ample evidence of Indian aggressions, stimulated by the influence of white men within the bounds of Canada. We have felt this hidden influence in all our frontier contests, from the days of the Revolution down to the declaration of the late war with England, or rather to the battle of Tippecanoe, which shortly preceded it. Nor have we since ceased to feel its effects—you felt it to the quick, on the frontiers, throughout the war with England, and you feel it now; yes, in the very territory about which we are told not to legislate, our citizens are shot down by Indians, armed with British rifles. And with these facts staring us in the face, are we to hold back and hesitate, lest we give offence to the British Government, in deciding to protect our citizens by the establishment of a fort, or the extension of our laws into this territory? Let it not be said that the soil of the country is not sufficiently inviting (it was called the other day in debate, a region of "penny-royal") to induce the British to occupy it. To say nothing of the immense fur trade derived from the country, the harbor at the mouth of the Oregon, commanding the upper country, convenient in its position in reference to India, the Sandwich Islands, the new nations bounding on the west coast of our continent, presented sufficient attractions for the colonial grasp of Great Britain. He did not pretend to much sagacity in matters of this sort, but he verily believed that not a twelvemonth would elapse after we should abandon our claim to this position, before the mouth of that river would be controlled by the guns of a fortress, manned by our great commercial rival. Is it asked what reason we have to suppose this? The answer will be found in the policy of that nation, which is to plant a colony from her superabundant population, wherever she can penetrate with a fleet. This policy is identified with the immense power which she wields; and will be always pushed to its farthest limits. Small in territory at home, her extensive possessions abroad are towers of her strength in every part of the world. No spot, however sterile, is lost sight of, if it can furnish new facilities to her commerce. She will fortify, at the expense of millions, a rock in the Ocean, if it can be made a safe resting place for her merchantmen, or a convenient rendezvous for her ships of war.

Occupancy of the Oregon River.

Mr. I. said he would now notice more particularly an objection which was urged yesterday against our establishing military posts in the territory, derived from the third article of the convention of 1818, as renewed in 1828. That article undoubtedly prohibits the exclusive occupancy of either party, and leaves the whole country "free and open" to both. But he did not advocate an exclusive possession, nor does either or all of the amendments proposed contemplate any thing of that sort. We only ask to occupy the country in the same way that the other party occupy it—not to exclude them. But one difficulty lies here: we have hitherto found that it is impossible for our citizens to have a "free and open" intercourse with the territory, unless they have suitable forts for their protection against the surrounding tribes, as well as to make an impression on those more distant, who may occasionally visit them. Without some shelter of this kind, the convention becomes a dead letter to us. If, therefore, we have the rights, which all concede that we have, under the third article of the convention, to an unmolested occupancy co-extensive with that of Great Britain, the instrument which recognizes this right, necessarily implies such an occupancy on our part as is now proposed: for the country, filled with savages as it is, will admit of no other. Taking the article even by itself, there was no difficulty in the case. It should be remembered that we do not propose to send a garrison into the country to drive the British out, but merely to let our own citizens in. If, however, there were any doubts in looking at this clause by itself, those doubts have certainly been removed by the British themselves. They have put both a verbal and a practical construction on the article which has been here interposed, that frees us from all embarrassment in arriving at its true meaning. They have erected and now maintain a chain of posts, extending from Canada to the waters of the Oregon, or Columbia River. But, it is asked, were their forts erected anterior to, or since, the date of the convention? So far as the argument is concerned, it was no sort of consequence when the forts were built, if they have been strengthened since the date of the convention, and are now maintained, which is not denied. If an occupancy, protected by a military post, is inconsistent with the terms of our engagements, as has been urged, then it was the duty of Great Britain, after signing the article in question, to dismount her guns, and abandon the posts. She did not do it, and cannot now complain of our adopting her own practical construction. But we do not stop here. The British negotiators have admitted to our Ministers that they do not object to our erecting forts. This is abundantly evident in the letters of Mr. Gallatin, of the 2d and 20th of December, 1826, which had been already, in course of the debate, brought more particularly to the notice of the committee. Thus much for the understanding of this subject by the British authorities. How has it always been considered by our own Government? The convention was first formed in 1818, under the administration of Mr. Monroe, and while Mr. Adams was Secretary of State. But so far from their supposing that the establishment of military posts would interfere with the third article, we find Mr. Monroe recommending the measure in 1822, and the present Executive did the same, in his Message at the opening of the nineteenth Congress. The British Government have, therefore, not only told us what their construction of the article is, but they have been fully apprised of our construction of it, by the Executive recommendations just referred to. And yet, with a full knowledge of all that we have contemplated and all that we now propose, that Government renewed the convention with us during the last year, without hinting a syllable of complaint. After this, it is too late to anticipate such objections from that quarter.

Mr. RICHARDSON objected to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) because it would be partial and ineffectual for the attainment of its object. For the same reason, he voted against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TAYLOR.) That amendment proposed simply a survey of the Oregon territory. After what has passed in this House, such a measure would be considered as one of a timid and doubtful policy. It would be considered as an admission, in the face of the world, that this Government is doubtful of its right to the territory. And what impression, sir, would such a course of policy make on the Indian tribes and the British citizens of that territory? In that territory, it is estimated that there are at least two hundred thousand Indians. They are supplied with fire-arms, and are under British influence. Emboldened by the timid policy of this Government, and roused to jealousy by causes which could not be traced, they would annihilate at a blow your corps of engineers, proposed by the amendment to be employed, without any other protection. Such an event would unavoidably lead to war between the two Governments. If this Government should establish military posts, with the admission that this is all that it has a right to do, this measure seems likely to result in war. The British Government now has military posts in that territory, occupying the most favorable positions. Will they give place to posts, to be established by this Government? If the territory be ours, it is better for us, and would be better for the British, that their posts should be at once excluded. Sir, I am opposed, in a case like this, when on all hands the right to the territory is admitted to be ours, to a course that, by its indecision, invites resistance. The original bill seems not to be understood. It proposes a process of measures, indicating a determination of this Government with respect to its course. One section of the bill provides that the President may exercise his discretion with regard to the event of establishing a territorial Government. This would obviate the objection arising out of the existing convention between this Government and the Government of Great Britain. For these general reasons, (said Mr. R.,) I am opposed to the amendments offered by each of the gentlemen.

Mr. DRAYTON's amendment, as amended by Mr. INGERSOLL, was adopted.

The last section was read, which contains the appropriation for the expense of the proposed expedition.

Mr. DRAYTON moved to fill the blank with ten thousand dollars.

Mr. FLOYD objected to this sum as insufficient, and proposed twenty-five thousand dollars; which motion prevailing, the blank was so filled accordingly.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILDE moved the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT expressed a hope that Mr. MINER would consent to withdraw the preamble, and thereby remove the chief cause of objection.

Mr. M. declining to do so,

Mr. WICKLIFFE inquired of the Chair whether the previous question would not supersede the motion he had made for striking out the preamble?

The Speaker replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WEEMS hoped the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw the motion for the previous question, as he felt assured the gentleman from Pennsylvania was desirous of replying to what he had advanced.

Mr. ALEXANDER moved to lay the preamble and resolutions upon the table. Lost.

The hour allotted to reports and resolutions having now expired, the subject was laid over until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 9.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The preamble and resolutions on this subject offered by Mr. MINER coming up, Mr. WILDE moved the previous question.

The motion was sustained.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then demanded that the question be divided, and the vote taken first on the preamble, which details the allegations, and then on the resolution itself, which recommends the subject for inquiry by the Standing Committee on the district.

The question was divided accordingly, and The previous question was put and determined in the affirmative.

The main question was then put, upon agreeing to the preamble as modified, and decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 141.

The question was on the first resolution, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 59.

The question on the second resolution was also decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 66.

So both the resolutions were adopted.

Occupancy of the Oregon River.

The House then proceeded to consider the Oregon bill, with the amendments thereto, as reported by the Committee of the Whole; and the question being on concurring with those amendments, it passed in the affirmative.

The question then being on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading—

The yeas and nays were then taken on ordering the bill to its third reading, as amended, and stood as follows:

MONDAY, January 12.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill "to amend an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same;' passed the eighteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six"—the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. CROCKETT, as a substitute for the bill, as modified, on the suggestion of Mr. POLK.

Mr. LEA said he was not in the habit of troubling the House with speeches. He had generally made a merit of silence, and endeavored to profit by the statements of others, more experienced and better informed. In local affairs, he always paid particular attention to what was said by those gentlemen who ought, from their situations, to be best acquainted with them. As such had been his course of conduct, and as the pending question was of local character, chiefly interesting to the State of Tennessee, he hoped the House would not consider him obtrusive while attempting to make a few practical remarks. Inexperienced in parliamentary debate, never before having been a member of any legislative assembly, he could not expect to satisfy even himself, and much less others, either as to the manner or substance of what he might say. All that he could hope was, in a very imperfect manner, to make himself so far understood as to remove some erroneous impressions, and thereby contribute something to repel unexpected and unwarrantable attacks on the character and interests of his State. He said he could not be insensible to the many embarrassments arising from the various feelings of different parts of the Union on land subjects. Whenever such a matter came up, it had to contend not only against its own peculiar intrinsic difficulties, but also against a host of almost invincible prejudices, if he might be allowed to call them so, originating in apprehensions of the consequences which might collaterally flow from the adoption of the particular measure proposed. He hoped that gentlemen would give this subject sufficient attention to examine it on its own merits, and as they would desire that others should investigate the local matters in which they might have particular interest. He knew that the question was complicated, and was fearful that it had not been considered as thoroughly as it deserved, even by those who had been present throughout the discussion. But others had been absent, during part of the time at least, and he would endeavor to progress with his observations in a plain and practical manner.

As the motion was to strike out the whole bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the proposed amendment as a substitute, it became necessary to compare the two propositions; and to do this properly both should be distinctly understood. A brief statement of the substance of each might not occasion a useless consumption of time. The bill is predicated on a repeated application from the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, and conforms with the memorial in providing that the United States lands in that State shall be surrendered to her on account of a deficiency in her common school lands, and to be disposed of by her for the purposes of education. In consequence of agreements long ago made between the Governments concerned, that all the bona fide North Carolina land claims should be satisfied from the public lands in Tennessee, a provision was inserted in the bill that all such claims should be satisfied if any existed, although it was believed that none or but very few remained. It has always been the policy of the Legislature of Tennessee, whenever it had the power, to give a preference of entry or right of pre-emption to occupants; and it has already made such a provision, to quiet and secure them, in favor of those who occupy portions of the United States lands in that State in anticipation of the surrender of those lands now solicited, and to take effect in that event; but from abundant caution, and for entire satisfaction, a similar provision, by way of amendment to this bill, was proposed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. POLK,) the Chairman of the Committee who reported the bill; and his proposition was modified, on motion of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) and then adopted by the House, so as to give those occupants a pre-emption or rather, as nothing is to be paid, a preference of entry, without charge. Under this bill, as it now stands, those occupants would get their lands without any charge. Such is a brief outline of the substance of the bill, as it originally was, and as at present amended. Mr. L. said it was to be hoped, after the insertion of this last most extraordinary provision, that his colleague from the western district of Tennessee, (Mr. CROCKETT,) would withdraw his amendment, and endeavor, to some extent, to harmonize with his colleagues; but he seemed determined, even against greater benefits to his people, pertinaciously to insist upon his own naked and unqualified proposition. And what was it? It would simply give to the occupants, respectively, who were such on or before the first of December last, the same quantities of land that the bill would secure to all who might be occupants by the first of April next; and they would have to pay the usual fees for surveying and for issuing grants to the officers of the State of Tennessee, who were authorized, in the common way, and at the common rates, to proceed in perfecting their titles, without any directions from the Legislature of that State.

Having thus stated the substance of the bill, and of the proposed substitute, Mr. L. proceeded more particularly to contrast them, and to urge his objections to the latter. He said, without approbating the provisions either of the bill, or of the substitute, as far as concerned the occupants, he could not see any reasonable ground on which his colleague (Mr. CROCKETT) should adhere so inflexibly to his amendment. The occupants seemed to be the objects of his chief, if not only care, and the bill provided for more of them, and on better terms. Why then, should any one cling to the amendment, under a pretence of great zeal in behalf of occupants, when it is loaded with objections, which must ultimately destroy it? One of those objections is, that the amendment makes no provision whatever for the satisfaction of any North Carolina claims, which may remain in the hands of infants, femmes couvertes, or any other persons who may be justly entitled to relief. And my colleague, (Mr. CROCKETT,) in his remarks the other day, plainly told the members from North Carolina, that his object was to secure the occupants, in defiance of all stipulations with that State; and this, too, notwithstanding the agreement of Congress that these claims should be satisfied, and the subsequent obligation on Tennessee to do so, out of these very lands. It may be, that no valid claims of that kind yet remain; but, on the other hand, it is possible that some exist, which ought to be satisfied; yet, we have been told, that such pre-existing rights ought to be postponed to these occupant claims, and transferred, of course, to inferior lands. It is plainly submitted to every member of this House to say, if it would be right, while claims exist, to take away the means of satisfying them? Would not North Carolina complain? And if Tennessee should proceed to satisfy the claimants, would not a conflict necessarily arise between them and the occupants? Or, if she should refuse to do so, might not this Government become responsible? Mr. L. protested against being involved in any such unnecessary embarrassments, and then proceeded to another objection, of a character which he could never pass without notice.

According to the amendment, the State officers of Tennessee were to be employed, without consulting her Legislature, in perfecting the titles to these occupants. Is Congress prepared, not merely to refuse the respectful request of a State, as it certainly may, but also to go farther, and employ the officers of that State to do something else directly at war with her application? Shall we call on the Surveyors, Secretary of State, and Governor of Tennessee, to make surveys, and issue grants? He would ask if gentlemen could sanction such a doctrine? Are we to empower the officers of Tennessee to give patents for our vacant lands? Are they to act under our authority? He understood the republican feeling of that State better than to believe that such a game could be played off on her. What! A Governor of Tennessee to be signing grants under an act of Congress, and that, too, against the known will of his State? He dare not do it. But his colleague (Mr. CROCKETT) had said that he would risk the performance, if his amendment were adopted; that it merely gave permission that the officers might act without saying they should. Mr. L. remarked, that, in making and construing laws, may and shall were often convertible terms. But, suppose those officers should decline to act under such a law, where is its sanction, and what is its penalty? It could not be carried into operation. But again, suppose the Legislature of that State should consider it against her interest to accept the provisions of such a law, and should forbid her officers to execute it, then any man could see what would be the unpleasant consequences. These are not merely idle speculations. He would go farther, and hazard but little in giving his decided opinion, that, even if the officers of Tennessee should manifest a disposition to execute such a law, her Legislature would actually prohibit them. The members, coming from all parts of the State, and considering the interests in those lands general, not local, would not allow the State officers to be employed in acts opposed to the wishes and interests of their constituents. To pass this amendment into a law would be affecting to do some good, but really doing worse than nothing. He never could agree to such a provision himself, nor could he believe that gentlemen, on reflection, would consider it consistent with sound principles. He knew there were instances, in which Congress had attempted to give cognizance of certain matters to State officers, and he knew, too, that contentions had sometimes ensued. He had an opinion, as to the propriety of such attempted investments of power, and hoped that a majority would be opposed to their extension. Let every Government attend to its own concerns, through its own officers; but, above all, let the General Government never be found arrayed in a controversy of local character between the majority of a State on the one side, and a minority on the other, authorizing and inviting the officers of that State to enlist in the contest, in opposition to the public will. Such a policy would be marked with features too familiar and too striking not to be recognized.

Mr. L. urged another objection to the amendment, as a substitute for the bill, on the ground that it made no disposition of the remainder of the lands after satisfying the occupant claims. He would inquire what was to become of the residue? Was it to continue unnoticed, and useless? Or would it not rather pass rapidly into the hands of other occupants? Mr. L. said he had no disposition to censure those who were there at present; and far be it from him to war with occupants anywhere. He had learned, from his infancy, and by personal observation, to feel for them a becoming sympathy. A large portion of those who had honored him with a seat on this floor had been occupants from the earliest settlement of their country, under circumstances of danger, privation, and hardship, far exceeding any thing known to the settlers of the western district of Tennessee. Yet he accorded with his colleague from that district (Mr. CROCKETT) in many of his sentiments expressed in their favor, and was willing that a reasonable preference, consistently with the just claims of others, should be extended to them, and to all occupants, in proportion to the private difficulties and public advantages attendant on their persevering exertions. He did not contend against occupants, but against the policy of improperly tempting our citizens to become such. Gentlemen who are so sensitive concerning the speedy and cheap disposition of the public lands, ought to reflect on the principles of this amendment, and the consequences which may flow from its adoption. How will this thing operate? If we give lands to the present occupants, without disposing of the residue, at the same time, as they are, of course, generally settled on the best portions, we cannot refuse, next year, to give inferior parts to those who may then possess them. The remaining lands either will or will not be fit for occupation. If not, why should we retain them? And if otherwise, no matter to what extent, ought we to keep them for the mere purpose of making annual donations to those who would be tempted, in the mean time, to occupy them? And if there were lands enough, they would soon be covered by swarms numerous as those of the Egyptian locusts, until the whole would be devoured. Commence this policy once, and there can be no end of it, but with the exhaustion of the means. Can we give the better this session, and refuse the worse next? Consistency would demand a perseverance, with increasing reasons, founded on the inducement to occupancy held out by ourselves, and on the inferiority of the gifts. While the whole country, however small or great, would in time be thus given away, without a cent of profit to the United States, their treasury would be annually drained in making laws on the subject as long as the continuance of this process. Mr. L. observed that, if his colleague (Mr. CROCKETT) looked to ulterior objects he might think it well enough for his district to acquire population at so cheap a rate; and it would be highly gratifying to find that, or any other portion of the State, increasing in population, or otherwise prospering on fair and equal terms; but nearly every other part of the State felt an equal interest in those lands for satisfying a just claim, and it could not be expected that the aggrandizement of one part, at the expense of the others, would be acquiesced in by them. Mr. L. was of opinion, however, that not only the interests of Tennessee, generally, but also the permanent good of the western district, were better provided for in the bill than by the amendment, with all its consequences. He would now inquire of gentlemen representing new States, if they were prepared to adopt the policy of giving away lands to occupants, present and future? Had they no hopes of ultimately enjoying some benefits from the surrender of the inferior public lands to the States in which they lie? He could not suppose that those States would, on this occasion, abandon their own avowed principles. The bill, as compared with the amendment, was of a character accommodated in some degree to the sentiments of nearly all. While it avoided, on one hand, extravagant prodigality, it exhibited, on the other, some features of liberality.

Mr. CARSON said that, if the decision of the committee had been taken on a previous day, he should have voted in favor of the amendment of his honorable friend from Tennessee, (Mr. CROCKETT,) but he considered it highly fortunate that such had not been the case: for subsequent reflection had fully convinced him that the passage of that measure would be a direct injury to the very persons whom it was intended to benefit. The land in question, which was sought for on the one hand by the State, and on the other by the occupants who had settled upon it, had, it was well known, been ceded by North Carolina, under certain reservations and conditions. The United States was bound to observe, and to cause to be observed, those conditions; and the House should bear them in mind when legislating upon the subject. North Carolina had expressly reserved the right of perfecting all titles to grants of lands made to officers and soldiers of the Continental line of that State, for revolutionary and other services. The amendment, which he had referred to above, went to disturb that compact which he considered ought to be held sacred and inviolable. It was proposed, by that amendment, to give the land to the actual settlers thereon under various conditions, and to vest the right of perfecting the titles thereto in the Governor and the other State officers of Tennessee. He was utterly opposed to the sanctioning of such a proposition by a vote of the House. There were numerous North Carolina warrants for land yet remaining unsettled; many of them belonging to widows and their orphan children, and to minors; and it had from those circumstances been difficult to put their claims in a train of speedy adjustment. Now, suppose the House passed the bill, did not gentlemen perceive what would be the inevitable results? Let them grant the hundred and sixty acres to each occupant; and then, when the holders of the outstanding North Carolina warrants went and advanced their just and equitable pretensions, and laid claim to the lands secured to them by a solemn instrument, and for a valuable consideration, what a wide and frightful field of litigation was thrown open to the citizens of those States. And how was that litigation to be terminated? Was there a judicial tribunal in the United States, or indeed in the civilized world, that would not immediately decide in any litigated case founded upon such a basis, in favor of the North Carolina claimants? That solemn and binding instrument, the act of cession, expressly provided for the payment of those claims, and unless all law and all justice were alike borne down and destroyed, all the laws of Congress, and all the courts of justice in the Union, could not invalidate its provisions, express and stipulated. Litigation on the most tremendous scale would inevitably ensue, to the impoverishment of the people and the ruin of the settlers on the lands. Let every gentleman, then, who could entertain such an idea, reflect that the most deleterious consequences would flow to the occupants themselves, from holding out to them the prospect of obtaining free and gratuitous donations of the public lands, and in that manner inducing them to settle upon the public domain; thereby sowing a seed which, he repeated, would not fail to produce a most abundant harvest of litigation. He proceeded to express his deliberate and confirmed opinion, that there was no power vested in the United States to abrogate a right secured to a State or a citizen by a conditional agreement, similar to that contained in the act of cession. If the bill did not provide for the rights of North Carolina, or the persons holding her warrants, he had no hesitation in pronouncing it to be his opinion that, under all the circumstances of the case, it was a violation of the public faith, and an infringement on the just rights of the State; yet, even supposing the bill were to pass without providing for the liquidation of all the claims made on account of the North Carolina land warrants, he repeated that the adjudication of every court of law would and must be in favor of the parties claiming, under the express provisions of that act of cession, which was as plain, precise, and binding on the United States as language could possibly frame it. That was, and must continue to be, an insuperable objection; it was, he must again and again tell them, absolutely beyond their power to annul, by any legislative act on their part, the stipulations contained in that instrument.

Mr. C. proceeded. There was another, and, it must be seen, a very important condition attached to the act of cession. Let gentlemen refer to that public deed. [Here Mr. C. read the third article of the act of cession; it is as follows:]

"Thirdly, That all the lands intended to be ceded by virtue of this act, to the United States of America, and not appropriated as before mentioned, (appropriated, [said Mr. C.,] as the act showed, for the payment of the land warrants alluded to,) shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States of America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."—[Laws of the United States, page 87, vol. 11, third section of "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."]

What answer could be made to that objection to the bill as proposed to be amended? There all the surplus land was specifically appropriated—directed to be applied to a certain express purpose "for the use and benefit of the United States of America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion and expenditure." It was further said that it shall be disposed of for no other purpose whatever. North Carolina, then, was entitled to a proportionate share in the advantages accruing from that fund and its proceeds, and the surplus land could not, consistently with that provision in the act of cession, be disposed of for any other purpose whatever. How could the House obviate that objection to the amendment before them?

Mr. CROCKETT said, that he felt it his duty to trouble the House with a few more observations in explanation of his views upon the subject before them, and particularly in reply to some remarks which had fallen from his honorable colleagues. He still remained unfixed in his opinion that without the amendment which he had proposed, the bill could not possibly be productive of any good effects, and he therefore felt himself bound, both in justice to himself and to his constituents, to use every effort to carry it through that House. He had, during the last session of Congress, suggested to his colleague, (Mr. POLK,) the Chairman of the Committee that had reported the bill brought into the House at that period on the same subject as that which was then under consideration, the propriety of reporting a bill appropriating the proceeds of the land in question entirely for the benefit of the western district of Tennessee—for the benefit of those poor settlers, who had sat down, and occupied various small patches and fragments of the public domain, and established comfortable though humble homes. But he was sorry to say that that gentleman objected to his proposition, and preferred that bill of his own, which he subsequently introduced, and which ultimately failed. Mr. C. here observed that an explanation on one particular point might perhaps be considered due from him. He would shortly give it. He had on that occasion supported the original measure of his honorable friend, (Mr. POLK,) while at the same time he perfectly knew that it would not be carried; he supported it under the hope that it would subsequently unite his colleagues of the Tennessee delegation with him in the support of his favorite measure—that of providing for the poor settlers of the western district. But he was sorry to find that he had been a very mistaken judge of policy indeed. Yes, (he repeated,) he was well aware at the time that it could not succeed in passing the House, and he was of a similar opinion with respect to the present measure—he meant the original bill, which he was confident never would receive their sanction. It would be perceived by the House, that he was compelled to stand now in a very different attitude from that which he had assumed in the course of the last year's discussion of the subject. He felt himself called upon by a sense of duty to stand in opposition to the whole balance of the delegation from his own State; under the disadvantage also of having to contend with the arguments of three of the ablest members of the bar of that State. The House, he was sure, must fully appreciate the difficulties under which he labored in thus standing alone and unsupported; but he was strengthened in the task by the reflection that he was in the performance of his duty, and advocating the just claims of those poor, but honest, virtuous citizens who had sent him to that House, to attend to their rights and interests. He could not conceive that, in submitting his amendment to the House, and soliciting them to sanction it by their vote, he had requested one particle which they ought not to grant on every principle of charity and even of justice. To refer now to some observations of gentlemen upon that floor, relative to the operation of the amendment which he had proposed, one honorable gentleman (Mr. POLK) said it would act as a dangerous precedent; that other States would come forward encouraged by the poor settlers of Tennessee, and claim every acre of the public domain. Now he (Mr. C.) certainly could not see that such would be the necessary effect of the adoption of his amendment. Let other States be put in the same position as his State, and he would readily agree to grant them what Tennessee asked. Tennessee had received no public lands from the General Government; no United States surveyor had ever laid out lands in that State; she had a claim, and the worthy and honest citizens of his district had a claim—and a just claim it was, for it appealed to the best feelings of their hearts—to those lands. Was it then to be said that it would form a dangerous precedent to grant to those industrious and persevering men the miserable remnants and scraps of land which their toil alone could render desirable or valuable? Was it a dangerous precedent to grant to the poor and the needy the soil which they had reclaimed from the wilderness with the sweat of their brow? True, as had been said, those lands were of no value, but they were endeared to the settlers as being their homes—and to his own knowledge they were homes in which contentment and happiness reigned. But, if it were what they chose to consider so dangerous a precedent, he felt himself not the less bound to support it; his conscience told him he was right in doing so, and if that measure were adopted, the cries of those poor would resound in thanksgiving and gratitude before the throne of God. Another gentleman (Mr. LEA) had observed that, if the present claims were granted, they would at the next Congress come forward and ask for more. Now it did not appear to him that such would be the case; all that he wanted on behalf of his constituents was that they should not be disturbed in the possession of the lands which they already occupied, and upon which depended their subsistence, by the holders of the North Carolina warrants. They asked Congress to grant them those lands, and those lands only; and if their request were complied with, the very utmost of their desires would be satisfied. The House, he was sure, must recollect that, when the subject was discussed last session, the gentlemen from North Carolina and Tennessee had stated that some of the North Carolina warrants were in existence. He (Mr. C.) did not believe there did exist any; but even supposing there was a number of them yet outstanding, were the holders of them to come and drive the settlers off their little patches of land, and reap the fruits of their years of toil and labor? He hoped the House would not sanction any measure fraught with so much cruelty and injustice. Besides, if those North Carolina warrants must be paid, there was good land enough in that State to meet them; and let them be satisfied out of that, without ejecting the indigent occupant in his district.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

Mr. LOOKER said, that his pure belief was, that very erroneous opinions prevailed with respect to the extent and value of the land in question. The Chairman of the Committee that had reported the bill had stated that the whole value of the land did not exceed twenty thousand dollars. If he could be convinced that it was of such trivial value, he should most readily withdraw his opposition to the bill; but, he repeated that he could not bring himself to admit that such was the fact. Gentlemen would find, from reports of the surveyors, among the papers on their tables, that there were upwards of four millions of acres of land yet unoccupied; and it was his opinion that its value had been underrated in those reports. Some had been estimated at twelve and a half cents per acre; some at twenty-five; and some even as high as fifty cents. One gentleman did not hesitate to say that the aggregate value of it would amount to one hundred thousand dollars; and another had carried it up even higher. It was evident that the information possessed by the House on the subject was vague and indefinite. Alluding to the appeal so strongly made by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CROCKETT) to grant the lands to the poor settlers on the score of charity, he asked the House whether there were not hundreds and thousands of their fellow-citizens in other States and territories, who might urge a similar plea for relief at the public expense? Certainly there were; and that measure, supposing it to receive the sanction of that House, would operate as a premium to the poor to settle upon the public lands. The exercise of acts of charity, no one could deny, reflected the highest honor upon the human heart; but it should not be forgotten that those very lands, with the other part of the public domain, were pledged for the payment of the public debt. He begged it to be observed, also, that the lands were rapidly increasing in value, and in all probability, in the course of a few years, those pitiful scraps and fragments of sand and rock would exceed in value the sum of half a million of dollars. They would, besides, be compelled to grant similar privileges to other States. He concluded by saying that he was decidedly adverse to the measure.

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, said he had risen to address the House in reply to the arguments and statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. LEA,) and to notice the remarks made some days since by his colleague, (Mr. POLK.) I am (said Mr. W.) in favor of the amendment now before the House, proposed by the gentleman (Mr. CROCKETT) who represents the district in which a great portion of the land in question lies. I am opposed to the original bill; first, because the arguments urged by its friends are not sustained by the facts which are on record before us; and in the next place, I believe the principles on which the bill rests, would, if recognized in this case, overturn our whole land system. From the statement made to the House by the mover of this amendment, and the slight examination I had given to the subject, I did, the other day, express the opinion that the State of Tennessee had exceeded its authority. I will presently refer gentlemen to the facts on which I founded my opinion.

The gentleman who addressed the House to-day advocated the bill as a measure of justice to Tennessee. He asserted that, while all the other new States have received large grants for schools, colleges, and other objects, Tennessee has had nothing. He magnified the liberality of Government to Ohio, and would have us believe that Tennessee had alone been neglected, and has derived no benefit from the liberal appropriations made of our public lands. The gentleman who addressed the House last week (Mr. POLK) reminded us that this claim was presented by a respectful memorial of the Legislature of that State. He seemed to think we should not presume to question the facts assumed in that memorial, or the legality of the acts of the Legislature. Sir, however respectful the memorial may be, and to whatever deference it is entitled, we have here the right to examine the justice of the claim preferred by the State, and to investigate the legality of its legislative proceedings. I concede to the memorial of Tennessee the same consideration I would give to the recommendations of any other State, but nothing more.

The assertion, on which this whole measure rests, is that Congress agreed, by the act of April, 1806, to give to the State of Tennessee a section of school land for every six miles square in the State; and as it is alleged there was not a sufficient quantity of land in the district north and east of the reservation line, to satisfy this grant, that we are bound to make up the deficiency out of the public land south and west of that line. This construction of the act of Congress is, in my opinion, altogether incorrect. The whole of the land in the district north and east of the reservation line, which includes more than two-thirds of the State, was granted to Tennessee upon certain conditions; one of which was, that the State should "locate six hundred and forty acres to every six miles square, where existing claims would allow the same, for the use of schools." This, sir, was a condition obligatory on Tennessee, and not on the General Government. [See United States Laws, vol. 4, page 40.] But admitting this construction to be correct, and giving to the act of Congress the greatest possible latitude, I will prove to the House that Tennessee has received a much greater quantity of land than it would be entitled to, allowing six hundred and forty acres for every six miles square in the whole State.

The gentleman was, I believe, entirely mistaken, when he informed the House that Tennessee had received less of the public lands than Ohio, or any other new State. Two townships for colleges, and one section to every six miles square, for common schools, has been granted to most of the new States and the territories. But what has Tennessee received? She has received much more than Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois, including all our grants for colleges, schools, roads, and canals. Tennessee has received more than two millions six hundred thousand acres of the public land, purchased by Congress as a common fund, for the benefit of the whole Union, and she now modestly asks five millions more.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office informs us that "the district of country lying north and west of the boundaries designated by the act of April, 1806," the whole of which this bill proposes to give to Tennessee, "is a very fine one, and contains a large portion of lands of very superior quality;" and that, "from an estimate made from the best maps in the possession of this office, it appears that the lands lying south and west of the line above mentioned amount to eight millions five hundred thousand acres."—House Documents, vol. 3, doc. 76.

By the act of April, 1806, all the lands in the State, north and east of the reservation line, were ceded to Tennessee, subject to certain conditions. In this country Congress reserved to the State, in trust for the support of colleges and academies, two hundred thousand acres—more than eight townships. The State yet owns one million fifty-five thousand acres, subject to the possessory right of the Indians, which will probably soon be extinguished. Tennessee has also received, in one small district, one million and twenty-four thousand acres. In addition to all this, more than twenty-two thousand seven hundred acres of school land has been located, and three hundred and five thousand acres distributed between the State and the University of North Carolina; the whole quantity of land received by Tennessee, as appears from these documents, being more than two millions six hundred thousand acres. I make this statement upon the authority of the documents now before me. [See United States Laws, vol. iv., p. 40; Senate Doc. vol. iv., doc. 156 and 160; Indian Treaties, p. 465; and Tennessee Laws, 1822, p. 42, and 1825, p. 37.]

Part of these small scraps, as gentlemen would call them, have been sold by the State. Land to the amount of four hundred and eighty thousand dollars was purchased in 1820, at public sale, in the Hiwassee district; in which there has since been paid for land, entered at private sale, two hundred and seventy-six thousand two hundred and twenty dollars, amounting in this one small district to seven hundred and fifty-six thousand two hundred and twenty dollars; to which, if we add the value of the college and school lands, and the three hundred and five thousand acres shared with the North Carolina University, at the minimum of two dollars per acre, we will find that the State has realized from the public lands, more than one million seven hundred thousand dollars, and still holds the fee simple to one million fifty-five thousand acres.

These, sir, are the facts, in the face of which gentlemen have assured us that Tennessee had not obtained an equitable proportion of the public lands; that her claims have been disregarded; and that she had received nothing from the liberality of the General Government. We have heard much said of the rights reserved by North Carolina in the cession of this territory to the United States, which may still be enforced against this Government, if we adopt this amendment. I believe, sir, all the local claims of the citizens of that State have long since been provided for. If they have not been satisfied, Tennessee is bound to pay them out of the lands granted to that State, upon this express condition. If Tennessee has received more than seven hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars for a small district of this land, there could certainly have been enough found to satisfy all the outstanding claims and warrants. That State resisted the claims set up by North Carolina, and refused to satisfy them out of the lands to which the State had a legal title; but after Congress, by the act of 1818, authorized Tennessee to perfect titles to lands belonging to the United States, south and west of the reservation line, that State and North Carolina did recognize claims which had been declared invalid, under which they appropriated to their own use three hundred and five thousand acres of good land, to which the United States still has, in my judgment, a legal title. Congress has never acceded to the right claimed by North Carolina to issue warrants for the benefit of her University; nor has the power ever been given to Tennessee to permit locations to be made, and titles perfected, on such warrants. Long after the State of Tennessee had repeatedly provided by law for closing her land offices, they were again opened, under new provisions; not, indeed, as an act of justice or magnanimity to the soldier who fought the battles of the Revolution, or to his heirs, but for the benefit of a North Carolina corporation. Sir, the State of North Carolina had no more right to issue warrants to her University, in the names of the soldiers who had been dead for half a century, without heirs or representatives, than she would have to issue warrants in the names of the Egyptian hosts drowned in the Red Sea, upon the muster rolls of Pharaoh's army. The Legislature of Tennessee, in the year 1822, upon the respectful memorial of the University of North Carolina, made a compromise with that corporation, and confirmed its claims to the amount of two hundred thousand acres, upon the condition that sixty thousand acres should be transferred, and the title warranted by the University to the State of Tennessee. This was done, probably much to the mutual satisfaction of the parties. A new edition of warrants was issued, and, in 1825, an agreement was made by the agents of Tennessee and the University, to confirm the title to one hundred and five thousand acres more of land for dead men's warrants. The State of Tennessee, however, took care to keep two-thirds of this quantity to itself, and gave one-third to the University, which was no doubt well satisfied with the bargain.—[See Laws of Tennessee of 1822 and 1825, before referred to.]

TUESDAY, January 18.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

The House resumed the consideration of the Tennessee Land Bill—the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. CROCKETT, as a substitute for the bill, as modified, on the suggestion of Mr. POLK.

Mr. BLAIR said that he had refrained from saying any thing on this measure, when it was under consideration and discussion on former occasions, because of the interest which his colleagues had manifested, and also the fact that they had explained satisfactorily the object and end of the memorial of the Legislature of his State; and he would have contented himself at this time by giving a silent vote, but for the unjustifiable attempts which have been made to drive it from the House, by a kind of side wind, not only jeopardizing the measure, but tarnishing the purity of legislation in his native State. Under such circumstances, silence on his part might (by his constituents) be construed into a criminal indifference to the object, and a total disregard to the character of the State. This subject, though so fully discussed, seemed yet to be grossly misunderstood by some of the gentlemen whose opinions had been expressed in the course of the debate, and, doubtless, by many others who had not participated therein. It should be his purpose, if he could receive—what had but seldom been awarded to the Speaker—the attention of the House, to present the claim of Tennessee in its proper light, while he should expose the demerits of each and every proposition, which had been made, in the amendment to the original bill.

But (Mr. B. said) before he would proceed to the subject, he would give a passing notice to the statements and opinions of some gentlemen who had expressed their preference for the amendment of his colleague. A gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BUCKNER) informs us that his opposition to the original bill was recorded at the last session, but that he intends to support the proposed amendment, because he prefers to give the lands in Tennessee to occupants rather than to the State; and that he can see no good reason for doing indirectly what this House has the power to do directly. This is a mistake, into which, I fear, many have fallen. The State of Tennessee has never assumed, before this House, the character of a suppliant asking for favors. As one of its Representatives I ask the performance of your contract, (if not yours, your predecessors,) solemnly entered into, and which has never been realized. But, on this subject, I shall have occasion, hereafter, to speak more at large. A member from North Carolina (Mr. OULPEPER) said that he would vote to give the lands to the occupants, rather than to the State, because they (the occupants) "had risked their lives in taking possession of their lands, and had encountered privations incident to the settlement of all new countries." Mr. B. said that he had not expected to hear such arguments in favor of the proposition from the members from the State from whence that gentleman came, and he felt himself constrained to say, that it evinced such profound ignorance of the history of the landed system in North Carolina and Tennessee, and such an ill-timed display of benevolence for a part of the good people of Tennessee, that he feared that it arose from the consideration that they were the minority, and that, by extending his offices of kindness to them, he would thwart the views of the majority, and disappoint the expectations of the delegation on this floor.

Mr. B. said he could not but remind the member that the citizens of the district which he (Mr. B.) now represented, once deserved the character of hardy adventurers, "who risked their lives in quest of their homes;" they were the descendants of the good people of the gentleman's own State, and went out under the auspices of that respectable State. Did the gentleman at that time feel differently from what he now does? Then, the mother State, clothed with parental kindness, said to the occupants who invaded the Indian territory, with the rifle in the one hand, and Jacob's staff in the other, you shall have a preference of entry, or pre-emption in purchase, for the improvements which you have thus made, and which were emphatically "at the risk of life, and under all the privations incident to new settlements." That was viewed as an act of great kindness, though the settlers were the holders of military warrants, and had fought in the Revolutionary struggle. [Here Mr. CARSON said that many of his friends supposed allusion had been made to him, which he did not believe, himself, but asked an explanation. To which Mr. B. replied, that he had no reference to that gentleman; his allusion was to the member in his eye, who had assigned his reason for supporting the amendment of his colleague, a day or two since.] A word as to the circumstances under which possession was taken of the country, in which the lands now in question lie. In 1818, the Chickasaw Indians ceded the land within the limits of Tennessee to the General Government; that land had been used by them as a hunting ground; after the treaty they abandoned it. Tennessee sent its surveyors and sectioned the whole country; it was thrown open to the North Carolina warrant-holders, who took up the choice of the country; and the residue has been possessed by the occupants. Sir, said Mr. B., no people ever have settled upon the public domain under circumstances less adverse.

Mr. B. said he would now come to the subject which he believed to be the proper theme of discussion—he meant the right of Tennessee to the surplus lands within its limits, for the purpose of making good the deficit in the school fund. He would inquire, what had been asked; what the House had done; and what was now attempted? The Legislature of Tennessee, some four or five years ago, memorialized Congress, and instructed the Senators and requested the Representatives from the State to use their influence to obtain a cession of the vacant residuum of lands within the State, after the satisfaction of all the North Carolina claims, for the purpose of aiding the school fund of that State; that memorial was entertained by the House, and a Select Committee raised for the purpose of inquiring into the validity of the claim: that committee, composed of members from several States, did investigate the subject, and report in favor of the application which had been made by the Legislature of the State, and the bill, after having undergone discussion at two former sessions, has again come up for consideration. Now, on the spur of the occasion, my colleague (Mr. CROCKETT) rises in his place, and proposes an amendment, dissimilar in its object, and entirely novel; which proposition, thus inconsiderately offered, against the instructions of our Legislature and the wishes of the delegation, we are gravely asked to adopt. Sir, (said Mr. B.) to say nothing of the want of courtesy in this movement, and the marked disrespect paid to your committee, I must say that it is unparalleled in the history of our legislation, dangerous in its tendency, and needs only to be named in order to meet marked disapprobation. Mr. B. said that he had heard in times past, much said, both in and out of this hall, in crimination of those who had the temerity to disregard the influence of popular will, whether express or implied. He would ask the House if they, who are not instructed, would be instrumental in driving those who were, into disobedience, or would they sanction the principle that the request of a sovereign State, expressed through its Legislature, should be contemptuously rejected?

The State of Tennessee founds her claim upon the beneficial provisions of the second condition of the act of cession of 1806, which is as follows: "That the State of Tennessee shall appropriate one hundred thousand acres, which shall be located in one entire tract, within the limits of the lands reserved to the Cherokee Indians, by an act of the State of North Carolina, entitled an act for opening the land office, for the redemption of specie and other certificates, and discharging the arrears due to the army, passed in the year 1783, and shall be for the use of two colleges, one in East and one in West Tennessee, to be established by the Legislature thereof; and one hundred thousand acres in one tract, with the limits last aforesaid, for the use of academies, one in each county in said State, to be established by the Legislature thereof; which said several tracts shall be located on lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and subject to the disposition of the Legislature of the State, but shall not be granted or sold for less than two dollars per acre; and the proceeds of the lands aforesaid shall be vested in funds for the respective uses aforesaid, forever. And the State of Tennessee shall, moreover, in issuing grants and perfecting titles, locate six hundred and forty acres to every six miles square in the territory hereby ceded, where existing claims will allow the same, which shall be for the use of schools for the instruction of children, forever." Here (said Mr. B.) is your bond presented, and one which has been uncanceled, so far as relates to the common school fund—that fund which promises more to disseminate the blessings of education amongst the poor than all others. And how has it been met? No gentleman, within his recollection, has denied but that six hundred and forty acres of land, within each six miles square, was intended to be given to the State for the use of common schools; but, say they, it was upon the condition "that existing claims would allow thereof." What was meant by existing claims? Surely, those which had been issued and appropriated to the soil, anterior to the deed of cession. It could not have been intended that the surveyors should, in laying off the school lands, be compelled to wait not only to the present time, but, under the act of cession, to an illimitable period, in order to ascertain if claims, not then existing, would thereafter exist. No, sir, at the time of the donation, claims did exist, they had been appropriated in that section of country, and it was a matter of uncertainty whether six hundred and forty acres could be laid down within the six miles square, without interfering with pre-existing locations; therefore, out of abundant caution, was the qualification made in the gift of cession.

Mr. B. said he could assure the House that not one acre of school lands had been laid off within the district which his colleague, who addressed the House on yesterday, himself represented. Why was it so? A plain answer is at hand. The soldiers of the Revolution, belonging to the North Carolina line, who had staked their lives and fortunes upon the glorious cause, relied upon this means for compensation, which had been jointly assigned for their satisfaction and the advancement of literature in the State of Tennessee. As the agent of North Carolina, Tennessee disdained to appropriate any portion of this joint fund to her literary institutions, though entitled to do so, or any other act which would diminish the fund or retard the soldier in the receipt of his hard-earned bounty. But, being satisfied that, north and east of the reservation line, a deficiency must exist, the legislation of Tennessee was exclusively directed to the interest and convenience of the Revolutionary soldier, trusting that the liberal provisions of the third section of the act of cession, favoring common schools, would thereafter be realized in good faith; which was, "that, if the territory thereby ceded to the State of Tennessee should not contain a sufficient quantity of land, fit for cultivation, according to the true intent and meaning of the original act of cession, including the lands reserved by the State of North Carolina to the Cherokee Indians, to perfect all existing legal claims charged thereon, by the conditions contained in the act of cession, Congress would thereafter provide for perfecting such as could not be located in the territory, out of the lands lying west or south of the before described line." Now, said Mr. B., seeing that more than two-thirds of East Tennessee has not a single foot of school lands, owing to the just, though disinterested preference given to the soldier; and seeing that your predecessors stipulated, in the event of the country, north and east of the aforesaid line, being insufficient to satisfy the claims charged upon it, that satisfaction should be made south and west of said line, can it be said that we are asking too much, when we only ask the refuse of those lands to be substituted for lands of superior quality, which we ought to have received? If the school lands had been laid off within each six miles square, as contemplated by the act of cession, each tract would have been more than equal to a score of those now asked for.

Mr. B. said that he would now inquire into the burdens which had been imposed upon Tennessee, and her inducements to encounter them. The district which he had the honor to represent was first settled; the citizens of which, in order to obtain their claims, were compelled to cross over what, at that time, was considered an almost impassable chain of mountains; when they reached their intended homes, they were surrounded by savages and beasts of prey, and deprived of every convenience and comfort incident to civilized life. After thus sustaining themselves amidst portentous difficulties, and being established as a member of this great Confederacy, the language of complaint was heard on the subject of their inconveniences in obtaining from the seat of Government of the parent State titles to their homes purchased at so dear a rate. This as a matter of convenience inclined Tennessee to assume the agency and to enter into a concern in which she was to become the responsible member of the firm though not participator in the profits.

It cannot be supposed that the State of Tennessee assumed the responsibility and incurred the expense of superintending the landed concerns of others from motives of convenience alone. Recur to her past history and what are the facts? Thirty years' legislation and consequent taxation in order to keep up this landed system; Boards of Commissioners for the adjudication of the North Carolina land claims and for agents sent to North Carolina to procure copies of the books in the Executive office of that State; and for what? I answer from the confident hope that there would be a realization of some benefit to her or to the literary institutions of the State after satisfaction of all the claims of North Carolina upon that territory—a hope that from the surplus lands over which her care was to be extended, a fund would be raised to gladden the poor man's heart by seeing the clouds of ignorance and error dissipated from the mind of his offspring under the genial influence of the rays of education which had measurably been obscured in their lonely retreat. In this way, and this alone, could he account for the labors performed, and expenses incurred by his native State, when, for many years, these burdens were sustained by the district, the citizens of which his colleague and himself represented. If he was correct in saying that all the North Carolina claims were first to be satisfied, and in satisfying them, school lands were to have been laid off for each six miles square, he would put a plain question to the House. Suppose, in the exercise of great good feeling towards the occupants in the Western district of Tennessee, you should give away the fund which was provided for the satisfaction of the claims before specified, what think you would be the next application? Surely it would be to you both on the part of North Carolina and Tennessee to discharge their respective claims. Will you then divest yourselves of the means of paying your debts and exercise generosity, at the expense of justice?

Mr. ISAACS said: I will not occupy the attention of the House with constructions of cessions and compacts, and the history of legislation growing out of them, in North Carolina and Tennessee; enough has been said already to maintain, as far as all that can go, the ground taken in support of this bill. I will content myself with presenting one plain view of the subject, which others may have overlooked. I submit to the House this direct and simple inquiry: In the present situation of this land, what is it likely to be worth to the United States? It must be answered, if it remains as it is, it can be worth nothing. Will you be at the expense of surveying, selling, and making titles to it? Will it pay cost, and yield a profit over, which will be worth the experiment? The United States can't dispose of it without establishing a land office there; a register and receiver must be appointed, and a surveyor, with salaries, such as are given to the like officers elsewhere: for these, under our system of land laws, are salary officers. A register and receiver get, each, besides commissions on sales, five hundred dollars a year. The surveyor, besides compensation per mile, two thousand dollars.

The United States cannot establish and keep there the necessary machinery for the appropriation of these lands, at an expense short of five thousand dollars per annum. And then, how are the public lands of the Government disposed of? Not an acre of it can, under the existing laws, be sold, either at public or private sale, for less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Does any man, from the general but faithful account given of the quality of the land, believe that there is any part of it that would ever sell at that price? If he does, he is certainly much mistaken, as I will show. You may expose your land there to public sale; your crier may cry himself to death; you may continue your land office; and in fifty years you cannot sell land enough to pay the expense of one year: for the plainest of all reasons—the land is not worth the price you set upon it. Whenever this subject has been before the House, some gentlemen have shown much sensibility, and expressed great concern, lest Congress should relinquish to Tennessee property of great value if retained. If gentlemen think so, how is it that no one of them has ever submitted a proposition to have the necessary offices established, and the duties performed, by which the Government could realize the value, which, in argument, had been attached to the lands? Why have they so long forbore to attend to this great interest? Their own conduct goes clearly to support the position which I take, that, to the United States, the price obtained, would not clear cost. I pretend to no very accurate knowledge of the quality of this vacant land, not having seen it; but I know enough of the general features of the country, and especially of the mode of land appropriations in Tennessee, to render any detailed information altogether unnecessary in arriving at a just conclusion. This district, south and west of the line, is said to contain eight millions of acres. Be it so. It is shown that more than half of that has been covered by entries and grants. There is much good land there, but there is also a very great proportion of uneven, barren, sterile, and swampy ground, worth nothing at all. Of the portion appropriated, the parcels are in all sizes, from five to five thousand acres, and in all imaginable shapes: for the warrant-holder, not being confined by any sectional or other lines, made his entry upon just such lands as suited him—of course, including the good and excluding the bad; and thus the surveys, in their size and shape, are regulated by the choice, convenience, or whim, of the enterer, and often controlled by accidental circumstances. This brief account of the irregular mode of appropriation may not be intelligible to those who are only acquainted with the regular surveys by right lines, ready made to their hands, by the Government, but it will be understood, at least by the members from Kentucky, who, like us, have some unpleasant experience on this subject. I wish I had a map on which the surveys were represented, so as to present to the eye, the curious variety of figures which they would exhibit, and the shapeless remnants of refuse lands—refuse, truly, because, it is just what remains after picking and culling over and over, with warrants of all sizes. This is a fair but imperfect picture. Subtract from this remnant the lands worth nothing; set your surveyor to work: he must first run out all the individual claims, to ascertain the vacant residuum. This he must leave in the shape he finds it, and, by its numerous offsets, give the quantity; the quality would hardly compensate him for his pains, nor you for the expense. Though I admit that there may be, if you had it run out, over a hundred thousand acres that would be worth something, none of it is worth the Government's minimum price.

Land Claims in Tennessee.

But we are met at every corner with this objection: If the land be so indifferent, and lies so awkwardly, why do you show such persevering solicitude to get it? In other words, if it is worth nothing, why do you want it? I will meet that inquiry candidly, and I trust, successfully. We show, by the very situation and character of the property, the difficulty and expense of its ascertainment and sale, that the United States cannot realize any profit from it. Why? Not merely because it is worth so little, but because it would cost so much in pursuit of that little; that the expenditures out of the Treasury, in actual cash, would never be reimbursed by the proceeds of the sales. But it does not, therefore, follow, that it would be worth nothing to Tennessee—far from it. It will cost us very little to sell it. There is the difference. The United States would have to employ officers, say at the rate of five thousand dollars a year. We can save that cost, because we have our offices and officers already; and, for the interest of our citizens, we must keep up that apparatus, whether we get this land or not. That which would cost the United States more than they would get for the land, will cost us little or nothing; and whatever shall be made, we shall have clear of charge. The difference between the Federal Government and Tennessee, in regard to their interest, consists in the difference of situation in regard to the means of turning their interest to a good account; the one already has, without an increase of expense, all the means that are necessary—the other has not the means, and cannot have them, without incurring an expense that their interest in the thing will not justify. And hence we say, and say with confidence, that the land is of no value to the United States, but would be of considerable advantage to us. To the United States the expense would overrun the profit—to us the profit would tell for itself, without the expense. If then, the House are satisfied that this land can be of no use to the Union, it surely will not hesitate to let it go where it can be useful. I will not believe that Congress will act the part of the dog in the fable: neither use it themselves nor let any one else do it.

The next question is, to what purpose will you convert it? Will you relinquish it to the State of Tennessee, to be applied as a small addition to our very scanty fund for the education of children at common schools, agreeably to the original plan proposed by the bill? Or will you adopt the amendment proposed by my colleague, (Mr. CROCKETT,) making it a free gift to the settlers? I am for making it useful to both: useful to the State, in the way of common school education; and useful to the people of the Western district, and to the settlers themselves, who will have a common interest in this fund, and derive an equal benefit from it. And to render it peculiarly beneficial to the settlers, I am in favor of going further, and should not be willing to vote for any bill that did not enable them, without risk, to save their homes, by securing to them the right of preemption to the land that they occupy. I would give them ample time to do that, before the land should be sold to others. I would give them the most reasonable terms, at graduated prices, and even better terms than the common purchaser; and with this I think they ought to be content. Farther than this, with all my feelings in favor of occupants, I cannot go. If I did I should not only disregard the instructions of the Legislature, and the general interest of the State, but I should feel that I might be violating that maxim which requires us to be just before we are generous. How stands the matter, as abundantly shown by others? These, with other lands in Tennessee, were ceded by North Carolina to the United States, upon this express condition, among others, that all the claims upon the land which North Carolina had originated, should be satisfied. It is alleged that there are still claims of this description unextinguished; to what amount I know not. But one thing I know, that, if you give away all the land, and put it out of the power of Tennessee, who, by compact, has been made the agent of these parties, to discharge the trust, either in land or compensation for warrants, it will not be long before you hear from these North Carolina warrant-holders, if there be any, (I hope there are but few.) And how will Congress resist their claim to indemnity? They will tell you that you have broken the contract, by giving away the land, that they had a right to get. You cannot turn them over to Tennessee, because you have snatched the land away out of her hands, and not allowed her to get any thing for it, when she asked you for permission to dispose of it.

But I have other, and to my mind, stronger, reasons for opposing this amendment. It is at war with the principles of equality which ought always to be observed in legislation. A preference to the first settlers, in a new district of country, has been a favorable and excellent principle in the policy and legislation of Tennessee, and has been practised by Congress under peculiar circumstances. It is one to which I am much devoted. But that preference has never been extended farther than to give to the settler the right of saving his land, at the lowest price which the common purchaser was required to pay, and prevent any other from taking it from him, if he would, within a given time, pay that much. There are, certainly, thousands of citizens in Tennessee who settled their lands under at least equal hardships, and much greater dangers, than the settlers upon the lands in question did. No lands were ever given to them; none were expected to be given. All that ever was done, for the most meritorious of them, was to give them a preference in the procurement of their titles. Why, then, make a distinction in this particular case? I have heard no reason urged for it which might not equally apply to the first settlers of every other part of Tennessee, and the other inhabitants of the Western district, and, indeed, to those of every other new country. There are many reasons why this class of citizens should be favored by the Legislature, in securing their homes in preference to others. But, while the public domain is sold at all, it might be going too far to give it away merely because it has been settled upon. I confess that, between the amendment and the bill as amended by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) I have very little choice. It is not, with me, a serious objection to the amendment that it proposes to perfect the titles through the agency of our State officers. Though not, ex officio, bound to perform the duty, I doubt not but they would do it for the fees. Nor do I believe that we shall have a Governor in Tennessee, though he receives no fee, who would think it an indignity to sign a poor man's grant, if authorized by Congress to do so.

Mr. Woods said he asked the indulgence of the House, for the purpose of making an explanation, to remove an impression which had, perhaps, been made by his remarks, in relation to the information received from the gentleman on his right, (Mr. CROCKETT,) to which he had referred. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) I received no information from that gentleman which he did not state in his place to this House. I never heard him say a word on the subject which he did not substantially repeat on this floor. It was stated, by the member from Tennessee, in his place, that three hundred and five thousand acres had been divided between that State and the North Carolina University. I referred to that fact, and I now have in my hand the act of the Legislature, passed on the 24th of November, 1825, page 37, by which it is provided that Tennessee should have two-thirds, and the University one-third, of the money arising from the sale of warrants for one hundred and five thousand acres, the right to which had been disputed. I understood one gentleman (Mr. BLAIR) to say, that Tennessee had never controverted or denied the justness and validity of the claims of North Carolina, or its citizens. Sir, I will read a paragraph of the compact entered into, on the 26th of August, 1822, between the agents of that State, and the North Carolina University, published with the laws of Tennessee, of 1822, page 42. The preamble of that compact declares: "Whereas the State of North Carolina hath issued to the President and Trustees of the University of North Carolina sundry land warrants, founded on military services, performed by certain officers and soldiers of her continental line, who have died, leaving no heirs in the United States; and whereas the State of Tennessee hath contended that the State of North Carolina ought not to have issued said warrants, by virtue of any law of said State, to the President and Trustees of said University, and that grants ought not to issue on the same." The States of Tennessee, and North Carolina, when it united their interests, did compromise these differences; and we have been informed by the gentleman who reported this bill, that North Carolina has closed her offices, and, by law, provided against issuing any more warrants. (See Report, No. 32, Vol. 1.) The argument that we might, by this amendment, interfere with the rights of North Carolina, must, therefore, be without foundation. The same honorable member has said, that Tennessee had not received the amount of money I stated; and that thousands of acres, in the Hiwassee district, would not sell for one cent per acre. As I did not read the document yesterday, to which I referred, I now beg leave to read an official letter from Nathaniel Smith: (Entry taken for the Hiwassee district, Senate Documents, vol. 4. Doc. 156.) "The amount sold at the sale in 1820, I have no account of, not having any thing to do, at that time, with the Land Office. I have been informed, by the Treasurer of East Tennessee, who superintended the sales, the amount of sales was about four hundred and eighty thousand dollars; that the land sold averaged about four dollars per acre; and that the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been paid into the Treasury." Mr. Smith also states that "the amount of land entered in that district, since the 2d of February, 1824, is five hundred and one thousand acres; for which the State had received, in cash, two hundred and seventy-six thousand two hundred and twenty dollars." The whole amount for which land had been sold, in that district, being, as I before stated, seven hundred and fifty-six thousand two hundred and twenty dollars. I also refer to another letter in the same volume (document 160) from an honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) who says, "If my recollection serves me rightly, between three hundred and fifty and four hundred thousand dollars were paid into the public Treasury, from the entry of the lands, in that small district, after the whole of them had been culled and picked, at the sales which preceded the entry system." I will not longer trespass upon the House. My object, in rising, was to do justice to the gentleman on my right, (Mr. CROCKETT,) and to read the documents to which I referred yesterday.

Mr. POLK said: Standing in the relation that he did to the subject before the House, having reported this bill from the Select Committee who had been charged with the subject, and frequent allusion having been made to him as the chairman of that committee, by several gentlemen, he felt it to be his duty, and he asked the indulgence of the House, to correct some errors into which he conceived gentlemen had fallen, and to meet some objections which had been urged against the bill. And first, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LOCKE) had been pleased to refer to the information possessed by the committee that reported the bill, and, especially, to that communicated by himself and his colleague, in reference to the true situation of the vacant lands in Tennessee. The gentleman opposed this bill upon the ground, chiefly that we had not sufficient information of the country, and that he apprehended these lands were worth much more than was generally supposed. The gentleman, in his great zeal to defeat this bill, had gone so far as to say, (certainly without any data upon which to make the estimate,) that these vacant shreds and patches of land were worth, and in his opinion would bring, to the United States, half a million and perhaps a million of dollars. Mr. P. said that the gentleman's estimate was one made not only without proof to sustain it, but was against the positive proof before the House.

When the subject was before the committee, he and his colleague who were members of the committee, had given such information as they possessed, as to the true situation and probable value of these lands. Their information was of course general and not minute. They had stated in substance, that the most valuable lands had been appropriated in satisfying the North Carolina warrants; that what remained were the refuse lands, lying not in compact bodies, but in detached parcels; and that, in their opinion, the United States, if they attempted to survey and bring them into market, according to the present land system of the United States, the amount of sales, if it should be practicable for them to do it at all, would not defray the expenses. They had called the attention of the committee to the memorial of the Legislature of the State, in which a statement of the true situation of the lands was contained. This general statement was made, and (said Mr. P.) it was the true statement. Himself and his colleague could not, of course, state what precise number of dollars and cents it was worth, for their information was not so minute. With this general statement, and from the documents before them, a majority of the committee thought it just to cede the lands to Tennessee to supply the deficiency in the common school lands, and agreed to report the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts was in a minority on the committee; he was not, as he said, satisfied, and at his (Mr. LOCKE's) suggestion, he, (Mr. P.), after the bill was reported, in order to satisfy, if possible, every individual, had, at the last session of Congress, addressed a letter to each of the Tennessee surveyors in that district of country, requesting specific information on the subject. The official statements of the surveyors was received, sustaining to the full extent the statement which had been made. He had presented those official statements to the House; they had been ordered to be printed, and had been laid upon the table of every gentleman. And yet the gentleman complains of a want of information. What would satisfy him he knew not; but he was sure he would do him the justice to say, that he had used all the means in his power to procure, for him and for the House, the necessary information to enable them to act understandingly on the subject. Sir, (said he,) what are the official statements of the Tennessee surveyors, as to the quantity and value of these lands? He had (he said) at his table, whilst the discussion had been going on, made a rough estimate, taken from these official statements, which if not in the opinion of the gentleman minutely accurate, certainly approximated to the truth, and varied but little from it. From these official statements, which he had then before him, it appeared that there were about six hundred thousand acres of land south and west of the Congressional reservation line, lying in detached pieces and small bodies, that might be sold, a small portion of it for fifty cents an acre, a portion at twenty-five cents an acre, but much the greater portion at twelve and a half cents an acre; that the aggregate amount according to the opinion of the surveyors, who were men of integrity and character, and who certainly knew the country better than the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had never seen it, and he imagined had never been nearer to it than Washington, for which they could be sold, at these prices, would be one hundred and seventeen thousand and fifty-five dollars; and that the balance of the vacant lands, being about three millions of acres, was exceedingly poor and sterile, could not be sold for any price, and would not be worth the annual taxes upon it. So much for the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and his argument that the committee that reported the bill, as well as the House, have not sufficient information.

THURSDAY, January 15.

Mr. MERCE moved to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, which was agreed to—yeas 88, nays 76.

Mr. M. briefly explained the facts of the case. That part of the road which lies east of the Ohio is one hundred and thirty miles in length. On seventy-one miles of this road, the bill proposes to erect toll-gates, at not less than ten miles apart. After the gates and toll-houses have been erected, the residue of the money is to be expended in repairs upon the road. Mr. M. assured the committee, that, when this measure should have gone into effect, they would never again be called upon to appropriate money for this road, as the tolls would be sufficient to keep it in repair. If not, it must remain a charge upon the Government, and the two millions two hundred and forty thousand dollars which had already been expended on this great national work would be lost, and the road fall into a state of total dilapidation.

The amendment having been agreed to, the bill was laid aside.

The committee, on motion of Mr. BARTLETT, took up the bill making provision for the exploring expedition in the southern hemisphere. The blank in the appropriating clause having been filled with the sum of fifty thousand dollars, Mr. BASSETT moved that the committee rise.

Mr. BUCHANAN now entered the House, and wished to offer an amendment to the Cumberland road bill.

The CHAIRMAN said that, as that bill had been laid aside, it would not be regular to receive the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN insisted that, so long as the committee remained in session, it was his right to offer an amendment to any of the bills it had had under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN replied that the case was new to him, and he deemed such a course irregular, but should receive the amendment, if the committee unanimously assented to it.

Mr. BASSETT now withdrew his motion for the rising of the committee, and no objections being made, Mr. BUCHANAN offered his amendment, which went to strike out the whole of the bill, after the enacting clause, with the exception of one hundred thousand dollars, to put the road in repair; and to provide, in substance, that the several parts of the road passing through different States should be ceded to those States on certain conditions. Mr. B., after a few general observations on the great importance of the constitutional question involved in the bill, expressed his desire, that, owing to the feeble state of his health, the further consideration of this bill might be postponed till Monday next; which being agreed to, the committee rose, and reported the other bills to the House.

The bill for the exploring expedition was briefly opposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, who demanded the yeas and nays upon ordering it to its third reading. They were taken accordingly, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Addams, John Anderson, Samuel Anderson, Archer, Bailey, Noyes Barber, Barker, Barlow, Barney, Barringer, Bartlett, Isaac C. Bates, Edward Bates, Beecher, Blake, Buck, Bunner, Butman, Cambreleng, Carter, Condict, Crowninshield, Culpener, John Davenport, John Davis, De Graff, Dickinson, Findlay, Fort, Forward, Garmsey, Green, Hobbie, Hodges, Holmes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, Lawrence, Leffler, Little, Locke, Lyon, Markell, Martindale, Marvin, Maynard, McIntire, McKean, McLean, Mercer, Merwin, Miller, Miner, Muhlenberg, Newton, Orr, Pierce, Pierson, Plant, Ramsey, James F. Randolph, Reed, Richardson, Ripley, Russell, Sergeant, Sinnickson, Sloane, Smith, Sprague, Sprigg, Stevenson, Stewart, Storrs, Stower, Strong, Swann, Swift, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tracy, Ebenezer Tucker, Vance, Verplanck, Vinton, Washington, Whipple, Whittlesey, James Wilson, Ephraim K. Wilson, Silas Wood, John Woods, Woodcock, Wolfe—97.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Armstrong, Baldwin, Philip P. Barbour, Bartley, Bassett, Blair, Brown, Claiborne, Conner, Coulter, Thomas Davenport, Desha, Duncan, Earl, Floyd of Georgia, Fry, Garrow, Gilmer, Hallock, Harvey, Haynes, Healy, Hoffman, Isaacs, Jennings, Keese, Kremer, Leconte, Lea, Letcher, Long, Lumpkin, Magee, Marable, Martin, Maxwell, McCoy, McDuffie, McHatton, John Mitchell, Thomas R. Mitchell, James C. Mitchell, Nuckolls, Polk, Rives, Roane, Shepperd, Stanberry, Sterigere, Taber, Thompson, Trezvant, Sterling Tucker, Turner, Wickliffe, Wilde, John J. Wood, Silas Wright, Yancey—59.

So the bill was ordered to its third reading.

FRIDAY, January 16.

Amendment of the Rules.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. WICKLIFFE, came up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the Standing Rules of this House:

"All elections by the House of Representatives shall be by visa voce, by a call of the names of the members, alphabetically, from the roll."

Mr. WICKLIFFE said the nature of the proposition which he had submitted, and which was now under consideration, required of him to state to the House the reasons which had influenced him to ask a change of practice in Congress of such long existence as that of voting by ballot. A natural preference for those rules of proceeding, in the exercise of our civil as well as our natural rights, to which we have been accustomed from our infancy, was not without its influence upon him in the present instance. He had grown up in a State whose fundamental law prescribed to the citizen the right and compelled the Representative to vote viva voce in all elections. This, of itself, would not have been a sufficient reason for his proposing a change in the Rules of this House. He was influenced by higher considerations: by conviction of its propriety and importance, both in reference to the rights of the constituent and the obligations of the Representative. In some States, or communities, it may be sound policy to guarantee the citizen, in the exercise of his original right of suffrage, the privilege of voting by ballot. The citizen exercises his own original right; he is responsible to no one for the vote he may give. He may be dependent upon the man or men against whom his best judgment dictates his vote. He may be unwilling to encounter, if he be able to withstand, the hostility which his vote might excite in the breasts of those upon whom he is dependent. Not so with the Representative: he exercises a delegated trust, for which he is responsible to those who have clothed him with the power of voting. In voting, by the members of this House, in the choice of its officers and agents, the influence of public opinion is as important, and it should be as respectfully obeyed, by the Representative, as upon the expediency of any act of legislation. Instance the election of a Speaker, to preside over the deliberations of this House, with the power to appoint its committees, &c., charged with the disbursement of two or three hundred thousand dollars of public money, in the payment of the members, and other expenses incident to our legislation, with no responsibility to the Government but his high character. A vote in his election may be of much more importance to the community, to the dignity and character of our Government, than in the passage of a law or resolution. The constitution under which we legislate has secured to the people, upon the request of one-fifth of their Representatives, the important right of having the votes of their Representatives spread upon the Journal, on any question, however unimportant in its effect or consequences. Yet, said Mr. W., we, by the rules or practice of our House, choose to shield ourselves from responsibility, for the votes we give, in the elections of important public officers and agents, by hiding from our constituents within the lids of the ballot-box.

What are the objections to the proposed change? I have heard, in conversation, but one. There may be others: more, I have no doubt, will be urged. It is alleged that, by a viva voce vote, the member will give offence, or may incur the displeasure of the Speaker, or the candidate for office, against whom he may vote. I will not allow myself, for a moment, to suppose, that a Representative of forty thousand freemen, or one who is fit to represent forty thousand freemen, does not possess independence and moral firmness enough to avow for and against whom he votes; and the man who is elevated to the dignified station of presiding over the deliberations of the House of Representatives of the United States, who would permit his indignation or revenge to be exerted against a member, because he preferred another for the station, is unworthy the confidence or respect due to the office he fills, or the claims of gentlemen. The member who would, from the dread of such indignation, sacrifice his independence, is destitute of that manly feeling and moral courage which ought to characterize, and I trust ever will characterize, the members of this House. I will, therefore, dismiss this objection, as one which cannot prevail, or find an advocate on this floor.

Allow me to present to your view a member, (if such a one should ever find a seat in this House,) who, influenced by a desire to be considered the friend of all candidates, or a dread of incurring the displeasure of any, (except his constituents,) would prepare his ballots, (one or more,) exhibit them to his neighbors, and then, by a species of legerdemain, slip into the ballot-box his vote in favor of a man for whom he would not have the independence openly to declare. Would you envy the independence and firmness of such a member? or would you not rather pity his meanness and servility? I believe the rule which I propose will violate no principle which belongs to a representative Government. It will have a tendency to secure and preserve the great one of representative responsibility, upon the preservation of which depends the pure and correct administration of this Government, if not its durability. I mean, sir, a direct accountability of the public agent to those who clothed him with authority. I can, therefore, but flatter myself, the resolution will be acceptable to a majority of this House.

Mr. MERCE said that, although he did not believe that he had ever given a vote by ballot which he had not exposed at the time, especially to the party against whom it was given, yet he could not consent to the adoption of the rule now proposed. Its necessary effect would be to lead to very great inconvenience, and great and useless sacrifice of time. The election of a Speaker, for instance, even in the present mode, had in some cases occupied two and even three days, as many as twenty-one ballots having sometimes been taken. It was manifest that, if the yeas and nays must be called for each vote taken, the election, instead of occupying two or three days, was likely to be protracted to two or three weeks, to which extent it had, indeed, in one case, gone, when

Mr. Jefferson was elected in 1801. He had been a member of a public society, in which, although the people of the State over which it presided held all their elections viva voce, it was nevertheless the practice always to elect by ballot. The rule had been adopted from experience, with a view to save time; but, in this House, it was proposed to reverse the rule, although it had been observed, without interruption, from the first organization of the Government—the effect of which would be to consume a large portion of every session; and to what purpose? What benefit could possibly accrue? The ostensible plea was, that, by this means, the Representative would be held responsible to his constituents for the manner in which he voted; but was it possible that this House contained a single member who wished to shrink from responsibility on such a subject? Could there be a gentleman on that floor who would not feel a pride in meeting that responsibility? Did the gentleman suspect his fellow-members of so great a want of candor? Mr. M. said that, inasmuch as no inconvenience had been experienced from the operation of the present rule, but great and obvious inconvenience would result from the proposed change, he felt himself bound to oppose the resolution under consideration.

Here Mr. M. adverted to an amendment he had himself offered a few days ago, proposing to apply the previous question to amendments pending, the propriety of which he briefly insisted upon. The consumption of time, even in the present mode of electing by ballot, arose principally from the practice of counting the ballots in the House. This might easily be avoided, by allowing the tellers to retire, and the business of the House to proceed in the mean time. If the standing rules of the House were to be altered on every slight occasion, and for any temporary object which gentlemen might have in view, there was no end to the changes which might be expected.

Mr. WEEMS coincided in part with the views expressed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, but moved to amend the resolution in such a manner as to require a viva voce vote only when demanded by one-fifth of the members present, in conformity with the rule at present in force in relation to the yeas and nays.

Mr. WICKLIFFE objected to the amendment, and declined accepting it as a modification.

Mr. CULPEPER expressed himself in opposition to the resolution. The first reason which the mover had given in its support, operated, in his own case, in a manner directly the reverse: for, he had been accustomed, from the outset of his public life, always to election by ballot, and never viva voce. In the State of Georgia, where he had at first resided, the very experiment had been made which the gentleman from Kentucky wished the House now to try. The mode of election for Representatives had been changed as was now proposed, and the effect was such, that, after the single viva voce election, the Legislature was besieged by petitions from all parts of the State to restore the former practice. The act was accordingly repealed. In North Carolina, which State he had now the honor in part to represent, election by ballot had always prevailed. For himself, he believed he might truly say, he had never, at any time, put a vote into the ballot-box, which he had the least wish to conceal. He had been a member of the House, with but few interruptions, for twenty-two years; during which he had never voted, either by ballot or otherwise, in a manner which he would not have exposed to all the world. The mode now proposed would prove exceedingly inconvenient and tedious in practice, and seeing no good reason in its favor, he should give it his decided negative.

Mr. MALLARY said he was utterly opposed both to the amendment and resolution. The officers of this House had ever been appointed by ballot from the foundation of the Government. It was the old Jeffersonian practice. Had any thing occurred lately to render a change desirable? Had the honorable gentleman any new or special reasons to suspect that the members would act dishonorably if intrusted to conceal their votes by the ballot-box? For himself, he knew of none. If the gentleman had discovered any, he should like to be informed of it. He had presumed the gentlemen of the present Congress were as honest and as honorable as their predecessors. Their fathers had voted by ballot, and he knew of no reason why the practice should now be changed. Perhaps the honorable gentleman might have within his knowledge some secret reason for supposing that this Congress ought not to be trusted by the nation to the same extent which other Congresses had been. If such were the case, he should like to know it.

Georgia Claims.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. THOMPSON, to reverse the report of the Indian Committee, on the subject of the Georgia claims.

Mr. WILDE observed that, in rising to redeem his pledge, it would be impossible to avoid entering somewhat into detail. These claims had never been acted upon by the House. The facts respecting them were, as yet, imperfectly understood. The questions they presented had not been examined. The arguments in their favor were still unheard. It was not his wish, however, to say more than the occasion absolutely required. He should be satisfied if he could procure a patient inquiry into the merits of the claims; beyond that, he had nothing to hope or ask. When the rights of the claimants were understood, the measure of justice to which they were entitled would be readily settled, by every gentleman, according to his own judgment. In 1821, one of those compacts or agreements, which have been familiarly, but not properly, called treaties, was entered into between the United States, the Creek tribe of Indians, and the State of Georgia. A cession of land from the Indians was then obtained by the United States, for the use of the State, the consideration of which was to be paid by the United States, in conformity with the obligations imposed by the articles of agreement and cession of 1802. At the time of those negotiations, there were existing claims of the citizens of the State of Georgia against the Creek nation, for depredations committed, prior to the act regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes. These claims formed one of the subjects of the negotiation; and for the purpose of procuring payment of them, commissioners on the part of Georgia had been appointed. Registered from time to time as they arose, in the proper department, according to law, with the proof by which they were established, an abstract of them, from the books of the Comptroller's office, was in the hands of the commissioners, and exhibited at the conferences. They amounted to two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and were principally for property plundered or destroyed, by Indians of the Creek tribe, in some of those predatory incursions with which our Southern frontier was so often harassed. Reparation for these injuries had been often stipulated, but never made.

Georgia Claims.

Repeated acts of hostility, attended with all the horrors of savage warfare, had been succeeded by repeated promises of peace and indemnity, which, in turn, were as repeatedly violated, with all the recklessness of savage perfidy. These outrages could not be denied. The obligation to repair them had been often solemnly admitted. The breach of that obligation was notorious. Under these circumstances the compact of 1821 was made. By the 4th article, the payment, by the United States, to the Indians, of various sums, at different times, amounting in the whole to two hundred thousand dollars, is stipulated, and the article then proceeds:

"And as a further consideration for said cession, the United States do hereby agree to pay, to the State of Georgia, whatever balance may be found due by the Creek nation to the citizens of said State, whenever the same shall be ascertained, in conformity with the reference made by the commissioners of Georgia and the chiefs, head men, and warriors of the Creek nation, to be paid in five annual instalments, without interest, provided the same shall not exceed the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; the commissioners of Georgia expecting to the Creek nation a full and final relinquishment of all the claims of the citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation, for property taken or destroyed, prior to the act of Congress of one thousand eight hundred and two, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes."

By the articles of agreement, made at the same time, between the commissioners of Georgia, and the chiefs, head men, and warriors of the Creek nation, all claims on either side, of whatever nature or kind, prior to the act of Congress of one thousand eight hundred and two, with the documents in support of them, were referred to the decision of the President of the United States, by him to be decided upon, adjusted, liquidated, and settled, in such manner, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as he should prescribe. A full and final release of all claims, of every description, was accordingly executed by the Georgia commissioners, to the Creek nation; it purported to be in consideration of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars agreed to be paid by the United States, and was witnessed by their commissioners. For the settlement of these claims, thus referred to the President, a commissioner was appointed, who proceeded to discharge his duty, under certain instructions, emanating from the War Department. Claims amounting to one hundred and eighty-two thousand three hundred and nine dollars were presented to him, of which eighty thousand eight hundred and forty-four dollars were allowed, and ninety thousand five hundred and thirty-eight rejected: subsequently a further reference to the Fifth Auditor was authorized, and some other sums were admitted. The whole amount allowed and paid a little exceeds one hundred and one thousand dollars, leaving upwards of one hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, still in the hands of the United States, and applicable, as Georgia contends, to the payment of the just claims of her citizens. It is worthy of remark that, of the rejected claims, a very inconsiderable amount indeed were condemned as fraudulent, or refused payment for insufficiency of proof. By far the greater number were denied indemnity because they were for property destroyed, and, according to the decision of the commissioner, in conformity with his instructions from the Department of War, they are alleged not to be provided for by the treaty.

This construction seemed to him an extraordinary one. It was not his purpose to reflect on the commissioner, or the Department; but, in justice to himself and his constituents, he must be permitted to make, and to defend, that assertion. First, it is to be observed that the reference to the President is of all claims on both sides. The submission is general, not restricted. Next, the release is unlimited; and in that respect it conforms to the compact. That instrument requires the commissioners of Georgia to execute a release for all property taken or destroyed. Can it be imagined that the renunciation and the obligation to indemnify were not intended to be co-extensive? Why ask us to release all claims for property destroyed, if such claims had already been extinguished? What is the principle upon which these claims for property destroyed have been disallowed? In his fourth instruction, the Secretary of War directs the commissioner to exclude all claims originating during a period of hostilities, which was followed by a treaty of peace, unless they are provided for by that treaty. This, he says, is a principle perfectly well established between civilized nations, and is believed to be equally applicable to savages. Now, why should the maxims of international law, established among civilized people, be extended to Indians, to whom they are unknown, and by whom they would never be regarded? They are not an independent people. In the progress of the negotiations of Ghent, our Government have expressly declared that they are not to be deemed so. That pretension has again been repelled by the President in his late Message. The agreements entered into with them are not treaties. The Senate have so decided. Even if they were independent, they are uncivilized. They do not abide by the rules of civilized warfare. Why, then, should we apply to them the rules of civilized pacification? Nations claiming to be civilized, do not usually plunder or destroy private property on land. Savages never respect it. To exempt them, on the return of peace, from all responsibility for such outrages, is to encourage them in their barbarity.

Mr. W. said that, before leaving this part of the subject, he would advert to the terms of the several compacts or treaties, recognizing these claims.

The first in order was the Treaty of Augusta—made with Georgia, in 1783. The second article provides "that all just debts due by any of the said Indians to any of the merchants or traders of the said State, shall be fairly and freely paid; and all negroes, horses, cattle, or other property, taken during the late war, shall be neutral."

The next was the Treaty of Galphinton—made with Georgia, in 1786. The eighth article stipulates: "The said Indians shall restore all the negroes, horses, or other property, that are or may be among them, belonging to any citizen of this State, or any other person or persons whatever, to such person as the Governor shall direct."

Then succeeded the Treaty between Georgia and the Creeks, at Shouder Bone, in 1786, which recognized pre-existing hostilities, and renewed pacific relations. By the second article, it is agreed that "All negroes, horses, cattle, and other property, now in the nation, and which were taken from the inhabitants of Georgia, shall be restored to such person or persons as his honor the Governor, or the commissioners, shall direct. All white or other free people in the nation, who are held as prisoners or slaves, shall also be delivered up to the aforesaid persons."

After these came the Treaty of New York, with the United States, in 1790. The third article declares, "The Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the commanding officer of the troops of the United States, stationed at the Rock Landing, on the Oconee river, all the citizens of the United States, white inhabitants or negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of the said nation. And if any such prisoners or negroes should not be so delivered, on or before the first day of June ensuing, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation, in order to claim and receive such prisoners and negroes."

To the treaty of New York succeeded the Treaty of Colerain, in 1796. The seventh article engaged "that the Creek nation shall deliver, as soon as practicable, to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at such place as he may direct, all citizens of the United States, white inhabitants and negroes, who are now prisoners in any part of the said nation, agreeably to the treaty of New York, and also all citizens, white inhabitants, negroes, and property, taken since the signing of that treaty. And if any such prisoners, negroes, or property, should not be delivered on or before the first day of January next, the Governor of Georgia may empower three persons to repair to the said nation, in order to claim and receive such prisoners, negroes, and property, under the direction of the President of the United States."

In 1802 was negotiated the Treaty of Fort William—A treaty of limits and cession. The second article provides for the payment of various sums of money, in consideration of the cession of land made by the Indians. Among the rest, "five thousand dollars, to satisfy claims for property taken by individuals of the said nation, from the citizens of the United States, subsequent to the treaty of Colerain," &c.

Then came the

Capitulation with General Jackson, in 1814. The fifth article declares, "that the United States demand that a surrender be immediately made, of all the persons and property taken from the citizens of the United States, the friendly part of the Creek nation, the Cherokee, Chickasaw, and Choctaw nations, to their respective owners."

In deciding upon the claims presented, the terms of these treaties have been considered as confined to that of 1821, in conformity with the instructions of the Department. This is contrary to every fair rule of interpretation. It should have been held to extend to them, not they to restrict it. The verbal criticism which attempts to establish a distinction between the obligation to pay for property taken and that destroyed, is worthy only of kindred answer. It must have been taken before it was destroyed.

In what he had said, or should say, on the subject of their decisions and instructions, he disclaimed every thing like disrespect or personal feeling. For the character of the commissioner he had the highest esteem. He was sure that gentleman suffered pain, whenever he was obliged to refuse indemnity to an honest claimant. To the then Secretary of War he imputed nothing, except a somewhat rigorous and contracted exposition of the treaty. He trusted he should always, whether in the majority or the minority, with the administration or the opposition, have respect enough for himself to avoid assailing the motives of any officer of Government. He would, when it was necessary, comment with freedom upon their acts, never forgetting, however, that forbearance which was due to men who were not, and could not, be present in person to defend themselves. What is, in effect, the official agreement upon these treaties? That the agreement is to restore; and property destroyed is insusceptible of restoration. And what follows? That the Indians, having agreed to restore what they could not restore, are to pay an equivalent? No, sir, they are to be discharged from all liability, because they shall not be held to perform what was impossible. Such was not the argument maintained by the Government of the United States, on the treaty of Ghent and the Convention of St. Petersburg. There the undertaking of Great Britain was to restore. When it was found that she could not, or did not restore, what was exacted from her? A just indemnification. Must he, then, be driven to ask, whether the United States have one measure of justice when they demand it of an adversary, and another when they are to render it to a friend?

The claimants contend, and with great apparent reason, that they are entitled to Payment for property destroyed;

An allowance for the increase of negro property; and

An allowance for the use or hire of property not susceptible of increase, or interest in lieu of these allowances.

The first class of claims had already been considered. The justice of them, and the futility of the verbal distinction between "taken" and "destroyed," is indirectly admitted by the Committee on Indian Affairs themselves. Then, as to the other allowances claimed, upon what footing do they stand? The savages, immediately upon the conclusion of each compact or treaty, were bound to restore the property comprehended in it. Had the restoration been made in good faith, according to the treaty, the owner would have had the use and increase of his property from that period: i. e., from 1788, '85, '86, '90, or '96, as the case may be, to the present time. But the Indians, in defiance of the treaty, keep the slaves. They retain them, ten, twenty, or thirty years, enjoying the fruits of their labor, and that of their offspring. This is no imaginary case. It is notorious that the plantations of many of the chiefs were stocked with negroes stolen from the whites.

The question, then, is this: Are the Indians, in consequence of their bad faith, to be placed in a better situation, and the owner of the property in a worse one? This would be to reward the savage vices of fraud and perfidy with the spoils of an innocent and suffering people. Upon the failure to restore, according to the compact, what were the claimants entitled to receive? Precisely what the United States demanded and received under the treaty of Ghent—a just indemnification for the property not restored. What is a just indemnity in such a case? Let us inquire of the constitutional adviser of the President, whose opinion the Government adopted. "What," says the Attorney-General, "is a just indemnification for a wrong? Is it the reparation of one-half or two-thirds of that wrong?" On these few simple ideas the whole question turns. If an injury is justly redressed which is only half redressed, then the British commissioner is right; but if an injury is redressed only when the redress is commensurate with the whole extent of the injury, then he is wrong. Let us put aside the emphatic and striking word just, and take the word indemnification alone. What does the word indemnification mean? The saving harmless from damage. Is that man saved harmless from damage who is left to bear one-half of the damage himself? The question seems, to me, too plain for discussion. The British commissioner, Sir John Nicoll, who composed part of the Board, under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794, seems to have entertained a very different opinion upon the subject from his countryman who is now sitting to execute the emperor's award. His words are, "To reimburse the claimants the original cost of their property, and all the expenses they have actually incurred, together with interest on the whole amount, would, I think, be a just and adequate compensation. This, I believe, is the measure of compensation usually made by all belligerent nations for losses, costs, and damages, occasioned by illegal captures." Now, at the time of the wrongs now under consideration, we were, as to Great Britain, neutrals and friends, and stood protected, by the most sacred of all instruments, a treaty of peace. In violation of this treaty, the slaves and other property of the American citizens were carried away, in the year 1815, and have been detained from them ever since. They have thus lost the use of this property for eleven years. Is the meagre return of the average value, at the time the slaves and other property were thus taken from them, a just indemnification for the whole wrong? That the act of taking away the property was a wrong, is no longer a question. The first act of dispossession being thus established to be a wrong, is the continuance of that dispossession for eleven years no wrong at all? Is it consistent with that usage of nations, which Sir John Nicoll recognized, to redress an act of wrongful violence by the return, at any distance of time, of the naked value of the article at the date of the injury?

Upon the whole, sir, I am of the opinion that the just indemnification awarded by the emperor involves not merely the return of the value of specific property, but a compensation, also, for the subsequent and wrongful detention of it, in the nature of damages. If the actual damages, in each case, could be ascertained, they ought, under the award, to be decreed: but, since this, if not impracticable, would be a work of great labor and time, I am of the opinion that the interest, according to the usage of nations, is a necessary part of the just indemnification awarded by the Emperor of Russia.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs,) said that, as one of the majority of the committee who approved of the report now under consideration, he considered it his duty to oppose the motion of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, and briefly to assign the reasons which had influenced him in forming his opinion upon the subject. The first question which presents itself in this investigation is, whether, upon a fair construction of the provisions of the treaty, the Indians are entitled to the residue of the money, after paying the claims of the citizens of Georgia. Upon this point there is a difference of opinion, not only among the members upon this floor, but also among others equally competent to understand it, and who have investigated it. If the Indians are entitled to the residuum, no proposition can be more clear than that Congress do not possess the right or the power to legislate upon the subject, without the consent of the Indians. In order to determine to whom the balance of this money does belong, if any balance there should be, after satisfying the claims of the citizens of Georgia, it is only necessary for gentlemen to turn their attention to the treaty between the United States and the Creek Indians, held at the Indian Springs, in 1821, and to the Article of Agreement then and there entered into, between the Indians and the representatives, or commissioners, appointed by the State of Georgia, in behalf of their citizen claimants. By the provisions of that treaty, the Creek Indians cede to the United States a certain portion of their country, for which the United States agreed to pay them, in certain instalments, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars. In the latter clause of the fourth article of that treaty is contained the stipulation which gives rise to the present discussion, and which is as follows:

"And as a further consideration for said cession, the United States do hereby agree to pay to the State of Georgia, whatever balance may be found due, by the Creek nation, to the citizens of that State, whenever the same shall be ascertained, in conformity with the reference made by the commissioners of Georgia, and the chiefs, head men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, to be paid in five annual instalments, without interest, provided the same shall not exceed the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; the commissioners of Georgia executing to the Creek nation a full and final relinquishment of all claims of the citizens of Georgia against the Creek nation, for property taken or destroyed prior to the act of Congress of one thousand eight hundred and two, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes."

The Article of Agreement between the rep-representatives of the Georgia claimants and the Indians, referred to in the foregoing clause of the treaty, is in the following words:

"Articles of agreement entered into between the undersigned commissioners, appointed by the Governor of the State of Georgia, for and on behalf of the citizens of said State, and the chiefs, head men, and warriors, of the Creek nation of Indians. Whereas, at a conference opened and held at the Indian Spring, in the Creek nation, the citizens of Georgia, by the aforesaid commissioners, have represented that they have claims to a large amount against the said Creek nation of Indians: Now, in order to adjust and bring the same to a speedy and final settlement, it is hereby agreed that all the talks had upon the subject of these claims, at this place, together with all claims on either side, of whatever nature or kind, prior to the act of Congress of 1802, regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes, with the documents in support of them, shall be referred to the decision of the President of the United States, by him to be decided upon, adjusted, liquidated, and settled, in such manner, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as he shall prescribe: Provided, however, if it should meet the views of the President of the United States, it is the wish of the contracting parties that the liquidation and settlement of the aforesaid claims shall be made in the State of Georgia, at such place as he may deem most convenient for the parties interested; and the decision and award, thus made and rendered, shall be binding and obligatory upon the contracting parties."

In pursuance of the provisions of the treaty, and in conformity with the Article of Agreement, the President of the United States appointed a commissioner, who, after giving full notice to the parties interested, proceeded to the State of Georgia, to receive all claims which might be presented, with the evidence in support of them; and under certain rules and regulations prescribed to him, by Mr. Calhoun, the then Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, to decide upon the respective claims. This commissioner, Gen. Preston, of Virginia, made report of his proceedings to the President, recommending the payment of a certain portion of the claims, and rejecting others. The President, after a full investigation, approved the report, and has caused to be paid to the citizens of Georgia the sum of one hundred and one thousand three hundred and nineteen dollars, and twenty-two cents, being the whole amount of claims, in the judgment of the President, which ought to be paid under the provisions of the treaty. If, then, the Indians are entitled to the residue of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, what right have we to interpose, without consent of the parties, in violation of their express stipulation, and in violation of the decision made by the President, who was the arbitrator mutually chosen and agreed upon by the Indians and the claimants, and whose decision, it was expressly agreed, should be final and conclusive?

But, it has been said the Indians are not an independent people. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, they are not, in the fullest sense of the term, it does not follow that they have no rights; and if they be entitled to the balance of the money, well may it be contended, that, without their consent, Congress cannot interpose, and say, the President has decided incorrectly. With just as much propriety might we take jurisdiction of an ordinary arbitration between two individual citizens: for it must be observed that the Government of the United States is not a party in this agreement or submission. It, therefore, follows, as a matter of course, that those who believe the Indians are entitled to the overplus money, must vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, which goes to reverse the report of the committee. Mr. McL. said, from a thorough investigation of the whole subject, and much reflection upon it, he had come to the conclusion, that the Indians are not entitled to the balance of the money which may remain after satisfying the claims of the citizens of Georgia, but that it of right belongs to the Government of the United States. The stipulation in the treaty is, to pay whatever claims shall be found due to the citizens of Georgia, in the manner therein specified, provided they should not exceed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; it is not an agreement to pay an absolute sum, but to pay so much as should be found due, not exceeding a certain sum; and it is fair and reasonable to conclude, that the Indians did not look, as a consideration for their lands ceded, to any balance of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but were content to receive the two hundred thousand dollars paid them, and to be relieved from the claims of the citizens of Georgia; the United States took upon themselves the risk, only stipulating that it should not exceed a certain amount. In this view of the case, therefore, Congress may legislate upon the subject, and, indeed, ought to do so, provided they are satisfied there are yet outstanding claims, intended to be embraced within the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. McL. said he could but regret that the Committee on Indian Affairs, had not in their possession, at the time, or previous to making their report, a document now before us, from the War Department, containing a schedule of all the claims which had been exhibited to the commissioner, and upon which the President has decided, some of which have been rejected, and the reason for their rejection given. If the committee had been in possession of this document in time, their report would have been, perhaps, more satisfactory and more specific, although their conclusion and decision would have been the same. From this schedule it will be perceived that some of the claims are more than fifty years old, and most of them more than forty years' standing; this does not prove them unjust, but it is a circumstance which would seem to require some degree of scrutiny into their merits. Complaint is made, by gentlemen who advocate these claims, that the instructions from the Secretary of War, under which the commissioner acted, in their adjustment, were in violation of the treaty stipulation, and contrary to the obvious understanding of the parties; that it was not the intention of the contracting parties, the Indians, and the representatives of the Georgia claimants, to invest the President with authority to reject any portion or class of claims, provided they originated prior to 1802; the only object in submitting the subject to his arbitrament was, that he should receive the evidence, and decide upon its sufficiency, no matter what the nature of the claim, or when it originated; if prior to 1802, he was bound to pay it. This is the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CARSON,) and the same position is assumed by gentlemen from Georgia, who have presented their views. Now, with all due deference to the opinion of these gentlemen, Mr. McL. said he entertained, and must be permitted to express, a different opinion. What is the language of the submission, or agreement of the parties? That "all claims on either side, of whatever nature or kind, prior to the act of Congress of 1802, regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes, with the documents in support of them, shall be referred to the President of the United States, by him to be decided upon, adjusted, liquidated, and settled, in such manner, and under such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as he shall prescribe." Is it not clear—is it not conclusive—that the whole subject, without limitation, was submitted to the discretion of the President? Most assuredly it is.

If, however, from an examination, it shall be found that injustice has been done to the claimants by the instructions given by the Secretary, or by the decision of the President upon them, then it may be proper for Congress to interpose, and grant relief; but, for himself, (Mr. McL.), he believed full justice had been done under the provisions of the treaty, and he did not believe a single case could be pointed out, in the long list of claims now presented, which was intended to be provided for, and which had not been paid. It is urged that the President had no right to look to any previous treaties which had been made with the Creek Indians, but ought to have allowed and paid all claims founded upon the destruction of property, whether provided for in the treaty which may have followed such destruction or not. Why, then, refer the matter to the President at all? Why was not the whole sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars paid over at once to the representatives of the Georgia claimants, by them to be distributed? The reason is obvious: a part of the claims were controverted, and a reference to some tribunal, to adjudicate upon them, was necessary. But, it is said, a schedule of claims, amounting to two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, was exhibited at the making of the treaty. And what does that prove? Most clearly, that a portion of them was considered unjust, or the money would have been handed over, as before remarked, and paid at once. If this schedule of claims was so exhibited at the making of the treaty, were not all previous treaties which had been holden with the Creek Indians also looked to, and understood at the time? And, if it was the intention of the parties to go behind those treaties, would not that intention have been expressed in some shape? It is well said, by the Attorney-General, in giving his opinion, that "the nature of this debt was to be ascertained only by reference to those antecedent treaties which have been made between the Creeks and the State of Georgia, and between the United States, acting in this behalf, for the State of Georgia, and the Creeks—to which this treaty of 1821, at the Indian Springs, must be considered as having relation."

Let us, then, for a moment, examine those previous treaties; and here it is to be remarked, that the treaties holden with those Indians prior to 1790, were holden by the State of Georgia herself. The first at Augusta, in 1783, at Galphinton, in 1785, Hopewell, in 1786, Shoulder Bone, in the same year.

"In all these treaties, (says the Attorney-General,) the stipulation, on the part of the Indians, which fixes the character of this debt, is, to restore the negroes, horses, and other property, now (that is, at the time of the respective treaties) in the nation, to such person as the Governor should appoint, &c. Not a word concerning compensation for the detention, nor compensation for any negro, horse, or other animal, that had previously died of disease, or had been consumed in the use. It is, simply, a naked engagement, on the part of the Indians, to restore the specific property, so far as it could be done; that is, so far as the property was still in being, and within their reach. Here the stipulation stops; this is the whole extent of the duty, or debt. The United States, in assuming the responsibility of the Indians, under these treaties, undertake to do only what the Indians ought to have done; that is, to restore the specific property within the reach of the Creek nation, at the date of each treaty; but, this being impracticable the only thing that remains to be done, and which is practicable, is, to pay, in commutation, the value of the article, at the time at which it should have been delivered."

The first treaty with the Creek Indians, by the United States, was holden at New York, in the year 1790, the second at Colerain, in 1796, the third at Fort Wilkinson, in 1802. In all those treaties, a stipulation is inserted, similar to the provisions contained in the previous treaties made with those Indians, by Georgia herself, for the restoration of all negroes and property then in their possession, belonging to the citizens of Georgia, but no provision, in any one of them, for payment of property which may have been, previous to the respective treaties, destroyed by said Indians.

The first agreement of the Indians to pay for property destroyed by them, is contained in the treaty at the Indian Springs, of 1821, and it is contended that this general provision should extend back, without regard to time, and without reference to any antecedent treaty. The decision of the President has respect to all previous treaties, and he, with great propriety, has determined that all property, of every description, which was stipulated to be restored and given up by the Indians to the citizens of Georgia, in any and all the aforesaid treaties, whether holden by the State of Georgia, or by the United States, with the Creek Indians, and which they may have destroyed, or neglected to restore, should be paid for; and all such has been paid. It has also been determined that all property taken or destroyed by said Indians, after the treaty of 1796, up to 1802, the time fixed by the parties, should be paid for; and all such claims have been received and paid. The agreement, then, in the treaty of 1821, to pay for property destroyed, must have been intended to apply to the destruction of property which it had been provided, in previous treaties, should be restored, and which may have been destroyed, or never returned; and for property destroyed after the treaty of 1796, up to 1802. Every treaty with the Indians, or with any other nation or power, containing a provision for the payment of certain specified claims, carries with it evidence of a final adjustment, or settlement, and the exclusion of all pretence of claims not provided for. The very nature of these claims, many of them being for horses, which strayed into the Indian country, and for negroes, who had eloped from the service of their masters, and taken refuge in the Indian country, shows the necessity and propriety of having reference, in their adjustment, to previous settlements or treaties. Proof that a negro, who had absconded from his master, or a horse which had strayed from his owner, and may have been seen in the custody of the Indians, although such negro or horse may have died of disease the succeeding day after he was so seen, would fasten upon the Indians the presumption of their destruction by them, and the obligation to pay. It is impossible it could have entered into the head of the commissioners, or the Indians, at the treaty of the Indian Springs, that the particular clause in the article of the treaty now under discussion was to have reference back, without regard to other treaties which had been made, to the first settlement of the country.

Mr. OWEN said it was not his purpose to have taken part in this discussion; nor upon the mere question of claim was he now disposed to say much. But, in the discussion, points had been raised, on which he had long wished most fully to give his views. But before passing to the object I have mainly in view, said Mr. O., I will notice the direct question now before the committee; and that is, whether "further legislation upon this subject be now necessary, or not?" If the claims of Georgia are believed to be valid, further legislation is necessary; if it is believed (and such seems to be the prevailing opinion from the current of the debate) that, should there be a surplus, after satisfying the claims of Georgia, that surplus goes to the Creek Indians, then further legislation is necessary; and the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has said an appropriation is requisite: this, I conceive, is an admission that the direct question before us must be decided in the affirmative. But, as I design, as far as practicable, avoiding the grounds previously occupied in the debate, on the question of right in the citizens of the State of Georgia, my remarks will be but few, and intended more to show the committee the grounds on which my own conclusions have been arrived at, than with a view to convince others. I shall not, therefore, advert at all to the treaties of 1790, 1796, and 1802, nor to any other than the treaty of 1821, entered into at the Indian Springs, between the Creek nation of Indians, and the United States, with the assent of the State of Georgia. What were the considerations that led to the formation of that treaty? Those of the United States were to extinguish the Indian title to lands in Georgia, in pursuance of the compact of 1802; those on the part of the Indian nation were to obtain a valuable consideration for that which was in fact but of little value to them, to gratify the wishes of the Government, and to satisfy the claims of Georgia. The item in the treaty which now claims our attention gives plainly the reasons that influenced Georgia: they were, to obtain full indemnity for losses long since sustained by her citizens by Indian aggressions. To compass these ends, the Indians, for such considerations as they approved, ceded millions of acres of land to Government, and demanded full and final release from Georgia for all the property lost or destroyed anterior to 1802. These were given. The United States stipulated that, for this release, a sum not exceeding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars should be set apart, which was to be applied under the direction of the President.

Here, then, the question now under consideration, embraced entirely in the fourth article of the treaty of 1821, presents a covenant, to the perfecting of which the assent of three parties was requisite, each accomplishing its respective object, and each obtaining its due consideration therefor. The Indians, for their security, required and obtained a full release from the State of Georgia. The United States Government, for her security, fixed the maximum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, beyond which amount Georgia should not go. Georgia, alone, is left indefinite in her rights, and with no security for full indemnity for her full relinquishment. Is this consistent with a just and rational construction of an instrument framed on fair and open principles? or, rather, would it not be considered more consistent with both reason and justice, and more, too, consistent with strict legal principles of expounding a compact, that, when a full and ample relinquishment of right is demanded, an equally full and ample consideration be given for it? This was evidently the intention of the contracting parties in this instance; but, by some means, in carrying this intention into effect, indemnity for destroyed property is not admitted. If this be correct, why is it thought proper to require that Georgia should relinquish her claim for "destroyed" property? That both terms were used to extend, rather than to restrict the rights of Georgia, is evident to my mind; and this conclusion is clearly sustained, I think, when it is recollected that it was as much a matter of interest to the Indian nation that a relinquishment for destroyed property should be granted by Georgia, as for lost property; because, by our previous treaties, property "destroyed" by the predatory incursions of the Indians, presented the same ground of claim against the nation as for property taken and carried away. This is the reason of the relinquishment: should it not be concluded, then, that the consideration should go, pari passu, with it? Nothing, it appears to me, can be more clear. This point it is wholly useless for me to pursue farther, after the able expositions of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. WILDER,) and the conclusive and peculiarly apt remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SUTHERLAND,) who has just addressed the committee.

But another position is taken by the Chairman of the Committee, (Mr. McLEAN,) which, though he does not fully give his assent to, yet clearly leaves the impression that it is not marked for his opposition; and that is, that the Indians are entitled to the surplus of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, after the satisfaction of Georgia. To this I have no objection to yield him my assent; if the sum stipulated formed a portion of the consideration for the purchase of the Indian right to the soil, then I would say, in law they are entitled to it, if this intention is not fully secured by the terms of the compact; but that it is evident that, with this surplus added to the sums paid by the United States, it falls short of the value of the acquisition from the Indians, I would say that equity would appeal most powerfully in their behalf. But the chairman's position is, that in this matter the Indians have their rights; and, without their voice being heard, we have not the power to take steps or prescribe measures.

This brings up the important and unsettled principle of the powers and rights pertaining, by the principles of our Government, to the Indian tribes within the limits of any of the States of this Confederacy. I am glad, sir, that this question is raised; though this is more properly a question of claim on the one hand, and the obligation of Congress to allow it on the other, yet, as it is presented, I will meet it. Therefore I claim the farther indulgence of this committee, while I give fully my views upon this branch of the question.

Though I give no sanction to the idea of the obligatory force of Indian treaties, there are some here who respect them, and emphatically affix to them all the force of the most grave national compact between civilized nations. To this point, therefore, I claim your indulgence; it is due, sir, because, such has been the practice of this Government on this question, based on error, as I conceive, that it now presents the most difficult and intricate question that now comes before Congress; even more complicated than our whole fabric of foreign relations, and more difficult of control than any other of our home affairs. In entering upon the examination of a question of this character, if I were disposed, I could not restrain the current of thought that carries me to the contemplation of the number and condition of this people, when the will of Divine Providence gave foothold to civilization on this hemisphere. It is difficult to conceive of a state of greater independence than they enjoyed; and though the state of their benighted minds prevented them from the enjoyment of that happiness that nature's bounty presented, yet we know that, if climate the most benign, and soil of the most fertile character, could render savage happiness complete, theirs was so—a people whose numbers, to use their own figurative language, were equal to the leaves of their own impenetrable forests, roaming over a continent extending through frigid, temperate, and torrid zones, now so diminished that the limits of a single country, nay, town, would afford them ample room and ample sustenance. Can the inquiry be restrained, how these things are? Whether they result from the policy of the civilized Governments which have controlled their destiny; or whether they be from the high and inscrutable source of all good and all power over the deeds and actions of men? Be these things as they may, the fact is, and to our senses it bears actual attestation, that their numbers have dwindled to nothing; and though millions have been expended in ameliorating their condition, by the introduction among them of the arts and habits of civilized life, yet, if possible, they are less happy, more wretchedly poor, and equally as savage, as at the day of the landing of the pilgrims, now two centuries gone by. To the philanthropist, these considerations are fraught with pain; and to the statesman, whose contemplations are directed to improve the condition and promote the happiness of his fellow-beings, there is but little to smooth the pillow of repose, or to sweeten the draught of approbation, presented by the consciousness of having deserved it. To trace, however, the whole train of public or political acts, intended to operate upon this people, from the earliest period of our settlement among them, or to examine the various ideas of what was considered as belonging to their rights and privileges, through the different ages of our people to the present day; to note their mutations for condemnation or approval, though most ample and interesting subjects in themselves; does not come fully within the scope of my present purpose. One main object I have in view, as remarked in the outset, is, to trace the extent of the power of the General Government over this people; to that end, considerable detail will be found to cumber my remarks, and no unfrequent reference, of course, to early documents, now forming a portion of the archives of this nation.

Though it is not in the memory of any man that now lives, yet it seems green to the recollection of us all, so minute is the detail of history—and even the tales told by tradition yet live among us—how our forefathers treated the wild savage of America on their first landing and establishing a home among them, that what we now know to be facts, not to be questioned or contested, might, in other times, have been considered fables created by the ingenious, or the fictions of fancy. Could it be credited, in times long since gone by, that the wild, uncultivated savages of the desert, among whom the lights of science and civilization never beamed, at their first interview with civilized man, showed an innate principle of hospitality, and manifested some of the finer traits of the human heart, which have wholly disappeared since their communion and constant intercourse with the learned, powerful, and virtuous European, for more than two centuries! Nevertheless, we know this to be the fact; and that the mass of that species of our being has continued to grow worse; and that, instead of learning of us our virtues, they have cultivated our vices; and that the means are most amply afforded by ourselves, of their most fully giving nurture to, and the practice of, all that are the most debasing and abject in the human character. It is a consideration worthy and proper to be investigated, then, in whose hands are placed their government and control; and, if we find these properly placed, to see if they be not most foully abused. To the ascertainment of this point, I will recur to the principles of the first founders of the ancient English colonies; and though I may be told that this took place in days of religious bigotry and enthusiasm, that made Omnipotence itself partial, and therefore unjust, I think something may be drawn that will have some bearing on this question; and to say that what was done in the days of James the Second, of England, was the result of imbecility, will not be a sufficient refutation of the argument I claim to be based upon the usages of that day. The principle, then, I presume, is not now to be contested, that, on the discovery of this continent, although it was peopled with myriads of Indians, it was claimed by the civilized power making such discovery, by the right of discovery, and that right was afterwards sustained at the point of the bayonet; and according to the principles of all the Governments among which the whole continent, north and south, was partitioned, the soil was claimed, and that right was not only enforced by power, but it was actually sanctioned and supported by the jus gentium, the law of nations, then governing and controlling the civilized world; and, in the sequel, though we claim to have advanced in liberal principles far beyond those of two centuries gone by, I think I will be able to show that such is now the code of moral principle, the now national law, which controls the actions of nations even to this day.

By recurring, then, to our earliest history, we find that, though we found this continent peopled, we scrupled not to take lands, on which we founded the homes that now extend through and cover the whole of our limits. The modes resorted to, to prevent embarrassment and difficulty with the natives, were various; those used by the Crowns were bribes and intimidations—those used by the individuals, were frauds and presents. I use these terms intentionally, because these are the terms now so familiar in canvassing this subject at this day; and although, in the history of the times to which we have to recur, these terms are not used, yet it is quite easy to perceive that what was then done was quite like unto what is done now. So early as the year 1665, we find that actual difficulties had taken place between individuals and the natives, by reason of purchases made of Indians of the same lands by different persons.

The fact of a controversy of this character proves that individuals possessed the power and right to make such purchases as they might think proper. If, however, other proof is required, we have it by recurring to the proclamation of October 7, 1763, in which this right is expressly recognized as having formerly existed, but from that date to be abrogated, and retained to the Crown. Before farther reference to this proclamation, I will remark that the principles therein developed, be they what they may, are not from the fanaticism of James, but from the more able and more imposing House of Brunswick. As above remarked, I will here observe, that the acquisition of Indian territory, from the days of the landing of our fathers at Jamestown or Plymouth, up to the date of this proclamation, belonged exclusively to individuals of the different settlements or colonies, or to Governors, or other functionaries; and as all the land was called and admitted to be crown lands so soon as reduced to the possession of a white man, no matter by what means, the charge of quit-rent accrued, and the same charges (all being very limited) in favor of the Crown, that were actually exacted, when the mode of acquiring possession of Indian lands was changed by the proclamation of 1763.

One consideration must not be here omitted, and that is, the reason assigned for causing this change in the mode of acquiring Indian lands. In all the evidence I have been able to collect, it is stated to result from the evil practices of the Indians in selling, more than once, the same lands; and to prevent the contests that necessarily followed such transactions, it was proper that greater publicity and formality should attend such purchases.

In an early history of New York, this language is used: "The strength and numbers of the natives rendered it necessary to purchase their rights; and to prevent their frequent selling the same tract, it was expedient that the bargain should be attended with some considerable solemnity." So early, therefore, as 1665, the Governor of that province interdicted individual purchases, and, with but little interruption, this practice continued until the enforcement of the king's proclamation in 1763. From this, I desire that it should be kept in mind that, in the formation of our colonial Governments, under the British Crown, the right first existed in the people, in their individual capacity, of purchasing Indian rights; after, because it was found the more expedient, the power of purchasing these rights was claimed and controlled by the Crown itself. Hence the origin of treaty-making; though it must here be remarked, that the same solemnity of ratification was not deemed necessary as attended these acts with nations of the Old World, or at least such point is not affirmatively sustained by British history.

I will now proceed to notice more particularly King George's proclamation in 1763. The whole clause on this point I will here introduce: "And whereas great frauds and abuses have been committed in purchasing lands of the Indians, to the great prejudice of our interests, and to the great dissatisfaction of the said Indians; in order, therefore, to prevent such irregularities for the future, and to the end that the Indians may be convinced of our justice and determined resolution to remove all reasonable cause of discontent, we do, with the advice of our privy council, strictly enjoin and require, that no private person do presume to make any purchase from the said Indians, of any land reserved to the said Indians within those parts of our colonies where we have thought proper to allow settlement; but that if, at any time, any of the said Indians should be inclined to dispose of the said lands, the same shall be purchased only for us, and in our name, at some public meeting or assembly of the said Indians, to be held for that purpose by the Governor or Commander-in-Chief of our colonies, respectively, within which they shall lie; and in case they shall lie within the limits of any proprietaries, conformable to such directions and instructions as we or they shall think proper to give for that purpose." This is in language that cannot be misunderstood. No comment, therefore, is necessary. But a single point will here be noticed, therefore; that is, the language used in designating the lands individuals were prohibited from purchasing: "No private person do presume to make any purchase from the said Indians, of any land reserved to the said Indians." Land reserved to the said Indians. By whom reserved? By the power that claimed the whole soil—the British Crown. If, at this day, a prior right was acknowledged to have existed in the Indians, it needed no reservation on the part of the Crown to give title to the lands on which they were found, when the lands themselves were found. But I need not waste time in the discussion of a question so abundantly sustained by the authors on National Law in all civilized nations, and by such nations so undeviatingly pursued in practice, as the conduct toward, and the right belonging to, a savage people, inhabiting a portion of the earth newly discovered by a civilized nation. Nor need I here recur to the great principle emanating from Divine wisdom and goodness, that gave this globe to man, that the earth should, by his powers and intelligence, be replenished and subdued. Nor is it necessary to create and discuss abstract questions, now easy of solution, but which, in times only a few centuries past, afforded difficulties insurmountable to the most learned and able statesman, as well as the most intelligent and pious philanthropist. Whether our forefathers, by the law of man or God, could claim the soil of the American continent, or not, is not now material to our purpose. It is enough for us that they did so claim it; and that, whatever rights were admitted to the natives, were the result of policy or clemency. Nor shall I inquire how far the true Christian faith, and the refined philosophy of our day, will cause us to execrate the deeds of those who braved the ocean's tempest, endured the privations, nay, the famine, of an uncultivated wilderness, and resisted with success the unbridled fury of a savage people, to lay the foundation of an empire now among the first on the earth; to its people extending greater blessings than any other; and contributing so large a portion to the stock of intelligence and to the store of human comfort, through the whole world, as the present Government of the United States does. The reflection, however, cannot be restrained, that, if these things have been in violation of the rights of one portion of the human species by another, and that, too, without the sanction of Divine law, where were the never-sleeping powers of an all-righteous and controlling Power, that the frail barks that first bore civilization to this shore were not overwhelmed in the vasty deep! If the days of revealing the Divine will to man had not long since gone by, I would not deem it impious to say, that, through the whole progress, from the chimeras, then called, of Columbus, through the whole train of appalling events of discovery voyages, and planting first settlements, down to the final overthrow of British rule in this Confederacy, the will and decree of unerring Providence is too palpably indicated to admit of doubt. As these conclusions come from sober reflection, in aid of those deduced from the governmental decrees of the day, it may not be amiss to inquire what code of moral or religious law is at variance with them. My research enables me to find nothing adverse to my purpose, from which I must be pardoned for having in some degree digressed. To return: my object is to ascertain in what tribunal was vested the power to purchase lands, or make compacts with the Indians, prior to the independence of these States. And I think it is shown that a power, originally vested in every subject of the British Crown, passed from the subject to the Crown itself; and the administering of that power was confided to the Governors or superintendents of the different colonies. It is not necessary here to recur to the various instances and modes of the exercise of this power. The history of the time is replete with examples well nigh to the acquisition of every separate colony; and, although the practice attendant on the treaty-making of the present day receives no such general condemnation from some quarters, yet impartial examination enables us to discover quite clearly that the ceremony and circumstances attending the land-purchasing of our pious fathers, by the pilgrims, and by Penn himself, are not only now imitated, but the very practices used, and the very considerations given, to induce compliance on the Indians' part, are still most substantially and minutely resorted to, in no material degree varying in consequence of the change of the condition of the two people. We were then weak, and they were strong; policy was the basis of our fathers' system: we are now strong, and they are weak, and what was formerly done from policy, we now do from humanity, or even from charity. The question here inevitably presents itself, Where is now the power vested? That we have already traced to have been in the British Crown anterior to the revolution. No question can arise upon the assumption, or rather the assertion, of the fact, that, upon the acknowledgment of the independence of the States by the British Government, all the power passed from the Crown to the States, respectively, prior to the Confederation. Then, this power belonged to the different States. It is our purpose now to examine what has been done by the act of the Confederation. It is not amiss here to refer somewhat minutely to the history of the times that led to the association of several independent Governments. Many of our day know, of their own knowledge, and all of us know from the traditions of our fathers, or the records of the day, that a portion of the subjects of the British Crown, inhabiting colonies under the royal patent, were driven to demand those rights which belonged to British subjects, but were withheld by tyranny and abuse of power. Demands were unheeded, until they were sustained by force. The bloody contest ensued, which resulted in American independence; and, as each colony had been aggrieved, each colony made resistance, and made common cause. In this alliance, of course, losses had been sustained in common, and obligations in common had also been created. After the commencement of exercising independent Governments, difficulties innumerable and great were presented in devising means of recovering from the losses, and of discharging the obligations, sustained and created in their time of need. A recurrence to that principle which presents itself in the earliest dawning of human intellect here presented itself. Association had been found necessary to success in war: association was considered the only means of sustaining present peace, and securing future independence; therefore the Confederacy was formed: and it must be kept in mind, that, as resistance to a common enemy had first called the principles of confederacy into action, so, to resist common evils, were these principles again to be resorted to: for, let it be remembered, that, for the purposes of internal government, the State Governments were found fully adequate for their intercourse with each other; and, for the regulation of external or foreign concerns, was the Confederacy resorted to. In the performance of this stupendous work were developed the vast powers of the minds of those sages who gave birth to the instrument which was the basis on which rested the principles of our compact. It was not the task of men, forming a society for mutual protection and mutual defence; it was the act of Governments, of nations, forming a society for mutual advantage; and the difficult task of tracing the line which was to distinguish the rights of each from the rights of the whole, was entered upon without a precedent to guide—the whole civilized world opposing many instances adverse, and the nation that we had resisted, powerful in means, and deep in intrigue, using all schemes to defeat it. Thus entered our fathers upon this work, with giant minds and patriot souls; under the guardianship of Heaven, the work was done—an ark of future safety to ourselves, a stumbling-block to our enemies, and the admiration of all future generations.

In the examination of that instrument which is called the Articles of Confederation, we find that, among other things, it is resolved, that [Art. 6] "No State, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty, with any King, Prince, or State; nor shall any person, holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any one of them, except of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State; nor shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any one of them, grant any title of nobility."

Under the preceding, what is to be deduced? It is commonly said, that this first took from the States the power and right of holding treaties, and vested it solely in Congress. This is
